Presidents: Mr. Brett, Worker Vice-Chairperson of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and Ms. Keltošová

OPENING OF THE SESSION

Mr. BRETT (Worker Vice-Chairperson of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office) — I have the greatest pleasure to declare open the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference.

ELECTION OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE CONFERENCE

Mr. BRETT — Our first task is to elect a President of the Conference. I call upon Ambassador Zahran, Chairperson of the Government group, to propose the candidature for President of the Conference.

Mr. ZAHRAN (Government delegate, Egypt) — On behalf of the whole Government group, I have the honour and pleasure to nominate Her Excellency, Ms. Olga Keltošová, Minister of Labour, Social Affairs and Family of the Slovak Republic, for the post of President of the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference.

Ms. Keltošová graduated from the philosophical faculty of Bratislava University, where she studied journalism. She worked as a journalist during her studies at university and after and until the year 1968. Later on she worked as a translator and interpreter and devoted herself to creative work for children. After the collapse of the Communist regime in 1989 and democratic changes in her country, she started her political career. From 1990 to 1991 she served as vice-chairperson of the National Council of Slovakia. At the same time, as a member of the Committee for Social Affairs and Health of the National Council, she contributed to the changes in the social system in Slovakia. In 1992 Ms. Keltošová was appointed Minister of Labour, Social Affairs and Family and served in this position until 1994. After the election in the same year she was reappointed to the same post. Minister Keltošová also has experience in the international field. Inter alia, she led the delegation of her country at the Fourth World Conference on Women in Beijing and the World Congress on Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Children in Stockholm. She participated at the 80th, 82nd and 83rd Sessions of the International Labour Conference in 1993, 1995 and 1996 respectively. She also participated in numerous multilateral fora in the European context. Minister Keltošová personally contributed to the establishment of the International Centre for Family Studies located in Bratislava, which later affiliated to the United Nations. In 1994 she initiated the review conference of the National Coordination Committee of the International Year of the Family held in Bratislava. Minister Keltošová regularly publishes articles focusing on labour, social policy and social protection issues.

We are certain that the skills and experience of Minister Keltošová will enable her to guide efficiently and successfully the work of the Conference. We hope that this session of the International Labour Conference will unanimously elect Ms. Olga Keltošová as its President.

Original French: Mr. OECHSLIN (Employers' delegate, France) — On behalf of the Employers' group, it is with pleasure that I second the nomination of Ms. Olga Keltošová, Minister of Labour, Social Affairs and Family of the Slovak Republic, as President of this Conference. Her career has already been outlined. I would merely say that she has two qualities which I deem essential for President of the Conference — experience as Minister of Labour, Social Affairs and Family but also experience as a parliamentarian.

I am certain that Ms. Keltošová will be an excellent President of this session of the International Labour Conference. We are pleased, too, to be presided over by a representative of the Slovak Republic.

Mr. SIBANDA (Workers' delegate, Zimbabwe) — On behalf of the Workers' group, it is my signal honour and privilege to second the nomination of the Honourable Minister of Labour, Social Affairs and Family of Slovakia, Ms. Olga Keltošová. It is the Workers' group belief and trust that her experience and wisdom and the rich qualifications that have been already enumerated by the Honourable Ambassador will enable her to guide this Conference to rich and progressive conclusions. Conscious that the ILO Conference is a major event in the world of work for the workers, I second the nomination of the Honourable Minister.

Mr. BRETT (Worker Vice-Chairperson of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office) — The nomination of Ms. Olga Keltošová, Minister of Labour, Social Affairs and Family of Slovakia, has been duly proposed and seconded. In the absence of other proposals I declare Ms. Olga Keltošová President of the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference. It only remains for me to congratulate her warmly and invite her to the podium to take the presidency.

(Ms. Keltošová, Minister of Labour, Social Affairs and Family, Slovakia, is elected President of the Conference and takes the President's Chair.)

PRESIDENTIAL ADDRESS

The PRESIDENT — It is a great honour for me, for my country and for the Government of the Slovak Republic that I have been elected as President of the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference. I would like to express my gratitude to the distinguished delegates of all regional groups as well as to the representatives of Workers and Employers for their support and the trust that was bestowed upon me. I would like to thank particularly all countries of Central and Eastern European regions for their support of my candidature, which enabled the Slovak Republic to preside over this year's session of the International Labour Conference. My thanks go also to His Excellency, Ambassador Zahran, Chairperson of the Government group, as well as to Mr. Sibanda, spokesperson of the Workers' group, and to Mr. Oechslin, spokesperson of the Employers' group for their expression of support on behalf of their respective groups.

I would like to assure you that it is both in my personal interest and the interest of my Government that the outcome of this session of the International Labour Conference will be for the benefit of the Organization as well as for its member States. I will do my best to achieve progress in issues which are on the agenda. I believe that the support you have given to me so far will continue for the whole Conference, and I am convinced that your participation in the work of various committees and in the plenary debate will be guided by the spirit of consensus which is the fundamental feature of the tripartite cooperation in the ILO.

The present world, heading towards global integration, stands at the threshold of the next millennium. It may be observed that this world is getting smaller, thanks to the modern communication and media links but, paradoxically, the distance from a man to a man is not changing. Modern technologies and facilitated communications did not lead to narrowing the gaps among individuals and countries; on the contrary, they widen those gaps, which then create tensions in the social, economic and political spheres. Our task is to mitigate these tensions and find ways and means of common understanding and cooperation for the welfare of all of us. This was the reason behind all major international conferences focused on various areas of our life, from the World Summit on Environment held in Rio de Janeiro in 1992 to the Habitat II held in Istanbul in 1996.

International organizations are another forum which contribute to the search for and formulation of mutually advantageous ways of cooperation. The first of them, the International Labour Organization, was established in 1919 as a direct consequence of the suffering experienced by humankind before, and especially during, the First World War.

From its establishment the ILO developed a system of international labour standards, represented today by 180 Conventions and 187 Recommendations of a remarkable historical value. The standard-setting activities of the ILO have always been the cornerstone of its activities. They inspired the domestic, social and labour legislation in many countries and contributed to the improvement of working conditions of workers.

However, the political, economic and social situation of the world has changed substantially over the last ten years. The end of the Cold War, failure of the centrally planned economy system, employment crises affecting all countries regardless of their economic and social development, and the process of globalization are the most important examples. International relations and international cooperation reached a new quality which should also be reflected in the future standard-setting activities of the ILO.

The conclusions of the World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen in 1995 state the fact that employment is a precondition for the development of social justice. In the final Declaration countries committed themselves to include the objective of full employment as a basic priority of their economic and social policies, and they emphasized that the ILO has a special role in the employment and social development area. In the Declaration of the Ministerial Conference of the WTO in Singapore in December 1996, participating governments confirmed that the ILO is the competent organization to set labour standards and deal with them.

I mentioned just examples of support for standard-setting activities of the ILO and it is on us, the representatives of member countries, to respond to this challenge and to determine responsibly the future way so that this Organization will be able to meet the expectations placed in it.

Standard setting is closely linked to the issue of implementation and supervision of commitments undertaken. The strengthening of the control mechanism and observance of the ILO fundamental human rights Conventions are the test of the readiness of member countries to find a mutually acceptable solution and to show the outside world that all commitments and declarations from various conferences, especially the World Summit for Social Development, were adopted with full political responsibility, and the will to pursue them in the future. Regardless of the different opinions it is clear that the process of globalization and the realization of ILO goals are interconnected. Globalization must be accompanied by progress in the social sphere and the protection of workers' rights. Every State, company, multinational enterprise and individual should receive his share from the benefit of globalization, otherwise the tensions arising from this phenomenon may endanger social stability which is the basis for the good functioning of each national society and its final result, of the whole international society.

The Report of the Director-General contains a number of ideas, words of further reflection. In my opinion, it is not the role of this Conference to set up or agree on the precise definition of the future of standard setting and the control mechanism but rather to find a consensus on a future approach to these issues which then could be taken up by the ILO's Governing Body. It is not possible to deal with any issue from the legal point of view unless clear political consensus exists. I believe the discussions on the Director-General's Report will indicate possible solutions.

The ILO has identified seven Conventions as fundamental with respect to basic human rights. In this connection, let me mention that the Slovak Republic is bound by 58 ILO Conventions and responded positively to the initiative of the Director-General aimed at the universal ratification of those seven Conventions. Recently, a process of ratification of Convention No. 138 on the minimum age for admission to employment and No. 105 on the abolition of forced labour has started in the National Council of the Slovak Republic. Consequently, Slovakia will become another country which ratified all seven Conventions by the end of this year. At the end of this year, the Slovak Republic will also ratify ILO Convention No. 176 on safety and health in mines.

The important part of the agenda of this Conference is also a proposed amendment to the ILO Constitution which would provide for an option to abrogate those international labour standards deemed obsolete and not used in practice. It is good that this constitutional amendment and, consequently, the amendment of the Standing Orders of the Conference are presented for adoption as the process of setting new standards will be accompanied by the possibility to abrogate those not reflecting the actual development of labour and social relations.

A very important area of ILO activities is technical cooperation and assistance. The process of changes in standard setting should be accompanied by a new approach to technical assistance especially for developing countries and countries in transition. We need more educational activities, particularly in the labour law, social security law, employment issues and working conditions areas. Within technical assistance, it would be advisable to increase financial resources for various training activities as well as for technical consultations on drafts of national labour and social laws. Measures to support the development of small and medium-sized enterprises should be aimed especially at the establishment of organizations and programmes for support of small and medium-sized enterprises.

Creation of conditions for improvement of labour and social relations with the aim of reaching social justice is a permanent goal of the ILO. The principles formulated in the Declaration of Philadelphia more than 50 years ago are still valid in today's world under the globalization and free trade conditions. In order to deal effectively with labour and social issues, it is necessary to involve both governmental and non-governmental organizations in individual countries.

Changes in Central and Eastern European countries aimed at the democratization of social systems require the formulation of adequate economic and social policy principles. Central and Eastern European countries are in the process of transition to market economies. Parallel to the economic transformation, a special significance is also given to the social sphere transformation, which motivates and stimulates economic changes and behaviour of subjects.

Development of the social sphere in Slovakia after 1989, especially in 1993, was formulated beside the economic development by new legislative standards which significantly affected the whole social sphere. They are summarized in the document Concept of the social sphere transformation in the Slovak Republic adopted by the Government of the Slovak Republic in 1995. This document is based on the conceptual and complex reconstruction of labour, individual and collective relations, social sphere (social security) transformation, transfer of employment problems and their solution, into individual parts of the economic policy. The State guarantees the right of the citizen to a relevant income replacing the labour income if the citizen has lost his job without causing it. The transformation intentions in the employment area were expressed in the employment policy concept, including the state policy, labour market policy and employment service concept, and finally in a new Act on employment, effective from 1 January this year. This Act especially determines objectives of the employment policy corresponding to the present labour market development in Slovakia. It transfers the competence of the labour market policy implementation to the National Labour Office, which is a publicly legal institution, strengthens the insurance principle at providing unemployment benefits. Development of conceptual issues of employment policy continues in the cooperation with the Research Institute of Labour, Social Affairs and Family in putting the emphasis on the more intensive links to labour market policy. The concept of the social sphere transformation in the Slovak Republic is based on a neutral relationship between labour and social relations, synchronization of labour relations, labour incomes and social insurance, complementary pension schemes, social assistance and state social support.

In conclusion, allow me to express my gratitude to the Director-General of the International Labour Office, Mr. Michel Hansenne, and also to all members of the Governing Body of the ILO for their work and efforts at preparing this session of the International Labour Conference. I wish you a lot of success in your responsible work. I believe that this Conference will be successful and will reflect the goals, ambitions and efforts of the International Labour Organization which we all want to enforce and support.

Election of the Vice-Presidents of the Conference

The PRESIDENT — In accordance with the amendments adopted by the Conference at its 82nd Session, we shall proceed immediately to the election of the Vice-Presidents of the Conference. I call upon the Clerk of the Conference to read out the nominations made by the groups.

Original French: The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE — The following nominations have been made for Vice-Presidents of the Conference:

Government group:

Mr. Khalil (Syrian Arab Republic)

Employers' group:

Ms. Sasso Mazzufferi (Italy)

Workers' group:

Mr. Ramírez León (Venezuela)

The PRESIDENT — If there are no objections, I shall take it that the proposals are adopted.

Nomination of the Officers of the groups

The PRESIDENT — We shall now proceed to the nomination of the Officers of the groups. I call on the Clerk of the Conference to read out the nominations made by the groups.

Original French: The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE — The groups have chosen their Officers as follows:

Government group:

Chairperson: Mr. Zahran (Egypt)

Employers' group:

Chairperson: Mr. Oechslin (France)

Vice-Chairpersons: Mr. Lawson (Canada)
Mr. M'Kaissi (Tunisia)
Mr. Preti Jorquin (Guatemala)
Mr. Tabani (Pakistan)
Mr. Thüsing (Germany)

Secretary: Mr. Kapartis (International Organization of Employers)

Workers' group:

Chairperson: Mr. Brett (United Kingdom)

Vice-Chairpersons: Mr. Sánchez Madariaga (Mexico)
Mr. Tan (Philippines)
Mr. Shmakov (Russian Federation)
Mr. Sibanda (Zimbabwe)

Secretary: Mr. Ryder (International Confederation of Free Trade Unions)

The Officers of the Workers' group, other than the Chairperson and Vice-Chairpersons, are: Mr. Ahmed (Pakistan), Ms. Buverud Pedersen (Norway), Mr. El-Ghazali (Egypt), Ms. Engelen-Kefer (Germany), Mr. Gray (United States), Mr. Ito (Japan), Mr. Lawani (Benin), Ms. Rozas Velásquez (Chile).

The Officers of the Employers' group, other than the Chairperson and Vice-Chairpersons, are: Mr. De Arbeloa (Venezuela), Mr. Dahlan (Saudi Arabia), Ms. France (United Kingdom), Mr. Van Holm (Belgium), Mr. Imoisili (Nigeria), Mr. Kaswarra (Uganda), Mr. Noakes (Australia), Mr. Oechslin (France), Mr. Owuor (Kenya), Mr. Potter (United States), Mr. Prior (Czech Republic), Mr. Suzuki (Japan).

The deputy members are: Mr. Ferrer Dufol (Spain), Mr. Hoff (Norway), Mr. Majid (Malaysia), Mr. Makeka (Lesotho), Mr. Mattar (United Arab Emirates), Mr. Tan (Philippines).

The PRESIDENT — The Conference takes note of the appointments made by the groups.

CONSTITUTION AND COMPOSITION OF CONFERENCE COMMITTEES

The PRESIDENT — The next item on our agenda is the establishment of the various committees which will consider the matters before the Conference.

The Conference may wish to set up the following committees: Selection Committee, Finance Committee, Committee on the Application of Standards, Committee on the Revision of Convention No. 96, Committee on Job Creation in Small and Medium-Sized Enterprises, Committee on Contract Labour.

The Conference also has before it a proposal for the amendment of the Constitution and has to decide, under article 47, paragraph 2, of its Standing Orders, whether to consider it in full conference or refer it to a committee for report. This proposal also includes consequential amendments to the Standing Orders. Since there will be other Standing Orders questions which will have to be referred to a Standing Orders committee, the Conference may wish to decide to refer both items to a single committee and to set up for this purpose a Constitutional Amendment and Standing Orders Committee.

May I take it that these proposals are adopted?

The nominations made by the groups for the composition of these committees appear on a list which will be distributed later.

May I take it that these proposals are adopted?

SUSPENSION OF ARTICLES 4.2, 9(A) AND 56.9 OF THE STANDING ORDERS

The PRESIDENT — The next item concerns the suspension of article 4, paragraph 2, article 9(a) and article 56, paragraph 9, of the Standing Orders.

To implement the decision taken by the Governing Body at its 267th Session concerning approval of changes in the composition of committees, the President and the three Vice-Presidents of the General Conference of the International Labour Organization unanimously recommend:

(a) that the Conference delegate to the Selection Committee Authority to approve non-controversial changes in the composition of conference committees and non-controversial invitations to non-governmental international organizations to be represented at committees, and that the Conference to that extent suspend article 9(a) and article 56, paragraph 9, of the Standing Orders, in accordance with article 76 thereof;

(b) that the Conference authorize the Selection Committee to delegate the authority to approve the above-mentioned changes and invitations to its Officers and to that extent suspend article 4, paragraph 2, of the Standing Orders, in accordance with article 76 thereof.

Pursuant to article 76 of the Standing Orders, these derogations will take effect, with the agreement of the Conference, only from its next plenary sitting, which will take place this afternoon.

SUBMISSION OF THE REPORT OF THE CHAIRPERSON OF THE GOVERNING BODY TO THE CONFERENCE FOR THE YEAR 1996-97

The PRESIDENT — We shall now proceed with the submission of the report of the Chairperson of the Governing Body for the year 1996-97. I give the floor to Mr. Brett, Worker Vice-Chairperson of the Governing Body, to submit the report, which is contained in Provisional Record No. 4.

Mr. BRETT (Worker Vice-Chairperson of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office)

— On behalf of the Chairperson of the Governing Body, Mr. Arrate Mac Niven, who is not able to be with us today, as Vice-Chairperson of the Governing Body I have the honour to present this report which covers the work of the Governing Body during the past year but not matters otherwise before the Conference. I will briefly touch on the main points.

First, in monitoring follow-up on the World Summit for Social Development, the Governing Body examined progress in the work of the ACC Task Force on full employment and sustainable livelihoods, which decided to carry out country employment policy reviews on the ILO as a lead agency for this work.

The Governing Body welcomed the adoption by the Second United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II) of the Habitat agenda, and, in particular, the recognition given by the Conference to the role of the ILO in employment-related areas. It requested the Director-General to ensure that the ILO was actively involved in follow-up.

As regards the highly topical issue of child labour, the Governing Body examined a detailed report on the progress in the elimination of child labour and related international developments. In particular, it noted the signing of the Memorandum of Understanding on child labour with more than 20 member States, in the search for a long-term solution to the child labour problem. It noted the donations and total contributions pledged since 1992 and for the next five years to the International Programme on the Elimination of Child Labour (IPEC), as well as the Letter of Intent signed by the ILO and UNICEF to guide their joint efforts. The Governing Body has also requested the Director-General to report to it annually on the operational aspects of IPEC.

Through its Working Party on the Social Dimensions of the Liberalization of International Trade, the Governing Body discussed a recent OECD publication on Trade, Employment and Labour Standards, which, in particular, lent support to the ILO's role, mandate and means of action. That role was further reaffirmed at the first Ministerial Conference of the World Trade Organization in Singapore in December 1996. The Governing Body discussed developments at that meeting and noted, in particular, the many statements that were made in support of the ILO's role and welcomed the inclusion of a section on labour standards in the final Declaration adopted by the meeting, which referred to the internationally recognized fundamental labour standards. This was considered of particular significance as it represents the official point of view of the WTO as expressed by ministers of trade.

The debate on the ILO's role concentrated on two issues. The first was the improvement and strengthening of the ILO's supervisory system and normative action more generally. The role of technical cooperation in promoting core labour standards and the question of how to focus technical cooperation more effectively on such core labour standards was also stressed. The second issue was how to improve the ILO's research capacity and knowledge base. It was agreed that a more strategic approach was needed and this will be discussed further in the coming year.

You may recall that during last year's Conference a questionnaire was distributed to obtain views on current development in globalization and the liberalization of trade and their impact on social standards. This exercise met with mixed success and it was difficult to draw conclusions, but one outcome was that the Office was requested to prepare a short factual document on voluntary codes of conduct and labelling schemes for the Working Party's next meeting. It was also stressed by the Governing Body that the impact of globalization differed greatly between countries and sectors and it was desirable to develop methodology and criteria for judging objectively, on the basis of national enterprise-level data, both the extent and social impact of globalization.

Turning to international labour standards, the Governing Body reviewed progress on the ratification and promotion of the ILO's fundamental Conventions and considered further papers on the strengthening of the ILO's supervisory procedures. These set out a catalogue of possible methods and opened debate on the specific standards concerned, namely, those on discrimination in employment and occupation and forced labour, including child labour.

As regards the revision of standards, the Governing Body continued its examination of the needs for the revision of Conventions and this work will continue in the coming year. On the question of abrogation or termination, you will note that a set of amendments to the Constitution and Standing Orders of the Governing Body and the Conference are before the Conference at the present session.

As regards the complaint on non-observance by Myanmar of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), which was made by delegates to last year's Conference under article 26 of the Constitution of the ILO, the Governing Body has referred that complaint to a Commission of Inquiry.

The Governing Body reviewed progress in the implementation of the active partnership policy, ILO technical cooperation activities and the ILO strategy of technical cooperation during the previous year. It noted the stabilization of the resources situation and requested the Office to prepare proposals for an innovative strategy to enhance the resources available to the technical cooperation programme. This will be examined in the coming year. The Governing Body has decided to conduct an internal evaluation of the active partnership policy and a working party will meet three times in the coming year and will visit various regions before adopting its findings.

The Governing Body also reviewed strategies to enhance women's employment and income opportunities in the light of experience from technical cooperation. The Governing Body included on the agenda for the 1999 Session of the Conference a general discussion on the role of the ILO in technical cooperation, as well as an item on the revision of the Maternity Protection Convention and Recommendation.

The Governing Body evaluated practical experiences with the new sectoral meetings format, drawing conclusions on the desirable size of meetings and the level of participation and the structure of panel discussions, as well as on various other minor aspects.

The Governing Body also undertook an assessment of the reforms in the functioning of the International Labour Conference. It decided that all the measures applied in 1996 should be continued at the present session. It also discussed various proposals concerning possible changes in the manner of selecting items for future sessions of the Conference.

Finally, many of you will have noticed that the Governing Body now has a presence on the Internet on the ILO's site. This is an important innovation designed to improve access to documents and information and to accelerate the distribution of documents to members of the Governing Body.

Before concluding I would like to offer my sincere thanks to my two fellow Officers, Mr. Jorge Arrate Mac Niven, the Chairperson of the Governing Body, who will be joining us next week, and Mr. Jean-Jacques Oechslin, Employer Vice-Chairperson of the Governing Body, for both their friendship and cooperation over the past year and I should also like to thank the Director-General and his staff for their constant support and assistance.

Finally, Madam President, allow me to congratulate you on your election and to wish you every success in your work and in the work of the Conference.

STATEMENT BY MR. MICHEL HANSENNE, DIRECTOR-GENERAL OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR OFFICE

The PRESIDENT — I now give the floor to the Director-General to address the Conference concerning his Report.

Original French: The DIRECTOR-GENERAL — You will remember that last year we experienced a few incidents when we discussed and adopted the Home Work Convention. Following those incidents I suggested that the time had now come to take a new look at the ILO's standard-setting function, and I indicated that that would be the theme of my Report to the Conference in 1997. For the ILO's standard-setting function has always been — and, to my mind, still is — the very backbone of the International Labour Organization. It is standard setting that underlies and imbues all our activities and it is the ILO's standards that will determine the place that the Organization occupies in the coming century, because it is through them that the ILO can make its most valuable contribution to a world economic system based on the liberalization of trade and genuine multilateralism. Unless that function is strengthened, the promises of progress in the world economy are liable to be jeopardized or to remain a dead letter for all too many workers.

Strengthening the ILO's standard-setting function is not just a matter for the Director-General or for a few specialists. That task is the responsibility of the International Labour Conference, for what other body within the United Nations system could claim to be as representative as your Assembly, combining as it does universality and tripartism.

The second part of my Report contains a set of specific proposals for improving the ILO's output of labour standards and for ensuring that its instruments meet the needs of our constituents and have a verifiable impact on our efforts to further our objectives of social progress. The proposals are my response to the analyses that have been made — some of them a long time ago — by my predecessors, as well as to the requests and criticisms that have been voiced on a number of occasions by constituents. In order to take the debate a step further we have endeavoured to look at the standard-setting process as a whole so as to take into account the interplay of cause and effect and thus to come up with a set of proposals that are both coherent and viable. I trust that this approach will win the support of the Conference so that the Governing Body can then examine in greater detail each of the ideas put forward.

I also feel that the time has now come to sum up the three years of debate that have taken place in the Governing Body and its various committees on what we agreed to call the social dimension of the liberalization of trade, and to draw a few conclusions.

On this score we have received two important messages: first of all, that of the World Summit for Social Development held in Copenhagen in 1995, and then, more recently, that of the ministers of trade meeting at the first WTO Ministerial Conference in Singapore. Their final declaration renews the commitment of member States to observe internationally recognized fundamental labour standards. It stresses that economic growth fostered by increased trade works towards promoting them, it rejects their use for protectionist purposes, and it clearly recalls the ILO's major role in defining and implementing such standards. It is certainly not my role to interpret what this declaration means for the WTO — I would simply reiterate to the Director-General of the WTO, who has been kind enough to join us today, that the ILO is entirely open to the idea of continuing to cooperate, as it has been invited to do.

We must take these clear and repeated invitations in a serious spirit and draw all the appropriate conclusions. I am not in any way talking about modifications to the mandate of our Organization, but rather of enabling it to carry out that mandate fully so as to achieve its objectives and live up to the expectations placed in it.

The first part of my Report accordingly reviews a number of proposals which have already been extensively discussed by the Governing Body and which have provided us with pointers to a solution that might be acceptable to all the interested parties. I refer of course to the idea that the ILO adopt a solemn declaration reaffirming the universal respect of all its Members for fundamental workers' rights, whether or not the relevant Conventions have been ratified. I want to make it quite clear that the idea behind such a declaration is not that it should impose obligations on member States to which they have not subscribed, but simply that they renew their commitment to certain essential principles that are inherent in the ILO's values and which they accepted when they became Members of the Organization. I therefore sincerely hope that, after a thorough discussion of this vital issue, the Conference will endorse the approach that we have taken so that it may be called upon as early as 1998, the year of the fiftieth anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, to enshrine its conclusions in a solemn declaration.

Before I end, allow me to say a few words about an idea that has given rise to considerable comment and very different interpretations, which are of course always very interesting. But some of these thoughts are quite the opposite of what I had intended. I am referring of course to the "overall social label".

Whether we like it or not, the unilateral initiatives that my Report refers to already exist and they are multiplying. Generous though the principles behind them may be, the fact is that they may lack transparency in their implementation and prove hazardous in their effects. The proposal that I am making, therefore, is aimed at strengthening the multilateral and voluntary framework constituted by the ILO, in which countries — and especially developing countries — are not just pawns in a game, but active partners whose voices and interests are properly taken into consideration.

It is up to these countries to say whether they want a system such as this, and if so, to help decide what form it should take — something which remains to be discussed and elaborated. I must emphasize that a system of this kind bears absolutely no relation to a social clause. Unlike the social clause, which subordinates the free circulation of goods and services — and hence their access to national markets — to the observance of certain social standards, it is designed solely to provide information without introducing any manner of restriction or curtailing anybody's freedom of action.

For all that, it must be made quite clear that this is bound to be a very long process and that we are not suggesting any ready-made solutions. While I feel that it is essential that the ILO be involved in a debate which is of such capital importance for the future of multilateralism, it is equally important that this consideration does not distract your attention from other concrete proposals which require more immediate action.

These are the few thoughts that I wanted to share with you today. I trust that your discussions will be fruitful and that the Conference will be a success.

(The Conference adjourned at 12 noon.)

FIRST REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT — The first item on our agenda this afternoon is the first report of the Selection Committee. I give the floor to Ms. Sarmiento, Government adviser, Philippines, and Chairperson of the Committee, to submit the report.

Ms. SARMIENTO (Government adviser, Philippines; Chairperson of the Selection Committee) — I have the honour to submit to the Conference the first report of the Selection Committee (Provisional Record No. 6). This report is not complete. An addendum will be issued tomorrow giving the full lists of the membership of the committees.

As regards the reports of the Chairperson of the Governing Body and of the Director-General, the Selection Committee decided to begin the general discussion next Tuesday, 10 June, at 10 a.m. The Committee also decided that the list of speakers should be closed next Wednesday, 11 June, at 6 p.m. under the usual conditions.

The Committee endorsed a general plan of work for the Conference committees which, although not binding, will enable the committees to organize their work so as to take the maximum possible account of the overall needs and possibilities of the Conference. This plan of work is appended to this report as Appendix 2.

I should like to call the attention of the members of the Conference to the suggestions in the report concerning the quorum, punctuality and negotiations in committees, all of which are designed to ensure the smooth working of the Conference.

As regards participation in Conference committees by members who have lost the right to vote, the Selection Committee recommends to the Conference that the practice followed in the past years by Government members of not applying for regular membership of committees if they are not at the time entitled to vote should be continued.

The Selection Committee also recommends to the Conference that, should this practice for any reason not be fully respected, the calculation of rating coefficients for votes in committees would be based on the number of regular Government members entitled to vote. The electronic voting system takes account of this practice.

The Selection Committee recommends that the Conference authorize the Secretary-General to invite the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, a non-member State, to be represented at the present session of the Conference in accordance with article 2, paragraph 3(e), of the Conference Standing Orders.

In another recommendation the Committee proposes that certain non-governmental international organizations should be invited to be represented in some of the committees.

The Selection Committee has made proposals regarding the appointment of the Credentials Committee, as follows: Government member, Mr. Salmenpera (Finland); Employer member, Mr. Funes de Rioja (Argentina); Worker member, Mr. Gray (United States).

The Selection Committee has also made proposals regarding the appointment of the Drafting Committee of the Conference.

At its first sitting this morning the Conference had before it proposals by the Officers to suspend certain articles of the Standing Orders of the Conference so as to delegate to the Selection Committee the authority to approve non-controversial requests for representation in Conference committees submitted by non-governmental international organizations, and also to authorize the Selection Committee to delegate such authority to its Officers.

Subject to the adoption by the Conference of this recommendation at the present sitting, the Selection Committee has delegated to its Officers the authority to approve non-controversial changes in the composition of committees and non-controversial requests for representation in Conference committees submitted by non-governmental international organizations.

I commend the report to the Conference for adoption.

The PRESIDENT — May I take it that the Conference adopts the report?

DEROGATIONS FROM THE STANDING ORDERS OF THE CONFERENCE

The PRESIDENT — The second item on our agenda concerns the derogations from the Standing Orders of the Conference. You will recall that at this morning's sitting I communicated to you the recommendations unanimously adopted by the Officers of the Conference that article 4, paragraph 2, article 9(a) and article 56, paragraph 9, of the Standing Orders be suspended in order to implement the decision of the Governing Body that the power to approve non-controversial changes in the composition of committees should be delegated to the Selection Committee. In accordance with article 76 of the Standing Orders a decision on such a proposal may not be taken until the sitting following that at which it was submitted to the Conference.

The Conference is now called upon to adopt the proposal to suspend article 4, paragraph 2, article 9(a) and article 56, paragraph 9, of its Standing Orders.

If there are no objections, I shall take it that this proposal is adopted.

(The proposal is adopted.)

REPORT OF THE OFFICERS OF THE CONFERENCE

The PRESIDENT — The third item on our agenda is the report of the Officers of the Conference.

The decisions taken by the Governing Body to make savings at the International Labour Conference with respect to the length of speeches and the publication of the Provisional Record can be applied to the present session of the Conference only by derogation from or suspension of the Standing Orders. That is why, in keeping with article 76 of the Standing Orders, the Officers of the Conference unanimously propose the necessary derogations on the understanding that these will take effect with the agreement of the Conference only from its next plenary session.

The fact that the next plenary session will not be held before 10 June implies that the everyday tasks of organization of the Conference will be carried out by the Officers of the Conference if the Conference wishes to confer the necessary powers on it. For this reason it is also proposed that we confer the necessary powers on the Officers of the Conference until the next plenary session.

Are there any objections to this? I see no objections. I therefore submit for your approval the derogations which I call upon the Clerk of the Conference to read out.

The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE — The draft decision regarding the suspension of articles 14.6 and 23 of the Standing Orders reads as follows:

> To implement the programme and budget adjustments adopted by the Governing Body at its 264th Session, the President and the three Vice-Presidents of the General Conference of the International Labour Organization unanimously recommend:
>
> (a) that a normal time-limit for speeches in plenary of ten minutes specified in paragraph 6 of article 14 of the Standing Orders of the Conference be set at five minutes and that the said paragraph be to that extent suspended in accordance with article 76 of the Standing Orders;
>
> (b) that the issues of the Record of Proceedings covering the discussion of the reports of the Chairperson of the Governing Body and the Director-General be printed after the conclusion of the Conference and then dispatched to delegations under arrangements approved by the President and Vice-Presidents which shall, in particular, give participants the opportunity to provide the Conference secretariat with a text of their speeches as delivered; and that article 23 of the Standing Orders of the Conference be suspended in accordance with article 76 mentioned above to the extent necessary to permit the implementation of those arrangements.

The second decision, which concerns the delegation of authority to the Officers, reads as follows:

> 1. The General Conference of the International Labour Organization hereby delegates to its President and three Vice-Presidents authority to take any decisions or to perform any functions within the power of the Conference with respect to any matter that needs to be dealt with before the Conference resumes its plenary sittings, unless any of the aforesaid Officers considers that the Conference should hold a sitting to discuss such matters.
>
> 2. Decisions taken under this authority shall be announced in a special issue of the Record of Proceedings of the Conference.
>
> 3. This delegation of authority shall take effect on Wednesday, 4 June 1997, at 10 a.m. and shall terminate as soon as the Conference resumes its plenary sittings.

The PRESIDENT — If there are no observations or objections, I shall take it that the report is adopted.

PRELIMINARY DEBATE ON THE DRAFT PROGRAMME AND BUDGET FOR 1998-99

The PRESIDENT — The next item on our agenda is the preliminary discussion of the draft Programme and Budget for 1998-99.

Mr. GRAY (Workers' delegate, United States) — I would like to congratulate you on your election to this important post and wish you every success in the difficult task that I know lies ahead of you. As Worker Vice-Chairperson of the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee of the Governing Body, it falls to me to make some preliminary remarks on the proposals for the 1998-99 Programme and Budget for the Conference. The proposals presented by the Governing Body are the result of a more detailed process of consultation and extensive debate than has been the case in the past. An extra discussion was held in November of last year and was helpful in allowing the Governing Body to exercise real choice in the selection of programme items. This did not, however, make the final decision-making process in March an easy one. That debate remains fresh in the memory and the most lasting impression is that as much time was spent discussing questions of procedure and presentation as substance. I would not hide from the Conference that this fact was sometimes a cause of regret and frustration to my group, but this was tempered by the understanding that we were concerned that our Government colleagues in particular should have the fullest possible information and insight into the programme and budget. We took the view that the ILO secretariat responded most commendably to the insistent requests put to them for supplementary information. Those efforts are reflected in the material before the Conference. The Workers' group in the Governing Body was in agreement that this information should be made available to this Conference, on the understanding shared by the other groups that it should not serve as a pretext for reopening of subsequent debate on programme content.

I will make some brief comments on the level of the budget and on the substance of the programme proposals making clear at the outset that the Workers' group endorses both and urges their adoption. They represent the usual tripartite compromise from which nobody emerges jubilantly, but which addresses the interest of each party in roughly equal measure. It will come as no surprise to the Conference that the Workers' group can express no satisfaction at the substantial real cuts contained in the proposals before us. We have been strongly critical of this zero real growth path on which the ILO has been set for as long as most of us can remember. So we cannot but be critical too of the outcome of the process in which initial real reduction of 3.75 per cent proposed by the Director-General was compounded by a further cut of just over 2 per cent from the deletion of the provisions for inflationary increases. Our group could not escape the impression that the Office was made to suffer for the modesty of the provision made for inflation in its proposals. Nevertheless, what we do not like, we are ready to accept and we expect others to support the debates in a similar spirit.

As regards the content of the programme proposals, the major point of dissatisfaction on the Workers' side was the approach to enterprises and the role it played within the overall employment priority. Unfortunately, the concerns we express in this regard went largely unmet. It continues to be unacceptable to the Workers' group that the ILO enterprise-related activities are oriented very heavily towards an employer's interest, with little attention being given to legitimate trade union interest. Nor can it be right that in this globalizing world the ILO spends 50 times as much on enterprise development as it devotes to the activities of multinationals. We want to see a genuinely tripartite ILO policy on enterprises. We have a long way to go to get this achieved.

One other notable feature of the programme and budget proposals is the continuing flow of resources to the field in the framework of the active partnership policy. The Workers' group has no problem with this trend as such, although it can certainly go on, it cannot go on indefinitely. But we do want to have a better idea of the uses to which this increasing proportion of funds at the ILO's disposal are being put. And that is why we attach a great deal of importance to the evaluation of the active partnership programme on which the Office is now embarking.

No doubt, there will be differing appreciations between the different groups of the specific programme items. But I believe that we are all in agreement that the value of the totality of the proposals before us will have to be judged in terms of their success in addressing the crucial issues facing the world of work today. The most significant of these have to do with globalization. The challenge of the ILO is that it puts social justice and defence of its workers' fundamental rights right at the heart of the process. The issues involved cannot be avoided just because they are controversial. The proposal before us offers the ILO the scope to tackle them effectively, but first there must be the necessary political will to see that this is realized. It is a sincere hope for the Workers' group that the Conference will endorse the programme and budget recommended for adoption by the Governing Body and at the same time demonstrate the political commitment that can ensure that its implementation will contribute seriously and importantly to bettering the lives of the working people whom we are here to serve.

Original French: Mr. OECHSLIN (Employers' delegate, France) — Madam President, I would like to congratulate you on your election. I have come up to this rostrum in order to state the support of the Employers' group for the proposed forthcoming budget as submitted to the Conference. In doing so, perhaps I will focus more on the programme than on the budget aspect.The programme, as my colleague, Mr. Gray, has said, is a compromise. I would really rather call it a balance between the needs of the various constituents of the Organization — the Government, the Employers and the Workers.

Of course, we have to find the appropriate resources to cover the expenditure for these programmes and I do, obviously, understand the concern expressed by Government members who are trying to limit the expenditure of the Organization. We are certainly not hostile to the concept of savings as long as this balance between the various needs on all sides can be maintained. Having said that, I would like to make a few brief comments concerning some of the items of the programme and budget which seem to me to be particularly interesting.

I would like to start off with the points which are covered in the chapter concerning the promotion of democracy and confirm the importance we attached to basic workers' rights in follow-up to the Copenhagen Summit and the Singapore Conference. Basically this means the promotion of principles contained in the seven fundamental Conventions with which you are all familiar.

We also believe that we can support the general orientations concerning the renewal of the standard-setting activities. We have an opportunity during this session of the Conference to express our views on this point in the context of the discussion on the Director-General's Report but I wanted to point out, looking forward to the next Conference, that the Employers' group and the employers in general are interested in combating child labour.

I would like to highlight the importance of activities concerning support for employers' and workers' organizations. This is a very specific responsibility of the ILO and I think that it has to be further enhanced. I cannot but comment on the continuing discrepancy between the means and resources on both sides.

I would also like to emphasize the importance of the programme for the promotion of employment and combating poverty by the creation of jobs. Within this programme, the importance of the problem of enterprises as job-creating sources is of great concern. In the preliminary discussions we ask for a consistent and integrated programme on this point. What is in the programme seems to us to be rather inadequate and so our point of view does differ from Mr. Gray's, but democracy is, of course, based on differences of opinion. We are thinking in particular about the importance of the programme of action for the development of small and medium-sized enterprises, which is contained within this context of questions on the agenda at this session as well as at the following session of the Conference. This programme basically depends on external funding and I hope that the major organizations, the donor organizations and governments will make it possible for us to set up this programme in a very specific manner.

I would like to say a few words about the resources available to the ILO. These resources are basically people and I would like to emphasize the importance of the professional skills of men and women who devote their active life to the ILO.

I would also like us to think to a greater extent about matching up our programmes with reality. We have financial supervision; this is effective, but what is lacking is an analysis of specific results, that is, an analysis of the impact of ILO programmes on reality and in the field. One of the means of seeking such a matching-up operation is to make sure that the Committee on Technical Cooperation of the Governing Body has greater powers so that it can go into the field and examine the specific results of our operations. I think, as the Director-General has said in his Report, that the ILO must get closer and closer to its constituents and certainly one of the main means of doing this is to harness the experience of the multidisciplinary teams, which we believe is satisfactory, taken globally. The sectoral activities which we carry out make it possible for the ILO to be in close contact with the realities of the various industrial sectors. I would like to add that the strengthening of activities in the regions should not be carried out to the detriment of professional skills in the technical services at headquarters.

Finally, I would like to emphasize the interest which we have in the aspect of forums. We believe that the Enterprise Forum was successful — it could further be improved — and the two fora which are provided for in the budget will make it possible for the ILO to open up to a greater extent to the outside.

In conclusion, I would say that of course it is not the exact programme and budget that the Employers would have wished, and Mr. Gray has said that neither was it exactly what the Workers wanted, and perhaps each Government would adopt a slightly different approach, depending on its needs, but I think that after the thorough discussions which took place in the Governing Body, it is a reasonable budget, a balanced budget and I therefore recommend that you adopt it when it comes before the Conference. Thank you.

RATIFICATION OF CONVENTIONS BY NEPAL, TRINIDAD AND TOBAGO AND BOTSWANA

The PRESIDENT — I give the floor to the Clerk of the Conference to make an announcement regarding the ratification of Conventions.

The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE — I have the pleasure in announcing to the Conference that the Director-General of the ILO has registered the ratification by Nepal of the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138), and the ratification by Trinidad and Tobago of the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100). The Director-General of the ILO has also registered the ratification by Botswana of the following Conventions: Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), Protection of Wages Convention, 1949 (No. 95), Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100), Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105), Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138), Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144), Protection of Workers' Claims (Employer's Insolvency) Convention, 1992 (No. 173), and Safety and Health in Mines Convention, 1995 (No. 176). This brings the total number of ratifications of international labour Conventions to 6,431.

FIRST REPORT OF THE CREDENTIALS COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND NOTING

The PRESIDENT — The second item on our agenda is the first report of the Credentials Committee (Provisional Record No. 7A). I give the floor to Mr. Salmenperä, Government delegate of Finland and Chairperson of the Committee, to submit the report to the Conference.

Mr. SALMENPERÄ (Government delegate, Finland; Chairperson of the Credentials Committee) — I have the honour to present to this Conference the First report of the Credentials Committee, which is to be found in Provisional Record No. 7A.

As this report shows, the Credentials Committee has taken up its responsibility of determining the quorum for voting in the plenary sittings of the Conference. The report and its annex cover in particular the registration of delegates and advisers and entitlement to vote. The figures given were those that applied last Thursday when the report was adopted. They are of course being continually updated.

In line with the resolution adopted by the Conference in 1981, the report also monitors progress in the participation of women in the Conference. The percentage in paragraph 8 appears disappointing as it is lower than last year's, if account is taken of the proportion of women among the total number of delegates and advisers. This is due to an increase in the number of advisers, and the proportion of women among delegates is in fact higher than last year.

This year there were three cases in which questions of recognition under international law were raised. The Committee's conclusions are set out in paragraph 4 of the report. The Committee has so far received ten objections to the nominations of delegates and advisers; its conclusions will be the subject of separate reports.

Finally, like previous reports the present one stresses in paragraphs 15 and 16 the constitutional obligations of member States concerning the nomination of complete tripartite delegations and the payment of the travel and subsistence expenses of the members of the delegations.

In accordance with the Standing Orders this report needs only to be noted by the Conference.

The PRESIDENT — Since the report was adopted unanimously by the Credentials Committee, I invite the Conference to take note of it as recommended in paragraph 21 of the report.

(The report is noted.)

SECOND REPORT OF THE CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT AND STANDING ORDERS COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION, DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT — The third item on our agenda is the second report of the Constitutional Amendment and Standing Orders Committee (Provisional Record No. 9). I give the floor to Mr. Shinguadja, Government delegate of Namibia and Chairperson and Reporter of the Committee, to submit the Committee's report.

Mr. SHINGUADJA (Government delegate, Namibia; Chairperson and Reporter of the Credentials Committee) — The Committee of which I was elected Chairman and Reporter has prepared two reports for the Conference. We were entrusted with two separate tasks, and the report before you today is in fact our second report; the Conference is being invited to consider it first because it includes a proposal which, if approved, will become immediately applicable and simplify the work of the Conference at its present session. The Committee's first report, which deals with a constitutional amendment that has to be adopted by a record vote of the Conference, will be presented next week.

The report before you today, and which you will find in Provisional Record No. 9, contains proposed amendments to the Conference Standing Orders on three distinct issues. The first concerns the means of ensuring that governments respect the provisions of article 13, paragraph 2(a), of the ILO Constitution which requires them to pay the travel and subsistence expenses of the tripartite delegations. Experience has shown that not all governments fulfil that obligation. The Credentials Committee has frequently received complaints that these expenses have not yet been paid but has been unable to examine them because it has no mandate to do so. The proposed amendment is designed to give the Credentials Committee such a mandate. This mandate is carefully worded; it seeks to ensure respect for the constitutional requirement to appoint and pay the expenses of four delegates but does not go so far as to dissuade governments from appointing advisers through fear of a complaint being lodged with the Credentials Committee. It therefore empowers the Committee to consider complaints that a member State has failed to pay the expenses of one or more of these four delegates, or that there is a serious and manifest imbalance between the number of Employers' or Workers' advisers whose expenses have been covered and the number of Government advisers. Any conclusion reached by the Credentials Committee on a matter of this kind will be included in its report to the Conference.

The second proposed amendment is a result of the shorter length of the Conference. At present, objections to the credentials of delegates or advisers must be submitted within 72 hours of the first publication of their names in the list of delegations — the provisional list, the revised list and the final list. However, with the shortening of the Conference, the Credentials Committee no longer has time to examine objections submitted 72 hours after the publication of the second and final lists. The proposal therefore is that, while retaining the 72 hour time-limit for the first list, the deadline be reduced to 48 hours for objections to the credentials of names published in the revised and final list.

The third amendment is designed to relieve the Conference of the need to hold a record vote in situations where it is a mere formality that could well be dispensed with. Virtually every year the Conference decides by record vote to restore the right to vote of a member State which has lost it by falling into arrears with its contributions. This decision is usually accompanied by an arrangement in which the State undertakes to pay off its arrears by annual instalments. It retains the right to vote as long as it pays its annual contributions and the instalments of its arrears each year. If it fails to do so by 31 December it loses the right to vote. It is not unusual for the State to fail to meet that deadline but to catch up with its payment before the next session of the Conference. It then has to apply again for the right to vote to be restored, and another record vote is necessary. The objective of the amendment is therefore to dispense with the need for this record vote by providing that a State may vote if at the time the vote is taken it has paid all the contributions and instalments which were due by the end of the previous year. A State which has not paid all these contributions and instalments by the end of the Conference session will completely lose the right to vote; even if it subsequently catches up on its payments, it will still have to apply to the next session of the Conference to have its right to vote restored.

These three amendments were carefully prepared by the Governing Body where they were adopted by consensus. They were also unanimously approved by the Committee, and I have no hesitation therefore in recommending them to the Conference for adoption.

The PRESIDENT — The report is now open for discussion.

Original Spanish: Mr. DUCREUX (Government delegate, Panama) — The delegation of Panama is very pleased with the way that the Chairperson has conducted the work of this Committee and urges all the members of this august assembly to support the amendments proposed.

Ms. ABOU HAMAD (Government adviser, Lebanon) — I should like to ask for some clarification. In the case of governments failing to pay the expenses of the tripartite delegates of the Conference, on what basis does the Credentials Committee reach its conclusions?

The PRESIDENT — I call on the Legal Adviser to give you an answer.

Original French: The LEGAL ADVISER — As indicated in the report, the objective of this amendment is quite simply to give the Credentials Committee a mandate, which it does not have at present, to examine complaints that a State has not, as required by the Constitution, paid for delegates' or advisers' expenses. The amendment proposed would enable the Credentials Committee to examine in what way a State might have failed to fulfil this obligation, and also enable the government concerned to explain its views. The Credentials Committee would thus have all the information in its possession and, after examining the complaint and the reply by the government, would report back to the Conference, informing it of its conclusions in accordance with the criteria set out in the proposed amendment to the Standing Orders.

The PRESIDENT — If there are no further comments, we shall proceed to the adoption of the report. May I take it that the Conference adopts the amendments proposed in paragraph 5 of the report concerning articles 5 and 26 of the Standing Orders?

(The amendments are adopted.)

May I also take it that the Conference adopts the amendment to article 26, paragraph 4(a), of the Standing Orders proposed in paragraph 8 of the report?

(The amendment is adopted.)

May I take it that the Conference adopts the amendment proposed in paragraph 14 of the report concerning article 32, paragraph 2, of the Standing Orders?

(The amendment is adopted.)

May I therefore take it that the Conference adopts the report as a whole?

(The report as a whole is adopted.)

In principle, amendments to the Conference Standing Orders come into force on their adoption by the Conference. The effect of one of the amendments just adopted, the amendment to article 32, paragraph 2, of the Standing Orders, is to permit a Member to vote if, at the time of the vote concerned, it has fully paid the contributions to the budget and instalments on consolidated arrears due by the end of the previous year. One Member, Paraguay, is in this position. I take it that the Conference agrees that, since the amendment has only beneficial effects, it can be applied immediately to Paraguay which can now be considered as permitted to vote.

I would like to thank the Chairperson, the Vice-Chairpersons and all the other members of the Committee for the excellent work they have done.

REPORTS OF THE CHAIRPERSON OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION

The PRESIDENT — The next item on the agenda is the discussion of the reports of the Chairperson of the Governing Body and of the Director-General. Before initiating the discussion on the Report of the Director-General, I should like to make the following statement on behalf of the Officers of the Conference.

This statement refers to the way in which we intend to discharge our duties and I am making it on behalf of all the Officers of the Conference in order to remind you of the principles which we propose to apply in guiding this discussion. These principles will be applied with the greatest possible uniformity to all speeches made by any speaker in the Conference. The principles by which we shall be guided were first established by the Working Party on the Programme and Structure of the ILO and approved by the Governing Body and communicated to the Conference in 1967. They are set out in paragraphs 54 to 58 of its Report which are reproduced in the Memorandum on the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference, a copy of which you should all now have. It is incumbent upon the Officers of the Conference to draw the attention of all delegates to the contents of paragraph 58, which reads as follows: "In periods of acute political tension the ILO has a twofold responsibility — to uphold the values of human freedom and dignity enshrined in its Constitution, and to circumscribe rather than extend the area of international tension by ensuring the fullest possible degree of continued cooperation enforced on the objectives of the ILO."

Every delegate to the International Labour Conference therefore has an obligation to the Conference to keep these considerations constantly in mind, and the President has an obligation to ensure that the Conference does not lose sight of them.

In the discharge of my duty, I draw the Conference's attention to these principles. In full agreement with my fellow Officers and on behalf of all of you, I urge all delegates to collaborate with us in applying these principles. In particular, we hope that every delegate will recognize that the Officers of the Conference are responsible for ensuring that these principles are observed. My colleagues and myself are determined to carry out this responsibility.

Freedom of expression is a vital feature of the International Labour Organization. However, in order to exercise this right in a spirit of mutual respect, we all have to accept a certain amount of discipline if we want our work to be carried on in an appropriate way and be crowned with success. It is the duty of the President of the sitting to ensure that these principles are respected, and the Officers of the Conference will not hesitate to intervene in this connection. In particular if there are offensive or insulting remarks made about any Head of State or Government or if personal insults are directed at any other delegate, the President will intervene immediately.

At the Conference all delegates should use parliamentary language and respect the accepted procedure, refer only to the items and the discussion and avoid raising any question alien to these matters.

It is important that every delegate who wishes to make a reply to a statement should refrain from asking for the floor by raising a point of order. What he should do is to inform the President of the sitting before the sitting finishes that he wishes to exercise his right to reply. A request for a right of reply should be addressed to the Officers during the sitting in which the government or delegation considers that it should exercise its right to reply. This request should be transmitted to the President through the Clerk and not through asking for the floor at the sitting.

I wish to refer to the practice with regard to the exercise of the right to reply. The reply should refer only to the point under debate. It should be brief, not exceed two minutes, and should not give rise to any further remarks. Lastly, it should be couched in correct and parliamentary language. Furthermore, I wish to point out that in order to avoid endless debates it has been a practice of the President to refuse to allow replies to a reply.

I also wish to draw your attention to the recommendations submitted by the Selection Committee concerning the reduction of the time-limit for speeches of delegates participating in the discussion of the reports of the Chairperson of the Governing Body and of the Director-General. This recommendation to reduce the duration of speeches by half, limiting them to five minutes only, was formally submitted to the Conference again this year for decision following consultation with the Vice-Presidents. I therefore invite all delegates to concentrate their remarks on those reports alone. The time available to the Conference for the examination of each agenda being very short, it is imperative that these provisions be strictly respected. All delegates and ministers attending the Conference will no doubt wish to take this limit of five minutes into account in preparing their remarks so that the President will not be obliged to withdraw the right to speak from a speaker before he has finished his speech.

May I remind you that, in accordance with the established practice, the Officers and President organize the general discussion? In particular, it is up to the President to ensure respect for the principles and provisions of the Standing Orders to which I have just referred.

With your help and collaboration we shall fully discharge all the responsibilities conferred upon us with a view to ensuring the proper conduct and success of the Conference. We thank you in advance for your understanding.

Original French: Mr. BOUSSAT (Employers' adviser, France) — On behalf of the French Employers allow me, Madam President, to express our satisfaction to see the discussion begin under your authority and your competent leadership. Being one of the first speakers to take the floor I am going to go through our concerns in rough order within the framework of the five minutes I have. I will refer to the second part of the Report of the Director-General and say that we, the French Employers, are in favour of restoring the balance of the standard-setting instruments. Why? First, the ILO instruments are numerous, often complex; they have been developed over the decades; some overlap; others are no longer appropriate.

Furthermore, globalization has led to national situations which are very diverse when facing up to economic and social development. Technological change is rapid, far-reaching and permanent. There is therefore a certain contradiction today between regulatory practices and the development process related to globalization.

Against this background we require more inciting instruments before we arrive at more restrictive instruments that often act as a deterrent when it comes to ratification. There are many of us in the assembly that deplore that aspect. We must therefore avoid setting standards prematurely in some, either new or rapidly developing areas. This may stand in the way of development and hence, employment.

We therefore support the questions raised by the Director-General. First, a better choice of subjects; secondly, choosing the time when a subject calls for effective action; thirdly, reactivating the autonomous status of Recommendations which we have lost sight of over the years. One clarification is called for here — as we see it, we are not talking about calling into question the standard-setting policy. We are talking about choosing, at a given point in time, the instrument that is most appropriate when it comes to dealing with the major changes taking place everywhere.

Fourthly, the questionnaire, this is not a minor point. It reveals, like I said already two years ago, a method of consultation which is too rigid. Leaving little room for national realities and diversities to be expressed themselves. There is no provision for national consultation, which really crowns it all in a tripartite organization. As the Director-General has said, it anticipates future instruments too much, leading to numerous misunderstandings and particularly to insufficient consultations, rendering these less credible amongst the people that should adhere to them. We should therefore involve the local protagonists in a different way.

To sum up, in a world which is increasingly developing education, training and culture today, partly due to new information technologies, we require instruments that will serve as an encouragement which make people responsible before they serve as constraints. In this way it will better take into account the new thinking of wage-earners in our various States.

I would now like to refer to the first part of the Report of the Director-General. Allow me to take this opportunity to point out that in France the social partners, jointly, made a contribution which was submitted to our Government for the Singapore Conference.

These are the main points that were contained in this contribution. It recommended the application of fundamental social standards. It reaffirmed the fact that the respect of these standards is not aimed at calling into question comparative advantages of countries, nor justifying the recourse to restrictive trading practices. It stressed the role of the ILO on this issue. Finally, it pointed out that liberalization of trade is not an end in itself, and one of its objectives is to improve employment conditions. This last point is often overlooked. The President of the French Republic, furthermore, mentioned these points when he addressed you last year.

Having reminded you of these points we take note of the proposals of the Director-General, in particular with regard to the social label. We would like to specify that these proposals must be examined, criticized objectively with an eye to a pragmatic approach to the diverse national situations, to their sectors of activity, their enterprises, their size, whether small or large.

The accompanying role of the ILO can be crucial here, but once again there is a main major risk of incoherent standard setting. The Report refers to initiatives being developed in enterprises, in particular using codes of good conduct, and in a number of NGOs. This does not necessarily justify a standard-setting instrument, even a more flexible one. However, it is up to the actors in each country to deal with the situations and to respond through dialogue with those responsible for the initiatives. Furthermore, why not, wherever possible in a given country, encourage the two actors, employers and workers, to take initiatives within their own field of action, i.e. the economic and social field. These initiatives progressively and methodically lead to the implementation of fundamental social rights, taking into account the economic, social and cultural realities of the given country (in the context of education, training and apprenticeship, which are essential). All this is fundamental and very important with regard to the debate on child labour.

The ILO will follow and accompany such steps. In some countries the social partners could play a fundamental role which could lead to a national approach that would really be truly tripartite. They could thus create a progressive dynamic which would mobilize all levels of the economic life in the countries concerned, more rapidly than a global social Convention. This realism would require appropriate follow up and monitoring by the ILO. This approach could serve as an example and be used by other States. More generally speaking this approach would thus render credible the implementation of fundamental social rights and make other States less reticent when it comes to this.

On behalf of the French Employers, to sum up, I would like to refer to a number of recommendations. The Solemn Declaration of 1998 should be both didactic and pragmatic. It should offer several methods in order to take into account both the economic and the socio-cultural circumstances of States. This Declaration should talk about the development of fundamental rights rather than the defence of such rights. We are talking about promoting these rights. We are talking about getting countries to subscribe to them. As for the ILO, it should talk about ultimate aims rather than objectives. This would lead to more politically oriented and less legalistic behaviour. Today, the ILO should feel fully responsible because all international institutions recognize its special terms of reference. The Copenhagen Summit was an illustration of this. The ILO's mission is clear. It now has a considerable responsibility when it comes to providing information. With this in mind, it should provide more information, make its missions, its means, its actions known beyond these institutions. How many workers are familiar with ILO missions and the activities of the ILO which concern them above all? We are talking about their conditions of employment, the conditions of access to jobs. Unfortunately, many people know nothing about this, in a large number of our States. This situation has to change if the ILO is to take a credible approach to the third millennium.

Original French: Mr. JUNCKER (Prime Minister, Luxembourg) — I should like to start by sincerely congratulating the President on behalf of my Government on her election to the presidency of this session of the International Labour Conference.

She is assuming this office at a very important session; in the next two weeks we will need a great deal of imagination, determination and courage in order to lay the groundwork for an equitable social framework of the multilateral trade system, so that all the parties involved can enjoy the benefits of trade liberalization. I would also like to congratulate the Director-General on his excellent Report, The ILO, standard setting and globalization. The quality of this text teeming with ideas and especially the very specific suggestions for solutions put forward make it an indispensable reference work for any discussion on the subject.

In my view, the Singapore Ministerial Declaration of December 1996 set forth the fundamental principles of the debate on the need to ensure that the economic and social benefits resulting from globalization go hand in hand. Firstly, we all agree that freer trade has to be accompanied by genuine social progress. Secondly, we believe that the ILO is the competent body to lay down universally applicable labour standards and supervise their application. The ball is in our court, and we have to play it fast and true, to use the image put forward by our Director-General. This assembly must agree on concrete action, while achieving consensus. This is all the more so since the work carried out over these last months has helped dispel misunderstandings and move away from mutual accusations of social dumpling and protectionism, and today gives us an opportunity to make a fresh start. The European Union Asian conference, at which we will meet with our Asian friends, is the first concrete step in the process that should lead to the adoption and implementation of common ground rules.

We must not delude ourselves: economic development does not automatically mean social progress. Of course there is no contradiction between them, but there may be a time lag. History has shown this; I am thinking, for instance, of the integration of Europe. For much too long, we have neglected the social aspect, no doubt believing that it would follow automatically in the wake of economic growth, but it proved much more difficult than we had foreseen, and today we have to make good these shortcomings as we build a social framework for Europe, encountering many obstacles along the way.

In the light of our European experience we must take a more voluntarist approach. To adopt a laissez-faire policy of "anything goes" when it comes to the social progress that should go hand in hand with the economic growth resulting from the liberalization of free trade would spell disaster.

We support the idea of a declaration of the International Labour Conference, which should be based on certain guiding principles.

Firstly, we should agree on a platform of fundamental rights of workers. The seven international labour Conventions proposed by the Director-General, as I see it, constitute a useful, albeit minimum framework.

Secondly, the ILO's standard-setting work cannot be reduced. Standards are the linchpin of the whole system. The Director-General's Report suggests some ideas on how we can improve the system. My Government is particularly interested in the increasing role which could be given to Recommendations.

Thirdly, globalization will only yield positive overall results if the workers who contribute to creating wealth also enjoy its fruits, particularly in terms of their rights and social protection. The idea of universally recognized social labels merits further thought.

Fourthly, the multilateral system in its economic and social aspects can only function properly if all the actors apply the standard-setting instruments, and we must ensure that the ILO has the necessary tools to this end; this universal and tripartite — and hence unique — institution must not be allowed to become a paper tiger. The Report of the Director-General suggests specific means of enabling the ILO to carry out more effective supervision.

Fifthly, any action we take should be planned stage by stage in a precise timetable.

Sixthly, what we undertake today must not be "art for art's sake". Revamping the ILO's standard-setting activity is not an end in itself. The results of our discussions must be felt by the other actors involved. If I may say so, we must send the ball back to court of the World Trade Organization. The two entities must not just coexist side by side, there must be regular exchanges between them.

This Conference is duty-bound to lay down a social framework for the globalization and liberalization of trade. If we are to start the "virtuous circle" of economic progress and social progress, we must succeed. There are many people watching us expectantly. We do not have the right to let them down.

Original Greek: Mr. PAPAIOANNOU (Minister of Labour and Social Security, Greece) — Madam President, I am particularly pleased to participate in the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference, and I should like, first of all, to express our heartiest congratulations on your election. We are sure that, under your guidance, the work of the Conference will be brought to a successful conclusion.

I would also like to state that the Report of the Director-General presents, in a precise and positive manner, the potential of the reviewed ILO standard-setting action in a context of trade liberalization and the globalization of the economy.

The Report is well thought through and the Director-General makes a critical and positive assessment of the effectiveness of existing international standards, and proposes original and constructive solutions for the renewal of standards to ensure both economic and social progress.

In recent years very profound changes have taken place in the social, political and economic fields. These extremely important changes have come with extraordinary and unprecedented speed.

We must highlight the globalization of the economy due to the expansion of international trade, movement of capital and proliferation of multinational enterprises which invest in various parts of the world. In this new context, the globalization of the economy, offers chances of improving living standards everywhere, but it also seems to present a threat to employment and wages, particularly among unskilled workers in the developed countries, and to working conditions in the least developed countries where the level of social welfare is rather low.

In order to mitigate the adverse consequences of globalization, and in order to achieve the desired objectives, coordinated international action is required in the area of social justice as expressed in the Declaration of Philadelphia, the main instrument of the ILO. As Mr. Hansenne has said in the Report, economic and social progress must go hand in hand; and I am convinced that we all agree with this statement. International labour standards have always and, in my opinion, will continue to be the most effective means of attaining the goal of social progress.

More specifically, the respect for standards on the fundamental human rights of workers is an indispensable prerequisite for both improved living and work conditions and for the development of the process of trade liberalization.

But how can ILO standard setting become more productive and effective? The Director-General, in his Report, proposes very precise measures such as a broader and fairer selection of issues corresponding to the present needs of member States, highlighting the international labour Recommendations — instruments which are not binding but which could profoundly influence social policy and legislation and, lastly, the creation of a mechanism to evaluate for the international instruments.

I am convinced that everything that Mr. Hansenne has proposed goes in the right direction. I would also like to add that the ILO must try to stimulate the political will of member States in order to ensure the implementation of its standard-setting activities.

I would also like to note that the proposed solemn declaration codifying the constitutional principles of the ILO, and the concept of an international labour Convention on a "social label" would constitute a platform of action for member States to recognize the social dimension of the economy.

I would like to point out that my country, as a founding member of the ILO, has the greatest respect for the Declaration of Philadelphia, and has recently initiated social dialogue on three main subjects — development, employment and competition. This dialogue also touches upon the important issue of social security.

In my opinion, these three points at the same time complement and reinforce each other: competition creates jobs and is the best way of redistributing wealth. It is also the most effective guarantee of development.

I am convinced that the outcome of this dialogue will be extremely helpful and will be borne in mind by our Government in the formulation of its economic and social policies as it reflects the convergence of various points of view expressed by many social groups.

I would like to note that because of globalization, the role of international organizations is increasing in importance. Among such organizations the ILO is the only one which, through its standard-setting action, can respond to the hopes of peoples, safeguard industrial peace, contribute to job creation, defend human rights, and improve living conditions throughout the world.

Here I would like to propose that the ILO in the near future should take initiatives with regard to work time.

The reduction of work time has traditionally been regarded as a factor which has contributed to the absorption of an excessive number of jobseekers and reduction in unemployment rates.

Such an initiative coming from a credible supra-national organization like the ILO could, on the one hand, dispel the concerns of governments for the possible loss of comparative advantages of similar domestic measures, and on the other hand, pave the way for international regulation aimed at increasing employment, an objective which corresponds to the tradition and mission of our noble Organization.

Original Chinese: Mr. LI (Minister of Labour, China) — Madam President, allow me to congratulate you on your election to the presidency of this Conference. I believe that with your wisdom and experience you will steer this session to a successful conclusion. Now I would like to state, on behalf of the Chinese Government, our views on questions relating to labour standard setting.

The Chinese Government has always attached importance to the setting of international standards, and has strictly observed the basic principles set forth in the ILO Constitution. In recent years, arising out of the need for a socialist market economy, and with reference to international labour standards and foreign experience, the Chinese Government has formulated a labour law and a series of special regulations thereby bringing Chinese labour activities onto the legal track.

The sustained and rapid development of the Chinese economy and constant improvements in our labour-related legislation have resulted in more effective protection of the rights and interests of Chinese workers and have also created favourable conditions for approval and implementation of international labour standards. The Chinese Government has studied the major Conventions at the top of the ILO's ratification list and has decided to give primary consideration to ratifying Convention No. 138 concerning minimum working age. Recently, the Standing Committee of the National People's Congress has ratified Convention No. 122 concerning employment policy. In the future the Chinese Government will, as always, actively participate in the formulation, ratification and implementation of labour standards so as to contribute to the healthy progress of standard-setting activities.

The trend towards economic globalization and trade liberalization has indeed raised many new questions in the field of international labour, therefore it is necessary to readjust and reform the ILO standard-setting activities. However, such readjustment and reform should only proceed on the basis of broad consensus after thorough consultations.

It is our view that when standards are set and adopted adequate consideration should be given to the social and economic development level of the majority of member States. For developing countries, which constitute the overwhelming majority in the membership, the existing labour standards, taken as a whole, do have the defect of being excessive in number and in criteria. At present many countries, particularly developing countries, are yet to ratify more standards. This is not because of the lack of political will but rather as a result of their limited capabilities. The key to solving this problem lies in more economic development and better labour legislation in the member States. At the same time, the ILO should provide its Members with more effective technical cooperation and assistance tailored to their actual needs.

The implementation of standards should be strictly limited to the terms of reference of the ILO. Some people have proposed the launch of a "social labelling" campaign to strengthen it. However, in essence, the labelling of one country's products as being up to labour standards is tantamount to openly advocating the rejection or boycott of products from other countries. This in fact links labour standards with international trade and represents trade protectionism in disguise. It also contravenes the spirit of affirming the comparative competitive advantage of developing countries that is laid down in the Declaration of the Singapore Ministerial Conference, and will only lead astray the effort to implement labour standards. Therefore this is something we cannot accept.

With regard to the strengthening of monitoring of basic labour standards, we stand for strict observance of the ILO Constitution rather than making materialistic interpretations of it. One view is that better implementation of basic labour standards requires some type of new mechanism, including the formulation and adoption of a declaration of basic principles, or other form of instrument in addition to strict supervisory procedures. The nature of this proposal forces Members who have not ratified the standards to undertake the same obligations as those that have ratified them. This is not consistent with the provisions of the Constitution. Such practice of imposing labour standards by means of pressure can only intensify disputes and it would not achieve the objective. We stand resolutely opposed to any attempt to transform the ILO into an international tribunal.

In conclusion, I would like to point out that given the new situation of economic globalization and the requirements put on the ILO by the Copenhagen Social Summit, the strengthening of labour standards is admittedly a major undertaking. However, it is an even more important and arduous task to assist Members in the building of their economies and efforts to promote employment in order to eliminate poverty and achieve social harmony through full employment. We would therefore appeal to the ILO to concentrate most of its energy on its historic mission of increasing employment and eliminating poverty, while promoting the setting of labour standards. Only in this way can the Organization live up to the expectations of its Members and better rise to the challenges of the twenty-first century.

Original Portuguese: Mr. MENDES DOS REIS (Minister of Labour, Youth and Social Welfare, Cape Verde) — Allow me, first of all, on behalf of my Government and in my own name to pay tribute to this august assembly and also to wish it every success in the work of this 85th Session of the International Labour Conference.

We would like to congratulate the President in particular on her election to chair this session of the Conference.

Allow me to assure you of the importance our country attaches to this Conference, which provides us with a forum to exchange experiences and information and, perhaps most importantly, a place where we can seek solutions to the problems we all face.

We have listened with great interest to the Report presented by the Director-General that describes the activities undertaken by our Organization with regard to labour regulations, the promotion of employment throughout the world and the struggle against poverty and social marginalization.

The international economic situation being very complex and difficult, the world is now facing new phenomena where clear signs of progress go hand in hand with the globalization of poverty. Unemployment and poverty affect more people and have a stronger impact on the African continent and in particular Africa south of the Sahara, where it is especially endogenous causes that have led since the beginning of the last decade to an unprecedented deterioration in the living conditions of our population.

In this part of the continent, the per capita GNP dropped by roughly 10 per cent between 1980 and 1990. World prices for our main exports fell by roughly 50 per cent. Capital investment dropped by more than 50 per cent in real per capita terms, and in 1989 the debt level of the region reached 97 per cent, by far the highest figure worldwide.

Consequently, the marginalization of Africa, and particularly Africa south of the Sahara, has worsened over the last 20 years. ILO data show that more than half, i.e. 55 per cent, of the population of this region lives at or below the poverty line.

A number of countries have tried to solve this situation through structural adjustment programmes which have in many cases led to an attempt to rebalance the economy at the expense of social progress. To face the challenges and problems we are dealing with at the world level, we have to create a new development model that focuses on the individual; one in which economic growth is a means, not an end in itself; one in which economic development and social progress are not incompatible.

Above all, what we need is a firmer, more positive commitment on the part of all nations of the world to reach a new era of cooperation in favour of development.

Cape Verde, apart from being an archipelago, is a country without any natural resources, afflicted by persistent drought and with an ever-growing population.

As a result, we have two major social problems — poverty and unemployment. Indeed, 30 per cent of the population is poor, and 14 per cent are considered extremely disadvantaged. Our unemployment rate is high — more than a quarter of the active population is unemployed.

My Government already has a programme to combat poverty which has a unique and coherent framework and includes measures and policies aimed at fighting poverty by helping the poor and severely disadvantaged, with an eye to achieving a real and lasting drop in the current poverty level of our country. Through various measures and policies and within the constraints of our existing resources, the Government is trying to turn around the upward trend in unemployment. Our national development plan for the period 1997 to 2000 has as its main objective employment. Success in promoting employment is dependent on the successful implementation of our development strategy, and a dynamic integration in the world economy. We feel that this is the most appropriate approach in order to guarantee self-sustaining economic growth which will make it possible to tackle the problems of structural unemployment and to improve real incomes.

The promotion of small and medium-sized enterprises by offering appropriate financial facilities is a constant concern in our employment policy.

I would like to conclude by expressing the wish that the work of this session of the Conference will meet with success, and that the decisions taken will contribute towards the shaping of a more human world characterized by greater solidarity.

Mr. SUZUKI (Employers' adviser, Japan) — The Report of the Director-General presented to this Conference explains his basic thinking on how to promote and strengthen the ILO core standards and on future standard-setting activities of the Organization. I would like to reflect on some aspects of ILO standards.

It was Robert Owen who introduced the concept of the international regulation of labour problems and it was the ILO which followed up this concept. It took the form of Conventions and Recommendations which were to be ratified by the member States with a view to facilitating problem solving in respect of national labour issues. The point that I wish to make here is that the labour issues to be dealt with by the member States in the context of the international regulations and procedures adopted by the ILO are domestic issues, not new issues brought about by the process of globalization. The new issues and problems characterized by cross- border issues and resulting from the globalization of labour are totally different from the so-called domestic problems which ILO standards and procedures address.

In this sense there is a form of limitation to the concept of the international regulations and procedures adopted by the ILO.

Another characteristic of the international procedure provided by the ILO is that there is a built-in hypothesis which presupposes that member States are entirely capable, and in extreme cases would have the power to solve their labour issues by means of their laws and regulations. This hypothesis you will often discover in ILO questionnaires. I think this position could entail an undesirable undemocratic characteristic by eventually ignoring the fact that all member States are already taking the subsidiarity principle as one of their basic national policies. Member States are built not on the top-down but on the bottom-up principle, which is essential for democracy and true social progress. I wish to stress that the inattention of the ILO to the subsidiarity principle and the narrowness of its approach will constitute a major weakness in today's ILO standards and procedures in the context of the current trend towards the globalization of the world economy.

As everybody recognizes, globalization and the intensified spread of information technology and systems have affected member States in two ways. The first is a weakening of the ability of member States to solve their problems on their own and the other is a declining trend in the size and representativity of trade union organizations. These two effects have a negative impact on member States. Nation States have an increasing need to rely upon the expanding roles and functions of the social partners, while the social partners are growing weaker, undermining the necessary possibilities and opportunities of citizens for greater participation in solving new problems. This calls for the ILO to formulate a new strategy similar to the suggestions contained in Part II of the Report.

The question of how to overcome these weaknesses is the one to which the ILO must first find an effective solution. I doubt whether overemphasizing universalism will help us to solve any questions, simply because such emphasis tends to overlook its own weakness incorporated into the ILO standards and procedures, as well as the growing question of the adequacy of the legal enforcement of universal principles at various stages of a member State's development. The discussion on child labour illustrates the state of affairs concerning this point exactly.

Instead, I think it would be fitting for the ILO to adopt a solemn new ILO declaration in clear and simple terms incorporating the subsidiarity principle as the ILO's basic and universal principle. This type of declaration would help not only member States but also their private sector constituents to discover new and appropriate ways and means of solving domestic questions and would also enlist the support and initiatives of all those involved in order to cope with new issues arising from globalization. It would also help member States, including their tripartite constituents, to do everything possible to cooperate with the ILO in addressing new issues and problems arising from the globalization process. Let me take an example — the Japan Federation of Employers' Associations known as NIKKEIREN has developed and adopted the NIKKEIREN Blue-bird Plan, named after the well-known work of the Belgian Nobel prize-winning author, Maeterlinck, and we are implementing it. It is basically a private sector employers' initiative attempting to find a third option (a blue-bird) taking the efforts of other industrial countries as reference points complemented by the good points of our society, in order to avoid increasing unemployment and widening income disparities and to improve living standards without worsening the employment picture in Japan.

We, the Japanese employers, are attempting to reform Japan's high cost structure by deregulating the excessive rules and regulations. We also proposed a basic structural reform law, which was adopted by the Government. But one element which must remain constant in the process of reform is the positive relationship between management and labour to act as a stabilizing force in society. As soon as the basic message of the subsidiarity principle is understood by ordinary people, widespread cooperation and increased initiatives will be seen and true tripartite cooperation will emerge, therefore social progress will come within the reach of the ILO.

The proposal for a global ILO report, based on individual country evaluations, depends on the universalism and jurisdiction of the Office. I would prefer to see the exercise of report writing based on the bottom-up approach rather than the top-down approach taken by the Office.

The concept of an overall social label proposed in the Report conveys a connotation of a punitive measure which may, in the final analysis, not serve the purpose of the ILO — hence I cannot support the idea. To come into force, ILO Conventions should require ratification by more than five countries in order to help member States to cooperate among themselves in solving new types of problems.

Better designed recommendations for member States or groups of member States, together with a wider range of choices of agenda items, will receive our support. However, we need to emphasize that the revision of Conventions in force should also be carried out in keeping with the requirements of the times, and the denunciation procedure should also make it easier for member States to introduce the required changes. All the points mentioned above will in fact contribute to an increase in the ILO's credibility which is very much needed at this point in time.

Mr. GREENIDGE (Minister of Labour, Community Development and Sports, Barbados) — I join other distinguished representatives in congratulating the President on her election to the presidency of this Conference, and wish her every success in her term of office.

In my address to the 81st Session of the Conference, I drew attention to the resolve of the social partners in Barbados to continue the practice of national tripartism in the development of guidelines for prices and incomes policies within the economy.

I am pleased to report that these efforts have led to the extension in April of this year of the second prices and incomes protocol by six months, subject to consultations on the conclusion of a third protocol.

Because of the small size of Barbados and its consequential susceptibility to the volatile global economic environment, it is essential for us to preserve this tripartite approach to consensus-building on issues of macroeconomic importance.

The social partners and the wider community of our country are proud of our achievements in the sphere of national tripartite consultations, and no effort will be spared by government in preserving the integrity of this process. By their actions the other social partners are equally committed to this objective. To do otherwise would lead to the re-creation of a laissez-faire system that would encourage adversarial relations. Effective tripartism is a necessity for stable industrial relations and the sustained growth and development of small States like Barbados.

This brings me to the second issue I wish to call to the attention of this august body. It relates to the special position of small emerging economies in the international community and the need for the ILO to take cognizance of this fact and to examine the possibility of making special arrangements in relation to their ratification of ILO standards.

The governments of many of these small countries cannot cope with ratification of some Conventions because of their perceived inability to establish the machinery necessary to oversee the legislative and administrative processes that devolve from ratification. Effective ratification depends on the availability of technical, financial and administrative resources which regrettably are in short supply in many small States.

Therefore it would be advantageous for the ILO to include transitional provisions in the Conventions to allow the governments of these countries to apply a time-frame for implementing the standards.

Understandably, small independent States are required to observe the obligations of membership as laid down by international organizations. At the same time it must be recognized that there are instances where the obligations of membership cannot be honoured because of the limitation of size. The standard-setting obligations of Members in the ILO is such an example, and I urge the Organization to draw on the experience of other international bodies that have made special provision for small States in the conduct of their operations.

While making this call, I must publicly express the appreciation of the Government of Barbados for their outstanding support rendered by the ILO Office and multidisciplinary team based in Trinidad and Tobago to the social partners of Barbados and the wider Caribbean. The recently held meeting of the Standing Committee of Labour Ministers in the Caribbean Community lauded the work of the Office and I urge the provision of adequate resources to ensure the continuation of its activities, in particular for the country objectives programme which would help to strengthen our economy's capacity for meeting the challenges of socio-economic development.

The record of Barbados in the ratification of Conventions is satisfactory, especially in the area of the so-called core Conventions, dealing with freedom of association, forced labour, equality of treatment and non-discrimination.

At the same time we recognize the need to proceed with the examination of other important Conventions on such questions as paid education leave, human resources development, tripartite consultation, nursing personnel, labour administration and vocational rehabilitation.

In his Report to this Conference on the subject of ILO standard setting and globalization, the Director-General, in reviewing the standard-setting process, recommends a move away from the "random" method of selecting subjects to a needs analysis to inform the development of a portfolio of proposals. This is a step in the right direction, for it helps to inject a customer-based approach in the standard-setting process that places a high value on relevance and appropriateness of standards.

It is noteworthy also that the Director-General proposes that greater use be made of the "autonomous" recommendation as a standard-setting device instead of linking this instrument to a Convention, as is customary. I hope that by the end of these deliberations we will have helped to chart a path that brings the social partners closer towards achieving social justice in the working environment around the globe.

Mr. DATO'LIM (Minister of Human Resources, Malaysia) — During the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference in 1994, the ASEAN countries sponsored a resolution which in essence called firstly for a review of the relevant and obsolete ILO Conventions and secondly to resist attempts to link a social clause to international trade.

Recent trends indicate that we are moving in tandem with the aspirations of the ASEAN resolution. An example is the proposed constitutional amendment to be tabled by the Director-General of the ILO to authorize the Conference to abrogate obsolete Conventions. The Director-General's proposal on this subject is indeed timely as technological advances have brought about new occupational hazards in the working environment, which requires the ILO to shift its perspective in order to focus its attention on the new realities facing the workers. As regards the attempt to link a social clause to international trade, this subject should by right be put to rest. The WTO Singapore Ministerial Conference last December reaffirmed that the ILO, and not WTO, is the competent body to set and deal with labour standards.

Furthermore, the WTO Singapore Ministerial Conference rejected the use of labour standards for protectionist purposes and agreed that the comparative advantage of countries, particularly low-wage developing countries, must in no way be called into question.

In spite of this, the Malaysian Government regrets that the Director-General's Report contained a number of initiatives which are inclined towards linking labour standards with international trade. Some of the proposed coercive measures contained in his report, such as social labelling or the extension of the freedom of association supervisory mechanism to include other core labour standards, will generate widespread unemployment and hardship for workers and their families in the developing countries. These initiatives will be counter-productive to the ILO's efforts to promote full employment and raise the standard of living and welfare of the workers. Furthermore these proposals seem to reflect a lack of confidence on the part of the ILO in promoting labour standards using the power endowed within its existing constitutional framework. As such, the Malaysian Government is unable to accept these initiatives. Efforts to promote the ratification of core labour standards among the member States have the support of the Malaysian Government. Whilst the Malaysian Government supports efforts to promote the ratification of core Conventions, such efforts should be carried out in accordance with the spirit and intention of the Declaration of Philadelphia, which acknowledges that there are different socio-economic realities and technical capabilities among member States. A more pragmatic approach to enable member States to rectify core labour Conventions is through technical assistance, especially in human resources development, under the aegis of the ILO. This should be pursued vigorously in order to have the catalytic effect in providing the impetus for the developing countries to cope with the challenges of globalization and to uplift them out of their economic difficulties. The spin-off benefits will result in higher standards of living and better working conditions for the workers.

As a demonstration of our commitment and support for the promotion of labour standards, and in line with the relentless efforts and policies of the Malaysian Government to continuously improve the working conditions, socio-economic status and welfare of our workforce and their families, I am pleased to announce that the Government shall ratify two additional core Conventions, namely Convention No. 100 concerning equal remuneration for men and women workers for work of equal value, and Convention No. 138 concerning minimum age for admission to employment. We will pursue this matter with the Director-General of the ILO. The more pragmatic and effective approach suggested by me for the ILO to promote labour standards is in line with the labour policy of the Malaysian Government, which emphasizes tripartism and human resources development. This policy has brought about sustained economic growth and social progress and a harmonious industrial relations climate. The World Economic Forum, in its recent publication entitled Global competitiveness report, 1997 confirms that in terms of industrial relations, Malaysia now ranks as the seventh best in the world. Nevertheless, we will endeavour to enhance our position for the benefit of our workers and their employers.

Mr. MARSHALL (Employers' delegate, New Zealand) — Given the change that has taken place around the world in the last 15 years, the new awareness of individuals as to both their rights and their responsibilities and the growing problem of unemployment as a barrier to social cohesion, it is appropriate that the Director-General's Report deals with the issue of international labour standards and the standard-setting function of the ILO.

This issue is one of great and increasing significance because the approach to standard setting which the ILO adopts appears often to be far too rigid, taking insufficient account of individual countries' circumstances. A great deal of time and effort can frequently, as a consequence, be expended in responding to the Organization acting in its "policing" capacity, for an outcome which is less than satisfactory to all of the parties.

The difficulty arises mainly because the ILO tends to have its own institutional view of how its standards should be interpreted, requiring countries to comply in "letter of the law" terms rather than appreciating that words on paper are often open to interpretation and that the view of what best constitutes compliance will vary from country to country.

The ILO's broad, fundamental purposes mean that the limits of debate in the International Labour Conference can never be narrowly circumscribed. These purposes include social justice as a contribution to lasting peace, and the right of all human beings to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, economic security and equal opportunity. These are fine-sounding words. The problem is how best to put them into practice. It is at this point that differences of opinion arise, and where allowing for different views is essential.

The approach which any country adopts to labour standards and therefore to social justice will, to a large extent, be dependent not only on the country's resources, but on prevailing opinion as to how standards can best be raised and social justice best achieved. At present, the ILO appears to favour an interventionist line, with governments urged to establish policy on an essentially European model. But it is far from clear that circumscribing private-sector business activity through well- intentioned intervention will produce the best result. As a recent article in the British The Economist pointed out, many protections put in place for the working poor now serve only to protect those in work; the "working poor" no longer have a job.

This is something which needs very much to be borne in mind when the question of standards development is debated.

From earliest days, it has been understood that some countries were better placed than others to implement Conventions and Recommendations. The fear was always that non-implementation might give some countries a trading advantage, or conversely, operate to impose a trade ban. The imposition of trade bans, of course, makes the likelihood of Convention implementation even more remote since such an imposition would serve only to hinder the development of those countries on which a ban is imposed. Trade bans, in reality, are often nothing more than de facto tariffs. It is on these grounds that the "overall social label concept" is seen as inappropriate.

The proposal that countries, on joining the ILO, should accept certain core principles has considerable merit but only if it is acknowledged that when a complaint is made, it will be tested against outcomes achieved, not against the process by which they are achieved. This will mean discarding the baggage of accumulated case-law and precedent. It will also mean, since outcomes are a reflection of Convention principles, a re-examination of the principles themselves in the light of a changed and changing societal and industrial relations environment.

The current precedence given to collective bargaining, for example, should give way to recognition of the right to choose whether a collective or an individual contract will apply. Similarly, it is time that the ILO recognized an individual's freedom not to associate as well as that to associate and accorded employers the same rights.

The Director-General's Report acknowledges the increased criticism levelled at the ILO's standard-setting system, and the fact that recently developed standards have registered very few ratifications. It is useful that his Report recognizes the need for change and raises options for consideration. Nevertheless, the concern remains that much of what is proposed, taken with an inflexible ILO approach to standards interpretation, has employment-destructive potential.

The trend in many countries nowadays is towards less, not more regulation. It is realized increasingly that more can be achieved through negotiation and individual initiative than through intervention and regulation. It is also understood that the best promoter of social justice is a stable and prospering economy.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL-SENANY (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Saudi Arabia) — May the peace of God be among you.

It is my pleasure to express my warmest congratulations to the President on her election to chair this session of our Conference. We hope that thanks to her wisdom and enlightenment we will achieve our objectives.

The Director-General's Report covers the subject of ILO standard setting in the light of the current international economic situation and globalization. This question is one of the most important aspects of the ILO's mandate and work. The Report sets out a number of proposals for the future standard-setting activities of our Organization, with the aim of inspiring the Conference to muster the political will required so that our Organization, on the eve of the new millennium, will be in a position to adapt to a new economic situation in the world.

The Director-General's Report contains a number of ideas which call for reflection and serious consideration on our part, as well as a discussion to find effective solutions. In so far as they address the question of the future of the Organization's standard-setting activities, and in order to take full advantage of the know-how of the Organization itself and the social partners, it might be useful if we drew up a questionnaire to be sent out by the Office to member States, which could include the following points.

Firstly, the need to reaffirm the conclusions of the WTO Ministerial Declaration adopted in Singapore, namely to the effect that the ILO is the competent body for setting international labour standards.

Secondly, that there is no need to establish a new procedure for the supervision and monitoring of the application of international labour standards; that to attain our objectives, existing mechanisms may either be considered as sufficient or may be strengthened under the ILO Constitution.

Third, the gap in growth rates among member States is a reality which cannot be ignored, and we should bear such differences in mind when we are drawing up international labour standards. What can be applied in some countries might be inapplicable in others.

Fourthly, since so few States have ratified the international labour Conventions, we should examine why this is the case, and consider the possibility of permitting partial ratification of some of the Conventions, so as to achieve greater flexibility in their application.

Fifthly, it might be desirable to review the working methods of the Committee on the Application of Standards, in so far as certain legal texts may lend themselves to various interpretations. That is why we propose that the activity of this Committee should be restricted to examining flagrant breaches of the Conventions, without going into detailed interpretations of texts which might be the subject of a disagreement.

I would like to emphasize the need for greater flexibility as far as application is concerned, as this will encourage a larger number of States to ratify Conventions and may increase the number of representatives of developing countries and different cultures on the Committee of Experts.

The agenda for this meeting of course includes a number of important technical questions which warrant our attention. I would like to take this opportunity to raise some topics which are of interest to Saudi Arabia, especially as regards small and medium-sized enterprises. Such enterprises have made tangible progress in all regions of our country. The private sector is a pillar of economic activity in Saudi Arabia. The various development plans have encouraged expansion of the private sector and the strengthening of small and medium-sized enterprises.

The State also invests heavily in the development of human resources as a fundamental element in overall social development. Much progress has been made in the field of education; we now have seven universities and numerous other institutes. Saudi Arabia has also emphasized technical and vocational training. Numerous training centres and technical institutes have been established in my country.

Israel is persisting in ignoring its commitments and international peace agreements. It is continuing to establish settlements on Palestinian land. This may block the peace process and could be harmful to employers and workers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories. We hope the efforts to find a comprehensive and lasting peace will continue, so that the establishment of settlements is finally halted.

In conclusion, I would like to express my heartfelt thanks to the members of the Governing Body, the Director-General and his staff for their work, and wish you every success.

Mr. TEMANE (Minister of Labour and Home Affairs, Botswana) — Allow me on behalf of the Botswana delegation, and on my own behalf, to convey to the President my most sincere congratulations on her well-deserved election to steer the deliberations of this session of the International Labour Conference. Let me take this opportunity also to congratulate the Director-General on his clear Report on the ILO's standard-setting role within the global economy. Indeed the ILO's impressive record of improving working conditions and quality of life, including employment opportunities, and ensuring respect for basic human rights, is attributable to the formulation of elaborate international labour standards pertaining to the high priority needs of mankind.

We welcome the continued debate on the connection between the globalization of trade and international labour standards. We, together with others, have in the last few years expressed our apprehensions about the conditions which some of our colleagues have sought to introduce into international trade agreements. It is perhaps necessary that once more I reflect briefly on this question. We should be ready to exchange views during this forum on developments outside this Organization such as the current dialogue on the liberalization of trade. The World Trade Organization's Ministerial Conference in Singapore directed the World Trade secretariat to work very closely with the ILO secretariat on trade and labour standards. The ILO and WTO should therefore continue to collaborate on issues relating to trade and labour standards in order to address the concerns of both developing and developed countries on the question of core labour standards. Ultimately, however, we are concerned that the issue of core labour standards could be used as a protectionist measure to erode the comprehensive advantage of the developing countries.

As we examine this question, we need to remember at our Conference that the world we live in is unequal. We must therefore be prepared to hear a variety of arguments over which measures must be assessed in order to achieve development. In spite of the differences, the North and the South should continue to work together in this Organization, since we realize that our destinies are interlinked. We ask our colleagues in the developed world to reason with us to the extent that where it is clear that freer trade may alleviate poverty in developing economies, thus contributing to the guarantee of prosperity in their countries, no impediments should be introduced.

My Government agrees that there are certain basic standards which all humanity must work towards. We must work harder at eliminating serious forms of forced labour. Forced labour should be a thing of the past. We must vigorously promote equality between women and men and the protection of children. Deregulated trade and commerce within countries should indeed be characterized by free, strong and accountable workers' organizations. As we examine these questions we must be prepared to engage in debates on definitional questions such as the ones relating to child labour. Without making excuses, there may well be activities which we in the developing world, and according to our traditional culture, would not classify as child labour.

One of the proposals raised by the Director-General is that we be more selective in producing new standards. He further suggested that the ILO constituents be mobilized more effectively in information gathering. We are in agreement. There is also considerable merit in the proposal that set criteria be used in the selection of subjects for standard setting. To establish an international standard presupposes that the subject-matter is of such gravity that it cannot be dealt with at national level by those immediately affected. Equally persuasive is the proposal on a systematic evaluation of the impact of instruments with regard to their economic and social effects. We share the view that self-evaluation and criticism would enrich the quality of our work. If we do not take the initiative ourselves somebody else will, and if we are found wanting we would only earn marginalization.

The Government of Botswana believes in the ideals of this Organization. We believe in a gradual upward harmonization and improvement of standards. We have, over the years, demonstrated this through periodic changes to our national labour legislation. We propose to go one step further. In this regard, it is my pleasure, and that of the Government of Botswana, to confirm as already announced this morning, that two weeks ago Botswana ratified five of the seven ILO core Conventions. In addition, four other important Conventions were ratified at the same time. We intend to ratify the remaining two core Conventions during the course of this year.

Original Arabic: Mr. ALKHASAWNEH (Minister of Labour, Jordan) — In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! On behalf of my country's delegation, I should like to congratulate the President on her election to preside over this assembly. We are convinced that thanks to her experience and considerable knowledge, the work of this Conference will be crowned with success.

We consider that the subject dealt with in the Director-General's Report is very important and controversial, because it establishes a link between globalization and labour standards, hence the need to examine this question in the light of international events, and also given the fact that the Organization needs to shoulder its historic responsibilities in future. The standard-setting activity of the Organization has always been of considerable importance to us, given the long-term implications of efforts to achieve peace, cooperation and respect of human rights for all. Standard-setting activity will therefore always have our respect, in view of its long-term objective, the achievement of social peace. In this respect, a new impetus needs to be given to tripartite consensus within the Organization's mandate, taking account of differences in the degree of development of member States and of the essential need for flexibility in all its forms. The introduction of a social clause in the rules governing international trade is the subject of lively debate among the industrialized countries advocating such a clause, who seek to multiply their profits. The developing countries do not support the introduction of such standards, given the detrimental effects they could have on their economies, and their export industries in particular, since the positive effects for them lie mainly in the comparative advantage that would enable them join in the competitive fray. This is why we feel that it is necessary to continue the discussion and a balanced dialogue, and to take account of commitments undertaken in international organizations. Economic and social development should be complete, and international trade should not be restricted on any account. Having said this, we feel that unemployment is still a matter of considerable concern in the developing countries, as well as being a problem in the developed countries. It is a priority at the national level. However, it is difficult to deal with these problems through domestic employment policies without taking account of the need to cooperate with international partners in an international context. We consider that free capital movement to and investment in the developing countries, which aspire to solve the unemployment problem, should promote their chances of creating jobs, improving productivity, expanding trade, finding solutions to immigration problems and solving the problems arising out of the globalization of employment.

The Jordanian delegation appreciated the laudable efforts made by the Director-General with respect to the resolutions adopted by previous sessions of the Conference on Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories. We deplore the continuing violations committed by Israel, reflected in the report of the ILO mission this year as in previous years, in particular the settlement policy, the changes made in different parts of the occupied territories, in the Arab city of Jerusalem and many others. We call on the Government of Israel to comply with international resolutions, Conventions, treaties and peace accords signed between the parties concerned in the region. Lastly, we would like to see closer cooperation between Jordan and the ILO.

Original French: Mr. ATSAIN ACHI (Minister of Employment, Public Service and Social Welfare, Côte d'Ivoire) — The delegation of Côte d'Ivoire, which I have the honour of heading at this 85th Session of the International Labour Conference, would like to join the other delegations in congratulating you on your election as President. It welcomes the determination and consistency shown by the Director-General of the ILO in recalling to the conscience of the international community the social challenges which the member States of our Organization, in particular those in Africa, will face in the third millennium which will be even more marked by a rapid globalization of the world economy and the liberalization of international trade, a universal phenomenon which is breaking down new national borders every day.

Against this background of greater competitiveness, the major challenge for Africa is to ensure that economic recovery and restored growth lead to an increase in productive employment, sustained employment through coherent policies and programmes. The major challenge for Africa is to overcome poverty and provide its inhabitants with a sustained level of social progress. This challenge also means that Africa must convince itself more and more of the need for self-reliance, its own inventive capacity and imagination to set the course of its own destiny rather than to depend on the fate of others. The challenge is no longer to be a spectator but rather to be the actor in our own development.

Mobilizing national resources to allocate them to sectors where they are indispensable, such as education, health, agriculture, adopting tax systems that will promote the exploitation of vast national natural resources, introducing a form of resource distribution with an eye to reducing income discrepancies and encouraging self employment by promoting micro-enterprises and SMEs, strengthening a democratic system which will guarantee the constitutional state and the legitimate rights of workers, engaging in good governance, these are all specific challenges within the reach of the new creative capacity of the new Africa in this context of increased interdependence. We firmly believe in this in Côte d'Ivoire.

That is why my Government feels it is legitimate that standard-setting provisions should not stand in the way of this ambition. Obviously everywhere where intolerable forms of labour exploitation of men, women and particularly children might justify this ambition, Africa should rise up against this as it did in its declaration at the 20th Session of the Committee on Labour and Social Affairs of the Organization of African Unity which took place last April in Addis Ababa. As far as my Government is concerned, we therefore have to clarify the concept of the global social label in order to reassure my region that it has not been subordinating exports to respect questionable standards whose universal verification is furthermore virtually impossible and beyond the scope of the terms of reference of our Organization. Indeed, no African country is against a strengthening of the ILO's capacity to further its standard-setting activities, and the periodic preparation of reports on noncompliance with commitments, which its constituents have subscribed to freely.

However, fundamental standards that imply a disguised conditionality of access to international markets would destroy efforts to achieve economic recovery which are indispensable to an acceleration of social progress in countries of the African region.

The terms of reference of our Organization mention an extension of our work to prepare new standards in this context. Against this background standard setting should be aimed at developing instruments that are socially relevant and yet politically achievable and applicable. This approach involves permanent constant consultations amongst all Members in order to reach a voluntary consensus which is the mainstay of our Organization. It is in this way that the ILO will be able to ensure sustained social progress for its constituents. It is the path of true solidarity on the basis of this human ideal, that is social progress for all.

Original French: Mr. DEMBRI (Government delegate, Algeria) — Allow me, on behalf of the Algerian delegation, to warmly congratulate the President on her election to preside over the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference, as well as the other Officers of the Conference who will assist her. There is no doubt that under their wise guidance our deliberations will be crowned with success and will contribute to the promotion of social dialogue throughout our societies. We would also like to express our praise and appreciation of the Director-General's Report, The ILO, standard setting and globalization, a most pertinent theme for the international community.

If we agree with the Director-General of the ILO on the need for a certain parallel between the economic progress arising from trade liberalization on the one hand and social progress on the other, the fact remains that the measures proposed at the World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen and the data in the declaration of the Singapore Ministerial Conference have still not been implemented in practice.

It is for this reason that the action of our Organization should be strengthened so that the fundamental rights of workers are recognized and preserved, for this is an essential element in the balance sought. The role of the ILO, during this difficult phase, is to encourage the implementation of mechanisms which will allow the member States to find acceptable compromises to reconcile the economic and social consequences of development.

My country, which has ratified all the ILO core Conventions, is particularly attentive to this question as it confers on tripartite consultation a special importance for finding successful solutions to the problems inherent in the multifaceted development of the international community, since social peace remains the firm base on which aspirations to progress and well-being can be built. We agree that concerted international action is now more necessary than ever in order to design and implement tangible actions to provide, at the international level, the necessary social measures to accompany economic globalization. This is what has essentially been established in the programme of action drawn up at the Copenhagen Summit and in the Singapore Declaration. We must also realize that without any firm and collective commitment to proceed in this manner, the effects of any national policy will be diminished in a global context; worse still, such policies might result in adverse consequences which would sow the seeds of decline and would distance countries and economic groupings from beneficial exchanges in areas such as international convergence and cooperation, from mutually beneficial market niches and from reciprocal systems where specializations would benefit all those involved.

For this reason, the ILO has an essential role to play in guiding the actions of member States in this area and suggesting suitable methods, taking into account the specific characteristics of each State, to achieve the desired effects. We thus hope that this session of the Conference will allow us to assess the efforts made by the member States and their view of globalization. We hope in the same way that the necessary relations between North and South will be defined so that there is a reduction in unfair trade and that a world of solidarity and collective progress becomes a reality. In a global context where structural adjustment policies are resulting in frightening levels of poverty, these approaches seem to us to be the number one priority. To see why, one should refer to the premonitory report commissioned by President Carter in the 1970s on the state of the world in the year 2000 and its pessimistic forecasts, including those pertaining to the continued deterioration of the social conditions in some of the least developed countries, which have since become reality.

Obviously, these problems add to the ongoing problems of poverty, the debt burden, where a different approach is sought which would take into account the political, economic and social dimensions of debt, the unequal participation in international trade and the lack of access to scientific and technical progress. No social label will be able to remove the constraints introduced throughout history or the dramatic effects of colonization.

In order to find suitable solutions for these imbalances, the countries of the South must re-establish themselves and be in a position to dynamically restore more equitable international economic relations and take up the North-South dialogue which would favour the establishment, on the basis of consensus, of an economic and financial system based on interdependence, solidarity and shared responsibility and where the rules of solidarity would also influence the laws of the market and could become the norm in the conduct of world business.

Analyses of the financial data show a clear drop in the Organization's budget in the past few years, and this is of major concern to us. In many countries, the implementation of support programmes is to a large extent conditional upon ILO assistance. The budgetary restrictions mentioned each year are far from reflecting the principles defended by our Organization and will certainly not help it extend its scope of action. In fact, if this trend continues, they may lead in the long term to the disappearance of the ILO as a universal guarantor of basic rights and of the participation of all development partners.

As we do firmly believe in the ILO and its role in protecting the rights of workers throughout the world, we cannot end without expressing our grave concern about the continued deterioration in the social conditions of workers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories, which constitutes a flagrant violation of prevailing international standards. The Director-General's Report explicitly calls for urgent measures and vigorous action to end the daily violations of the rights of Arab, Palestinian, Syrian and Lebanese workers who are subject to the illegal foreign occupation. This is a duty of solidarity, which at this time of high aspirations must be answered by the entire international community, as it is true that a country which oppresses another cannot consider itself to be a free country.

Original Spanish: Mr. VARELA (Employers' delegate, Uruguay) — Allow me to congratulate the President on her appointment and wish her every success in leading these debates.

The Report submitted by the Director-General to the Conference on this occasion shows his concern for the role of the International Labour Organization at a time of radical change in the world economy.

While this debate is not new to the ILO, it has lost none of its importance. The values upheld by the Organization cannot depend upon a given economic situation. However, neither should they become overprotective, representing obstacles to economic growth and trade among nations.

The ILO is a part of our world, and hence reflects the problems which our world must face. It is no stranger to the differences between the various economic systems, just as it was no stranger to the differences between the various political systems in previous times. It is not immune to ideological differences. When they separate men and women in regions, they also separate men and women within this Organization, making it more difficult to find a consensus but, at the same time, making that consensus stronger once it is reached.

One should therefore ask whether the role of this Organization lies in anticipating change and adopting standards which are intended to cope with situations where the rights of workers may be reduced or, on the contrary, to adapt to change and react to specific situations which actually do involve abuse or a divergence from the objectives for which the ILO was set up.

The first position is idealistic, the second is realistic. Hence we have the idea that a declaration should be drawn up containing the essential principles guiding us in this time of change. As this century ends, it will serve as a basis for activities in the next millennium. However, we do not share the view that this declaration should be binding and be used as a pretext to sanction those countries which move away from these guiding principles.

The ILO was set up by States and should not go beyond the limits imposed upon it by them. It should not become a world labour policeman.

The promulgation and dissemination of labour rights is one of our essential duties. The transition towards ever-more dignified conditions of work is another. It is in this sense that we should be guiding international labour standards.

Experience has shown that in the present context of change, those standards which have already been adopted should be updated. If we were to dedicate ourselves only to this task, the ILO, and the Conference in particular, would have years of work before them. On the other hand, suspending the adoption of new standards (unless there are specific reasons giving rise to this need) does not necessarily mean suspending standard-setting activities. The new Conventions will be the old ones, once they have been revised. We should continue to study those standards dealing with issues which in the past warranted an instrument but have not received a sufficient number of ratifications.

Conversely, if we do not adopt an appropriate pattern for change, States may study the possibility of denouncing Conventions when the economic situation has changed from the time when those Conventions were ratified. A recent denunciation of the Termination of Employment Convention, 1982 (No. 158) is a case in point.

If the quality of standard-setting activities or a specific standard is measured by the number of ratifications, then we must acknowledge that the situation is far from acceptable.

This underlines the need to concentrate on standards that have already been adopted, so as to understand the objections of governments, employers and workers and to remove any obstacles to ratification. It is quite probable that in that revision process we will add more flexible clauses to standards in order to adapt them to economic and social changes, as well as to cultural differences.

We also must take account of the opinion of employers to a greater extent when drafting standards. While governments adopt policies favouring the adoption of Conventions and then sometimes fail to ratify them, and workers constantly seek higher levels of protection, employers are more pragmatic in their approach and adapt standards to national realities, comparing them to the obligations under existing legislation and studying their possible effects on prices and employment, drawing their own conclusions.

Last year, an event took place concerning tripartism which emphasizes this fact. There was silent opposition on the part of the Employers, who preferred to keep out of the discussion rather than participating as co-sponsors in a standard that they felt was premature and not appropriate.

That situation should certainly not be repeated. Tripartism and consensus are among the ILO's greatest assets and every effort should be made to retain them, even if it means postponing the adoption of a standard. Texts drafted on the strength of a majority vote and not by a convinced consensus lack the moral force of those which are the subject of an informed consensus.

Before concluding, we should like to refer to the process of globalization in a context where economic blocks linked by agreements among States are emerging.

It is only logical that as long as there are adjustment processes taking place within these blocks, the parties will, as the Director-General pointed out, refrain from adopting new international commitments. When States discuss economic integration at the regional level, they do not consider it advisable to ask their firms to enter into new commitments unless they can be sure that their partners too are ready to do so. This slows the rate of ratification and shows the need to readjust standards, which have to be flexible.

To sum up, we believe that it is advisable that the standard-setting activity of the ILO during this period of change should be focused on modifying those Conventions that have a low number of ratifications. We should not insist on adopting new Conventions, but instead concentrate on the use of Recommendations to provide guiding standards, while assigning the task of technical cooperation to the Organization and its constituents in order to ensure the effectiveness of standards already adopted, and spread knowledge of the essential values that are the backbone of the ILO.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL-BUSAIDI (Undersecretary of the Ministry of Social Affairs and Labour, Oman) — We are very pleased to be able to participate with you in the work of the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference. We consider the Conference as one of the most important international fora which deals with humanity's future, and creates social justice for all in a world of constructive cooperation aimed at ensuring human rights and prosperity, without prejudice as to race, religion or sex.

We are very pleased to extend to you the greetings of Sheik Mohammed al-Esai, the Minister of Social Affairs and Labour. I would like to congratulate the President on her election to chair this session of the Conference. We are fully convinced that thanks to her experience and wisdom this session of the Conference will meet our aspirations and be crowned with success. I would also like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to the successful cooperation of the ILO with the Government of Oman.

Permit me to repeat that we are very interested in all of the activities and achievements of the Organization. We also wish to adopt all standards or legislation related to international labour standards, and therefore we wish to study closely all of the documents issued by this Organization. We would like to repeat once again that the translation of all documents at the ILO into Arabic is a vital question for all the Arab States. For all Arab delegations and countries to benefit fully from the documents and the activities of the Organization, Arabic must be an official language, as it is in the United Nations. We are confident that you will understand this request and realize the reasons why it should be accepted.

While recognizing the sincere efforts of the ILO aimed at reducing the suffering of the Palestinian people in the occupied Arab territories, we hope that the Organization will focus more closely on the need to eliminate the constraints imposed on Palestinian workers, so that their livelihood is not dependent on the whims of politics, the prevailing atmosphere of the day or military constraints, so that their work is no longer subject to oppression and violations. The ILO's attention should also be drawn to the situation of Arab workers on the Syrian Golan Heights and in southern Lebanon.

We hope that peace will prevail in the Middle East and throughout the world, and that all countries will respect their commitments and obligations in order to strengthen the peace process and to remove the threat of war which has caused so much suffering for mankind.

The Conference agenda is full of items for discussion. However, I would like to address the Report of the Director-General dealing with the standard-setting activities of the Organization and globalization. It raises a number of questions and ideas, and contains suggestions which we should think about with an eye to changing the supervisory system for the application of international labour standards, including a new mechanism to promote the universal application of fundamental rights and to ensure that standards are upheld during globalization. We would like once again to extend our thanks to the Director-General for his Report. But we feel that there is no need for us to resort to new mechanisms for international labour standards, because the present system is sufficient. As for the social clause, we must take into consideration the economic and social realities of the various countries, without damaging the interests of their peoples.

We fervently hope that this Conference will achieve the goals we have set so that the results can meet our expectations. We are convinced that we will all be able to safeguard and protect our countries' human resources against waste, exploitation and dangers, now and in the future.

Mr. ETIANG (Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, Uganda) — Allow me first of all to join others who have spoken before me in congratulating the President on her very deserved election to the high office of this presidency. The theme for this Conference, "the ILO standard setting and globalization", presents to us an opportunity to recast the image of the ILO in a world environment that has undergone profound change. Today most of our countries face increasing complex problems, such as international competition, international debt burden, unemployment and poverty, to mention a few. In many countries, particularly developing countries, structural adjustment programmes have been implemented in response to the debt crisis. These programmes have also aimed at restoring and enhancing the competitiveness of enterprises in order to attain a better penetration of international markets. However, the experience of many of our countries has been the lack of sufficient safety nets to ensure that the social costs of economic adjustment are not unfairly borne by the poor.

International labour standards remain the principal means of action for the ILO to promote social justice and human dignity. However, under the pressure of the changing world environment, where there should be the interplay of competitiveness and flexibility of the market forces, the future standard-setting work of the ILO is challenged.

Uganda acknowledges the need to promote the ILO Conventions on the fundamental rights of workers and also attaches priority to their implementation. This has already been demonstrated by the progressive ratification of some of the core Conventions and the prominence accorded to the provisions on the rights of workers, of women, of the disabled and of children in our new Constitution of 1995. To that end, my delegation supports the campaign by the Director-General to encourage member States to ratify the core Conventions. This effort however needs to be done through intensified dialogue and consultation with the employers' and workers' representatives. In doing so this could allow each State to carefully study the situation and identify the real needs and the means at their disposal before ratification.

To address problems of non-ratification or difficulties of application, more emphasis should be placed on the role of technical cooperation in the promotion of international labour standards with a view to helping member States develop and adjust their economic and social structures to enable them to ratify and apply the ILO Conventions. Technical cooperation could be increased, particularly for developing countries still going through the upheavals of economic reform.

For Africa the excruciating debt burden remains one of the obstacles to achieving sustainable growth and development. Africa painfully spends large proportions of its meagre export earnings on debt servicing. Tackling the problem of the debt crisis is therefore very critical in the process of enabling the region to pursue its efforts aimed at recovery development and social progress. In the light of the foregoing, debt relief measures should be more encouraged to ease some of the difficulties faced by the African countries. In this respect Uganda welcomes the debt relief initiative. I am particularly happy to note that Uganda is the very first African country to benefit from that facility.

With regard to the supervisory machinery, we support the need to strengthen the supervisory procedures, but within the ILO Constitution. Introducing special supervisory machinery for core Conventions is likely to lead to possible duplication and jeopardize the special procedure of freedom of association which has given a unique and valuable contribution in this field. The work of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations would also be affected in a similar manner. Instead the work of these two Committees could be further complemented by greater use of multidisciplinary teams which have direct contact with their constituents.

The proposed establishment of a declaration on fundamental rights would open the floodgates to the social clause and the linkage of international labour standards to trade. This matter has been discussed at different fora and such linkage has been rightly rejected. While I acknowledge the interdependence between ILO standards and international trade, I strongly believe that ILO standards should be handled by the ILO and trade matters by the World Trade Organization.

Africa continues to be the most needy continent. It continues to have an overwhelming majority of the least-developed countries. More support, particularly for field programmes in the areas of poverty reduction and job creation and capacity building, is greatly and urgently required. I therefore appeal to the Director-General to continue maintaining Africa's share of the technical cooperation budget more favourably.

I also wish to express Uganda's support for the campaign against exploitative forms of child labour. We have a duty to bring to an end the worst forms of child labour. Nevertheless, I wish to observe that the concept of child labour in the African setting is slightly different from that in the industrialized world. There is therefore a need to consider child labour against the background of the cultural socio-economic environment and economic realities. In Africa children learn their skills by working side by side with their parents as part of the socialization process. This learning process should not be confused with child labour. It is therefore important for us to distinguish child work from child labour.

To conclude, I wish to join other African colleagues in requesting the Director-General to appeal to the American region and the Employers' group to urgently resolve whatever obstacles they have that have delayed them from ratifying the instrument for the amendment of the Constitution of the ILO, adopted in 1986. Africa is uneasy about the delayed implementation of these constitutional amendments.

I take this opportunity to renew to you, and through you to the entire international community, the commitment and the political will of the people and the Government of the Republic of Uganda to the principles and the objectives of the ILO.

Original French: Mr. OECHSLIN (Employers' delegate, France) — I am speaking to you today on behalf of the International Organization of Employers. Madam President, may I congratulate you on your brilliant election and thank the Director-General for his particularly stimulating Report.

The first part of the Report essentially goes into the fundamental rights of workers which clearly falls within the mandate given to the ILO by the Social Summit in Copenhagen, as confirmed in Singapore at the Ministerial Conference.

The Governing Body has already begun to study measures which might help increase the effectiveness of the ILO in that area. Developing countries must be allowed to take full advantage of their competitive advantage, while at the same time our Organization has to ensure effective recognition of certain basic social principles. After defining these principles on the basis of a few specific Conventions, we examined various ways of proceeding, including specifically the drafting of a declaration listing the most important fundamental rights, and ways of making better use of the reports which member States present to the ILO on the effect given to Conventions which they have adopted. The Employers in general support these initiatives and hope that the Governing Body will be able, under the Constitution in its present form, to turn them into concrete proposals in November.

The Director-General's Report also contains suggestions concerning an idea which has not yet been thoroughly discussed — the notion of the Global Social Label. The Employers were quite concerned when they learned of the Director-General's ideas. Beginning a new great debate on this topic might detract from measures which have been studied for some time and which could be more quickly implemented. All the difficulties have not yet been overcome, and we should be careful not to bite off more than we can chew.

Indeed, what may be possible for a single product may be difficult to apply to an entire economy, particularly when the activities only concern the internal market or are carried out in the informal sector. Member States may, along with the representatives of the employers and the workers, commit themselves to a policy to promote fundamental labour rights, but it is quite a different matter to consider setting up an international inspection system, even if it is implemented by national agencies, to monitor the effective application in all sectors of very vaguely defined principles. How can we be sure that the ILO label will not become a tool of protectionism? How can we see to it that it is applied in an absolutely impartial and verifiable way?

The second part of the Report, "More targeted standards for a greater impact", is of special interest to employers, who have advocated a new standard-setting policy aimed at devising standards which can be applied to the greatest possible number of countries. Indeed, it is true that most of the Conventions remain in large part unratified because they are unratifiable, especially in certain regions, for both cultural and economic reasons. We therefore agree with the Director-General that at this juncture we should reassert the value of Recommendations. We further agree with him that we have to rationalize the whole process of drawing up and adopting instruments, starting from the choice of subject, which should include more possibilities, right through to the different phases of the preparatory work and procedure in committees. All these arrangements can have but one aim: to facilitate the tripartite agreement which is the best guarantee that these instruments will be applicable in practice, thus ensuring their effectiveness.

We have also made some specific proposals, for instance, to make the denunciation of Conventions less difficult. There is no paradox in considering that this will facilitate ratification by more States, as some States may otherwise hesitate to take a decision which they think would later be irrevocable.

The Employers confirm the proposals they submitted in June 1994 to the Conference. That debate has already led to some progress. In particular, the Governing Body has undertaken to revise some of the Conventions. But this is just the beginning.

The Director-General in his Report quite rightly states that guaranteeing standards is not an aim unto itself, but rather one of the means with which to attain the objectives of the Organization. These aims are acknowledged by the constituents of the ILO. Employment is, in this time of globalization, at the heart of our concerns, as is the safeguard of fundamental labour rights. Standards are a tool which can be useful, but only if we commit ourselves to ensuring that these tools, which are now a tradition specific to our Organization, are brought up to date.

Original Bulgarian: Mr. NEYKOV (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Bulgaria) — Madam President, allow me first of all, on behalf of the Bulgarian delegation and also on my own behalf, to express my gratitude to the hosts of the current ILO session, and to congratulate you as well as the Vice-Presidents for your nomination to these important posts, and to wish you a fruitful and successful outcome to the Conference.

The subject of the Director-General's Report for this session is an issue of paramount importance for the Organization and for the member States. The subject is the ILO, standard setting and globalization. Standard-setting activity involves two aspects: on the one hand, it constitutes most of the activities carried out by ILO bodies and groups and, on the other hand, it is very important for the internal law of each country for the instruments adopted by the ILO and by the respective governments to become an integral part of law.

As has been emphasized in Mr. Hansenne's Report, good political will should be the prerequisite for up-to-date standard-setting activity in the forthcoming years in order to ensure social progress.

With reference to these points, I would stress that during the last few months, the changes which have taken place in our country have had a major impact on reform in all areas, particularly in the social and economic spheres.

The Parliament entrusted the new Bulgarian Government with the task of ensuring a legal basis for social reform in Bulgaria through the ratification of current ILO standards. In this sense, the Government, which was appointed some weeks ago, is determined to establish modern social and industrial legislation, including immediate preparation for ratification of new ILO Conventions such as the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144). Furthermore, the Prime Minister undertook to reorganize the national tripartite system of dialogue aimed at making this system an active one, and at becoming more closely connected to the people concerned. Some of the measures to be adopted by the new Government for this purpose are the tripartite dialogue's institutionalization at various levels, and should operate actively. A new body to be established is the "Economic and Social Council" in which NGOs can also participate for creative cooperation. We intend to overcome stagnation by submitting the instruments adopted by the International Labour Conference to the competent authorities, pursuant to article 19 of the ILO Constitution. The report on the Conventions and Recommendations adopted between 1992 and 1995 was submitted to the Bulgarian Council of Ministers and the report for the next period is also being prepared.

The Government is doing a great deal to solve the problems in the social realm as well as in the sphere of employment. The number of unemployed persons will increase because of ongoing structural reforms. Ways for creating alternative employment will be sought. The aim is to pass from a system for providing unemployment benefits to a more active system. Unemployed persons will be encouraged to seek out ways and means to set up their own businesses on the basis of funds provided.

Along with the above-mentioned measures, we intend to improve the system of social benefits so that these benefits can be obtained only by needy people and so that bureaucracy can be reduced.

I avail myself of this opportunity to express my gratitude to the ILO multidisciplinary team in Budapest and to its Director who visited our country this spring and thus became acquainted with our problems. I believe that the ongoing projects, for the implementation of which we shall rely on the CEET experts' assistance, will contribute to the social area reform process that has been substantially delayed in the last few years.

To conclude, I should like to express my wishes for the success of this Conference and for its fruitful work in the process of adopting crucial decisions and instruments for all member States.

Original Arabic: Mr. DERBI (Government delegate, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya) — Allow me to begin by expressing my sincere congratulations to the President and her Vice-Presidents.

I should also like to make some comments concerning the Director-General's Report, The ILO, standard setting and globalization. I believe that this subject is of capital importance for all countries, given its potential impact on the lives of people, including workers, throughout the world. The Report is fairly broad in scope, but does pose some dangers, particularly concerning the liberalization of trade which, if unbridled, may very well make it difficult for national legislation to protect domestic production from excessive competition, which could undermine our national sovereignty. Our countries could become a marketplace of consumerism for the dumping of manufactured goods. Our domestic industries could be forced to reduce their workforce and poverty and unemployment may rise, while our resources are depleted.

I should also like to make some comments on some of the ideas expressed in the Report, some of which we accept. First of all, international labour standards and their strengthening are questions of practical importance for progress and social security within the limits of national sovereignty and the prerogatives of the legislative authorities. Secondly, there should be no direct or indirect link, expressed or implied, between the liberalization of trade and the respect for international labour standards. There is no logical proof that this link should be maintained. Even the Singapore Conference rejected the idea of such a link which could jeopardize the work of our Organization which is a competent authority of great importance and differs from other organizations by virtue of its tripartite structure. Thirdly, we reject the establishment of new monitoring mechanisms as we need to optimize the benefits of the existing mechanisms. Fourthly, we also reject the concept of a Declaration of Principles and we urge countries to bear in mind the implementation of standards and to submit complaints as provided under the Declaration and the Constitution of Philadelphia. Fifthly, we do not support the proposal on social labelling because this would institutionalize international labour standards, encourage protectionism and bring in the social clause through the back door.

International labour standards cannot be applied in the current situation because the stronger nations are able to impose economic sanctions which hinder development and personal fulfilment. A great deal of harm has been caused to my country and to other developing countries against which sanctions have been imposed. These sanctions have had a direct impact on workers and employers. The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya has been harmed by the Lockerbie trial which in fact has meant a loss of over $18 billion. If that sum had instead been allocated to development, we would have been able to derive major benefits, in terms of development and social welfare, for both Libyans and non-Libyans.

We therefore call on the Organization to play a role in this connection to protect employment, safeguard the implementation of development programmes to create even more jobs, and to enable sanctions against my country to be lifted.

The Director-General's Report makes mention of follow-up on the implementation of 1974 and 1980 International Labour Conference resolutions concerning the situation of Arab workers in Palestine and the occupied territories and the consequences of the establishment of new settlements. The Report does not go sufficiently into detail on the continued abuses perpetrated by the occupying Israeli authorities, such as the violation of trade union freedoms, infanticide, the settlement of confiscated lands and the imposition of Judaism in East Jerusalem. The situation is no better in the Golan Heights where the inhabitants suffer similar abuse. We urge the Organization to follow very closely the situation of Arab workers in Palestine, the Golan Heights, Lebanon as well as in other countries to end their suffering and to ensure that the necessary resources are made available for programmes which enable the Palestinians to promote labour and improve the lot of their workers.

Fourth sitting

Tuesday, 10 June 1997, 3 p.m.

President: Ms. Sasso Mazzufferi

Original French: The PRESIDENT (Ms. SASSO MAZZUFFERI) — We shall now resume discussion of the reports of the Chairperson of the Governing Body and of the Director-General. I would like to call upon all speakers to respect strictly the five-minute speaking time allocated, so that we do not delay the proceedings.

Mr. MELKERT (Minister of Social Affairs and Employment, Netherlands) — It is an honour for me to speak today in this forum so ably presided over by you, on the issue of international labour standards.

I think the Director-General was very right to focus his Report on the role of ILO standards, the ILO's crown jewels, in the setting of globalization. Michel Hansenne realizes that the international community has thrown down the gauntlet and that the ILO now has to rise to the challenge of ensuring fundamental workers' rights worldwide. We all agreed at the WTO Conference in Singapore that the ILO has to set and deal with fundamental labour standards. I believe that the Organization should not shrink from considering measures to improve its record on standard setting and implementation.

However, before embarking on the concrete proposals of the Director-General, let me just say a word about fundamental labour standards as such. It is clear that these standards must be applied universally. Poverty can never justify forced labour by children and other intolerable forms of child labour. These practices are beyond the pale in any economy. During the Amsterdam Child Labour Conference which was held last February, I felt that there was a growing awareness. I look forward to the ILO actively tackling this issue during the next sessions of the Conference. During the Amsterdam Child Labour Conference, there was consensus on the need to establish a monitoring system on child labour. My Government has committed itself to a first contribution towards an ILO proposal to establish such a child labour monitor and I would like to call on other governments to also consider contributing towards this. In this context, I would like to ask the Director-General to give us an update on the current state of affairs, including the approach foreseen to set it up.

The Government of the Netherlands warmly supports a number of ideas in Part I of the Director-General's Report. For instance, the spelling out of the principles of the Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia with regard to the fundamental workers' rights in a solemn declaration can play an important role. However, it is essential that this should be combined with a procedure to monitor compliance with the declaration worldwide. If necessary, compliance should be supported by appropriate ILO means of action including supervisory procedures and technical cooperation.

Also, other suggestions in the Report, in particular those referring to the existing precedent of the freedom of association procedure, should be explored further. I trust that the Governing Body in November 1997 will embark on an in-depth discussion of these matters, including the establishment of an appropriate work programme. It is operational and not merely declaratory action that we need now.

In the context of these discussions, it must be reiterated that any standards-related procedure in the ILO take place on a voluntary basis, as well as through the safeguarding of due process and does not result in sanctions. When, via monitoring procedures, problems with implementation become apparent, the first task of the Organization and the international community as a whole remains to aid the countries concerned by technical assistance. The basis for progress on the fundamental labour standards remains mutual understanding and confidence.

This morning we had a fruitful, informal discussion between European Union and Asian ministers on fundamental labour standards. During the meeting, it became apparent that mutual understanding and confidence, as well as cooperation, are the key elements for any progress here. To generate mutual understanding was the first purpose of our informal gathering, as mutual understanding is the precondition for lasting, effective action.

I feel that, in addition to the Director-General's proposals as spelled out in his Report, some other initiatives may also be explored. In the Director-General's campaign to actively promote the ratification of the fundamental labour standards, perhaps the organization of a conference exclusively devoted to the promotion campaign could be considered. Another suggestion could be to set up a special task force on fundamental labour standards, which would aim at the promotion of ratification and observance of these standards. In Part II of the Director-General's Report, I fully support the idea to improve the selection procedure and monitoring of standards. I think that the selection of subjects suitable for standard setting should be reconsidered in order to better meet the needs of these times. The poor record of ratification for a number of Conventions and the repeated calls for the revision of those has demonstrated that this process of selecting items for future standard setting has not always been adequate. The Organization is already dealing with this and I hope we will be able to embrace some of the new ideas.

Let me conclude by reiterating that the observance of the fundamental labour standards is a responsibility of individual States as well as the entire world community. The time has come to join hands to meet our common objective of social justice in the world.

Mr. FLYNN (European Commissioner, European Union) — May I begin by offering my warmest congratulations to the President on her unanimous election as President of the Conference.

I would like to address the issue at the centre of the Director-General's Report, namely, the guarantee of fundamental social rights and the related discussion around ILO standard setting.

The European Commission shares the view of the ILO on the real need for the widest possible respect for these rights and to insist that the process of globalization is accompanied by real social progress.

Since the World Social Summit in Copenhagen in 1995 and the Ministerial Conference of the WTO in Singapore last December, an international consensus has emerged around the existence of fundamental rights for workers embodied in the relevant ILO Conventions. In Singapore the WTO Ministers committed themselves to the respect of these rights, and they also confirmed the role of the ILO to defend and to promote them. It was a great opportunity for the ILO, it was also an enormous challenge.

So, ladies and gentlemen, a lot is expected of you, and I'd like to say that you are delivering. The campaign launched by Mr. Hansenne in 1995 for the promotion of the core Conventions has already started to show results in terms of ratification. The debate at this Conference is a further example of your commitment, and all ILO Members by virtue of their acceptance of the ILO Constitution should be bound to the respect of these fundamental rights.

The European Union's interest in the question of core labour rights is squarely based on our social roots. The principles of solidarity, social cohesion and respect for fundamental rights form the very bedrock of the European Union.

However, we do not ask countries at different stages of development or with different social structures to align their policies with those of the Union. We do not seek to deprive countries with lower wage levels or lower working conditions of exploiting their comparative advantage. What we do seek is a guarantee that fundamental freedoms will be respected, as higher living and working standards will flow from this, and this position is reflected in our policies and in our action.

Our system of generalized preferences provides incentives to beneficiary countries to adopt more forward-looking social policies. From 1998 onwards, those countries complying with ILO Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 on freedom of association and the right to collective bargaining, and with Convention No. 138 on child labour, will be granted additional preferences.

Technical assistance is also very important. The European Commission fully supports the ILO's International Programme on the Elimination of Child Labour (IPEC), and the first pilot project financed by the Commission within the framework of the IPEC programme will come on stream in the next few weeks.

Thirdly, cooperation agreements with non-member States include dialogue on human and social rights. May I end by putting my support behind Mr. Hansenne's suggestion to draw up a list of basic principles and to establish a monitoring system. A regular report by the Director-General on social progress across the world would go a long way in providing an objective view of social progress for all to see.

I cannot overemphasize the importance of this area of work for the ILO. Much of the task of ensuring social progress across the world now falls on your shoulders, and I would like to wish you all at this session of the Conference the very best of luck in achieving your objective.

Original French: Mr. AMEDÉE (Minister of Social Affairs, Haiti) — The Republic of Haiti is pleased to participate in the work of the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference, and on its behalf I would like to congratulate warmly the President and other Officers on their election. Under their leadership, the work of the 85th Session will undoubtedly be a success.

Allow me to share with you some of the problems raised in the relevant and timely Report of the Director-General. In particular, the Report mentions the strengthening of the standard-setting framework for the respect of working conditions in a world concerned with market liberalization, employment flexibility, and the inequalities which will no doubt emerge in the LDCs that are carrying out large-scale economic reform programmes.

Haiti has restored legality and constitutional legitimacy, which are prerequisites for economic and social progress. The population can now fully enjoy the advantages of democracy, and in particular its formal freedoms, one of which is freedom of association.

However, a great deal remains to be done. In addition to the structural problems the Republic of Haiti faces, its capacity to absorb migrants has been put to the test with the massive influx of several thousand fellow countrymen returning from abroad. During this process we were faced with everything from the need to take emergency measures to the definition of a policy for the reintegration of migrants in their communities of origin. The National Office for Migration had to be reinforced in order to cope with this exceptional situation. However, the precariousness of our economy makes it impossible for the time being to overcome this problem completely.

A great deal remains to be done to meet the aspirations of large sections of the population to a life characterized by greater dignity. This can only be done through employment. In this spirit, the Government of Haiti has set out to improve the framework for investment by creating a climate conducive to expansion, while gradually strengthening social protection mechanisms.

Greater attention has been given by the public authorities to the tripartite commission for consultation and arbitration, a forum for active consultation which as from the 1996-97 budget year received funding from the public treasury.

In the field of social security, considerable efforts have been made to assist workers. These include the inauguration of a screening programme for sexually transmitted diseases and a programme to detect eye diseases. The number of public bodies dealing with social protection has increased. In the near future, we will emphasize the introduction of a maternity insurance scheme for workers. The hospital of the OFATMA — the occupational accident and maternity administration — is due to be expanded in order to handle such services.

The Government of Haiti believes that the informal sector and small enterprises will become more important in future in overcoming the problems of unemployment affecting a large part of the active population, in particular those in marginal urban and rural areas. For this purpose, the CISD, or agency for the coordination of social measures in disadvantaged areas, specializes in granting micro-credits and helping the severely disadvantaged. It now has been given new means to cope with these challenges. The CISD's aim is to facilitate access to credit for categories of citizens who would otherwise find themselves completely excluded from such services.

These are the main approaches taken by the Government of Haiti to develop its activities in order to create a society in which every human being will be able to meet his or her needs in the field of employment. We all realize that it will be a long road to travel, but we know that we have to set our objectives and embark upon the road of recovery. We are convinced that this is where the future of the nation lies.

Mr. SMITH (Minister of State for Education and Employment, United Kingdom) — I welcome this opportunity to put on record the United Kingdom's wholehearted commitment to human rights and our full support for the ILO's efforts to promote internationally recognized core labour standards.

Equity demands that globalization and trade liberalization must go hand in hand with the promotion of basic labour standards and fundamental human rights. It must not be a question of eroding the competitive advantage of developing countries but seeing social progress reinforce economic growth, so that we have more of each where we have both.

In the United Kingdom we are committed to promoting the employability of our people and the economic responsiveness of both employees and employers. In Europe, and more widely, we are determined to pursue an agenda of flexibility, employability, jobs and fairness on the basis of responsive social partnership, so that we not only respond effectively to the challenge of economic change, but help shape its course for the benefit of all. This means that every person has the right to decent minimum standards alongside safeguards against the burden of excessive regulation. More importantly, it means that we must intervene actively to help people develop their employability, ensuring that they have the skills to get a job and to make the most of their employment.

The ILO has a long and honourable history of promoting democracy, human rights and fair working conditions. Much of the credit for bringing the issue of child labour to the forefront of current international debate must be given to the ILO. The International Programme on the Elimination of Child Labour has given the ILO an authoritative voice on this subject. It is a programme that has earned the admiration of donor and recipient countries alike for its focus on achieving practical lasting results through grass-roots partnership. The United Kingdom is already contributing funds to IPEC. I am delighted to announce that we intend to increase our support for this excellent programme.

A further mark of the ILO's success was the renewed commitment given by Ministers at the World Trade Organization Conference last December to the observance of core labour standards and to the primary role of the ILO in promoting those standards.

Now, commitment must be followed by action and our task is to ensure that the commitments made by Heads of State at the World Social Summit and by Ministers at Singapore are translated swiftly into concrete action. We shall be held to account at the coming World Trade Organization ministerial meeting and must be able to demonstrate real progress.

My Government attaches the highest importance to restoring the United Kingdom's reputation for fulfilling its obligations in the ILO. We reaffirm our full respect for the application of the ILO's core labour standards. One of the first acts of our Government has been to honour our pledge to restore freedom of association at GCHQ. I therefore greatly welcome this opportunity to announce formally the resolution of a long-standing injustice. Trade union rights at GCHQ have now been restored in full conformity with the United Kingdom's ILO obligations.

It is in this spirit that the United Kingdom Government can declare its unqualified support for the Director-General's vision of a revitalized system of international labour standards based on universal respect for fundamental human rights at the workplace.

A binding declaration embodying the principles implicit in membership of the ILO is a powerful concept. Work to develop this proposal should be taken forward directly to maintain the impetus towards the adoption of a declaration at next year's International Labour Conference.

Some of the proposals in the Director-General's Report will, of course, need further reflection and debate. The proposals for a voluntary global system of social labelling and for regular reports by the ILO on social progress are innovative and merit further discussion. We must attempt to establish the consensus across the ILO's membership which can carry them forward.

In the United Kingdom we are working to encourage ethical trading and investment. Our priority is to help business draw up practical codes of conduct to guide operations in developing countries. This approach is based on the conviction that the best results will be achieved through partnership between governments, trade unions, businesses and NGOs in developing practical codes of conduct which can be genuinely monitored and verified.

Turning to the second part of the Director-General's Report, I very much welcome the broad thrust of the ideas. The ILO's reform efforts to date have been impressive, but we must maintain the momentum towards greater efficiency and cost-effectiveness. It is essential that the ILO's standard-setting and supervisory machinery be brought fully into line with modern labour market needs — the ILO must not be left behind in the reform movement under way across the United Nations system.

The time is right for a systematic and comprehensive review of the ILO's standard-setting machinery and in this same spirit I strongly support the Director-General's proposal to evaluate the impact of international instruments in terms of their legal, economic and social effects.

Clearly, efforts to produce new international standards must be concentrated where there is an identified need. The Director-General's proposals for a process which involves more direct consultation with the ILO's constituents over plans for future standard setting are a positive step in this direction.

In the Annex to his Report, the Director-General also puts forward detailed options on changes to the technical procedures for forming new Conventions, and these could be taken forward with immediate positive effect as part of the drive for modernization and reform.

All of this gives the ILO a full and demanding programme of work and, to conclude as I began, we all know that we shall soon be held to account at the WTO for action to strengthen the promotion and application of international labour standards. Our debate here is an essential step forward and I therefore propose that the Director-General should present the outcome of this debate to the Director-General of the WTO as firm evidence that we have taken an important step from commitment to action towards bringing new hope for a new age.

Mr. BRETT (Workers' delegate, United Kingdom) — It has become something of a ritual that the United Kingdom Workers' delegate speaks immediately after the United Kingdom Minister attending the Conference. For some years, it has provided an opportunity for me to distance the workers of Great Britain from the statements of my Government.

It is therefore with considerable pleasure that I can abandon that position and congratulate the previous speaker, my Minister, on an excellent address, that has the wholehearted support of 7 million members of the TUC who will offer to him their support.

Of particular note is the commitment of the United Kingdom Government to restore its reputation in this house and to fulfil its obligation to the ILO, and I particularly thank the Minister for his statement on the position at GCHQ and for fulfilling a commitment given by his party at the time of the ban in 1984, when they stood with the trade union movement through 13 dark years. We are indeed grateful for the speed that they have shown in putting right the injustice done to our members in 1984.

I also agree with the Minister's comments on the Director-General's Report. We too believe that action is required in the ILO to live up to the commitments made in Singapore to the promotion of core labour standards. We fear, however, that some of the honeyed words of praise for the ILO spoken at the WTO meeting were themselves more about avoiding the issue of core standards being on the WTO agenda than they were about strengthening those standards at the ILO. I trust my fear is groundless or that the vast majority of governments will join with the Workers' group in its endeavour in the Governing Body to strengthen the supervisory mechanisms of the ILO in respect of the core labour standards. If this can be better achieved by the adoption of a binding declaration, then it is a concept that we will be pleased to embrace. The core labour standards are the norms of a civilized society and it should be an obligation placed upon all member States by the membership of this Organization.

We also need to address the activities of the international actors in this rapidly globalizing world in which we live and in that we need to strengthen the ILO's work in respect of the multinational enterprises, and to find new ways of promoting the application of the Tripartite Declaration on Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy.

The initiative on social labelling is an important one. Social labelling and codes of conduct are growing in number and importance, attracting the interest and support of trade unions, employers and governments alike, as well as, importantly, wider public opinion.

In our view, the ILO should be taking a leading role in this area. The debate on the ILO's role, its scope for action, monitoring and inspection mechanisms will all attract some opposition but the consumer response in the free exercise of individual consumer choice based on authoritative and objective information is a powerful weapon for good, and such a preference cannot be seen as an act of protectionism but one of social conscience.

It gives me pleasure to commend the Director-General's Report in this small speech. All the more so that I do it following the contributions of a British minister reflecting the values that the ILO has stood for, for over three-quarters of a century, and I have to say, in stark contrast to the message brought by previous Conservative ministers over too many years.

Mr. SHERIFI (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Albania) — I would like first to convey to you my appreciation for this very important session which deals with problems of great importance for all countries throughout the world. Being a Minister for Labour and Social Affairs of the Government of National Reconciliation of Albania, created some months ago owing to the very specific situation in my country, I would mainly focus my speech on the description of this situation.

Albanian society is living through the deepest crisis in its history, the crisis of identity which is a political, institutional, economic, social, moral and spiritual crisis. On 29 June 1997, early parliamentary elections will be held in my country — a day which will mark the starting point of the revival of Albania. The Albanian reality should be treated the way it really is, without adding or omitting elements subjectively. There have been paradoxes in the development of the Albanian society. In Albania within a short period of time a stratum of millionaires has been created, but on the other side poverty is in the process of rapid increase. We have very sharp social problems. We proclaim freedom of trade unionism at a time when there is a tendency to manipulate it. There are trade unions which praise the Government for the success of the reform but there are others which protest against low standards of their well-being. The labour legislation in Albania has been prepared and it is an advanced one, but it is not properly implemented. The rate of unemployment is higher than the 13 per cent given in the official statistics.

Albania is a small country with about 3 million inhabitants, one-fifth of whom have emigrated to other countries, especially Greece and Italy, but no agreement on seasonal employment has been signed so far.

In 1932 Albania ratified the Convention on night work of women, concerning the employment of women during the night, at a time when even day work for women was scarce in Albania. But we have not yet ratified the Conventions on employment policy, on social policy or social security, which are issues of the highest importance. These may seem to be paradoxes but, as Professor Glenn Tinder of the United States observed, sometimes paradoxes may be considered as sources of development.

What is the situation in Albania concerning the issues this Conference is interested in? In Albania approximately 50,000 enterprises have been created. Some of the characteristics of this sector are that 60 per cent of enterprises were created during the period 1993-94, 65 per cent of the enterprises belong to trade and service sectors, 30 per cent of the enterprises are closed, out of which 80 per cent have closed for good. It seems that many of them have been created artificially to obtain credits which have been used later on to build houses, or to invest in pyramid investment schemes.

Only 10 per cent of the enterprises own foreign capital, 90 per cent of which is under 30 per cent of the total value. About 15 per cent of the enterprises have been founded by women. Seventy-five per cent of the owners of enterprises have not graduated from university, but only completed secondary education. About 116,000 persons are employed in the privately owned non-agricultural sector, out of which 45 per cent are self-employed. The official statistics on employment in the countryside quote a figure of 750,000 people. Consequently the number of long-term unemployed people is increasing — 50 per cent of the long-term unemployed have secondary and university education, and 58 per cent are people under 35 years of age. In the cities 92 per cent of the unemployed receive benefits, whereas in the countryside, where each individual owning a plot of land is considered as employed, the beneficiaries number only 8 per cent, regardless of the fact that their plots of land are insufficient to ensure their well-being.

In Albania the National Labour Council has been established. The first efforts are being made to create the culture of compromise among the parties in order to achieve social peace, so indispensable for the moment. Importance is paid to contractual relations and the binding nature of collective labour contracts. Until 1994 there were 1,211 binding collective labour contracts. In 1995 there were 1,884 labour contracts of this type, covering 70,000 workers, and in 1996 there were 3,430 binding labour contracts concerning 130,000 workers. The employers have hesitated in negotiating with the workers on this type of contract.

Albania, instead of being based on assistance, should be transformed into a social State. To this aim, it deserves support concerning the establishment of democratic institutions of a legal state; the assurance of credits with facilitating conditions to encourage the honest small and medium-sized enterprises; the signing of agreements on seasonal employment, particularly with the neighbouring countries, Greece and Italy; the creation of labour markets through vocational training; and the voluntary return of emigrants who may start their own business activity in Albania by receiving credits.

Original Spanish: Mr. ESPAÑA SMITH (Minister of Labour, Bolivia) — The delegation of Bolivia would at the outset like most warmly to congratulate the President on her unanimous election and to wish her every possible success in the Chair. We would also like to congratulate the Director-General for the admirable work contained in the Report, and for the recommendations on ILO standard-setting activities in the era of globalization.

As member countries of this Organization, we have resolved to uphold the core Conventions of the ILO and we recognize that the ILO is the body empowered to establish standards on the fundamental rights of workers, employers and governments as representing society as a whole.

We are also committed, indeed duty-bound, to lead our nations in the search for all forms of social progress, and that is why we are meeting, to seek the machinery that will enable us to energize our work, to ensure that economic globalization will not create a new breach that will separate forthcoming generations even further. Rather, it should lead to tangible and genuine social progress for all men and women.

To that end, international organizations such as the ILO must urge the most developed countries and the ones that stand to benefit most from this new model of relations to adopt the principles of equity and justice in the redistribution of surplus resources more convincingly than ever before.

Technological transfer incentives for formal education and vocational training leading to promotion, fair and non-discriminatory pay for women, protection of children, job creation in countries where there is much unemployment or underemployment, the conversion of the external debt into investment, education, vocational training and the establishment of non-adversarial relations between the social partners — in short, the establishment of a regime that guarantees social peace are all matters that merit very special attention, not only at meetings such as this, but also in all fora that deal with social and economic matters. We agree with the Director-General that "social progress is no longer only a matter for States". It is a crucial problem for all the social partners throughout the world.

Product quality implies criteria that are not related solely to the intrinsic value of the product, such as market competitiveness and the social criteria that apply to the manufacturing of that product. These elements have led certain transnational enterprises, and some governments, to think in terms of establishing social certificates or labels that will guarantee that these parameters have been met in production. These certificates, based on market demand, sometimes use methods that are inappropriate and far from transparent and should be regulated not by a multinational body, but in each of our countries, in keeping with general and clear standards that will guarantee that the production of all goods and services is carried out in keeping with the requisites of justice and equity.

The major upheavals caused by globalization and its economic consequences have caused obvious social problems and a solution to them is urgently needed, as the Director-General has pointed out. The protection of workers, maintaining jobs, ensuring sustained growth and better and fairer distribution of surpluses are now issues of such magnitude that solving them is no longer a matter of national policy. It is a problem facing all mankind.

Mr. TAN (Workers' delegate, Philippines) — Among the rational thinkers of our times, there can no longer be any doubt as to the role played by standard setting on a global scale in the scheme of human affairs. Realization has broadened that standards cannot and must not be different, regardless of the colour of one's skin, creed, political beliefs, station in life or accident of birth.

We are thus penetrating even deeper into a still uncharted era in world affairs to determine globally the course of human events. The setting of international standards is one such step against which henceforth every national endeavour will be assessed.

The Report of the Director-General succinctly summarizes our concern when he asserts that globalization cannot be left to its own devices. Economic progress must be accompanied by social development.

First, and on a more substantive note, we pose a challenge to the ILO to ensure more definitive actions, concrete measures, and general universality in the application of its fundamental standards. The recognition and respect for the fundamental rights of workers, enshrined in the ILO Conventions, by all of the member States and enterprises, should be further enhanced and strengthened by adopting a more appropriate and effective mechanism of application and implementation of standards, including the establishment of a regular system of supervision and processing of complaints.

On a more urgent note, we join the unanimous voice of the workers upholding the relevance of the standard-setting mechanism of the ILO, particularly in providing protection of workers in a changing and globalizing work environment. We further support the recommendation to develop this key function of the ILO into a more effective and efficient mechanism through improvements in the selection and preparation of issues for discussion in annual Conferences.

In the recent past we have pinned our hopes on the size of enterprises to generate employment that will improve the opportunities of all to better their lives. Now we want to look at how to stimulate job creation also in small and medium-sized enterprises. It is a fact that large enterprises are limited in their ability to generate employment. On the other hand, many studies would tend to show that, through subcontracting, small and medium-sized enterprises fill the crevices of backward linkages in industry. In this manner more jobs are created by them directly or indirectly.

But subcontracting would tend to expand the nefarious practice of involuntary contract labour. However hazy and problematic an international definition of contract labour has become, the stark reality of often extreme exploitation of labour remains, wherever in the globe this is practised.

Often, we hear that radical changes in employment arrangements are necessary in a world shrinking into a global village. Before the altars of global competition many labour standards, heretofore held sacred, are fast eroding and being made more flexible. But for the same rationale of globalization, so must international labour standards be drawn appropriately.

It used to be the case that international Conventions with Recommendations would trigger the panic bells of many governments and almost all employers. Nowadays, among our more enlightened and forward-looking partners in the shaping of global social policy, the importance of international labour standards has been accepted; perhaps because it appears to be the only means left to temper the rapacity that unrestrained global competition would foist on the human race on this all too fragile and as yet only planet where we all live.

For those who think this way, with them we wish to cooperate and forge ahead in creating the exciting possibilities of the global village. For those who think otherwise, let them remain in their tribal prisons and be content with being left far behind.

Mr. MUHAMMAD MUMUNI (Minister of Employment and Social Welfare, Ghana) — It is a great privilege for me to address this august body and I would like to take this opportunity to convey to the President, on behalf of my delegation and on my own behalf, friendly greetings from the Government and people of Ghana on the occasion of the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference.

May I join the speaker before me in expressing my sincere congratulations to the President and the Officers on their election to preside over the deliberations of this session.

The theme of this 85th Session, namely, The ILO, standard setting and globalization, is very appropriate as it seeks to address one of the most serious concerns of working people throughout the world. The world is rapidly moving towards increased economic liberalization, and with it increased competitiveness and productivity. In spite of its apparent benefits to world trade, this phenomenon nevertheless poses a great threat to social progress and the rights of workers.

The ILO is therefore faced with a greater challenge now than ever before in ensuring that the process of globalization does not result in the marginalization of the working people and the curtailment of their benefits and rights, nor the fostering of inequalities between peoples and countries.

It is the view of my delegation that the need for standards and the link between standard setting, corporate growth and performance should be appreciated and put in the right perspective. Indeed, if standard setting and compliance were rightly understood as instruments for promoting corporate excellence and the socio-economic development of nations, the need for maintaining the highest standards of labour would become a cherished responsibility for nations and corporate bodies alike.

In Ghana a number of initiatives involving wide consultation with all tripartite partners have recently been taken to ensure that some of the many difficulties that have afflicted labour are addressed systematically. The momentum of this process would be maintained until a reasonable degree of consistency and fairness is achieved.

As part of this process, the Government commissioned an independent study into the distortions in the public sector salary structure as well as the rather wide disparities between the public sector and the private sector. The aim has been to identify the specific distortions in order to take the necessary steps to remove the growing inequality between the private and public sector and set the basis for a sustainable medium- and long-term incomes policy for Ghana.

Another area of concern to us is the integration of the functions of labour and factory inspection, which, experience elsewhere in the world has confirmed, not only ensures the maximization of the use of scarce resources but also results in increased productivity and greater success with regard to standard setting. In this regard Ghana would welcome the assistance and support of the ILO.

My Ministry is furthermore actively engaged in collaboration with the Ministry of Environment and the Environmental Protection Agency to keep track of industries, mines, loggers, fishermen, farmers and hunters whose activities pollute and degrade the environment, to ensure that the environment is protected and sustained in the course of their economic activities.

Having said this, I would like to reiterate that economic progress, social justice and fundamental rights require that nations in primary commodity production receive fair prices for their products and acquire easy access to global markets, if the process of globalization is to have any meaning for the vast majority of working people in the developing world.

In conclusion, may I observe that the challenge for the further development of standards in relation to changes in the international environment needs to be conceived in terms of the degree to which standards ensure for all of us social justice and economic progress.

Mr. FALBR (Workers' delegate, Czech Republic) — I would like to start my short intervention by stating that the Czech Workers' delegation highly appreciates the Report of the Director-General submitted for this year's debate and considers it of particular importance for the future development of the Organization. We agree with the Director-General that the current programme of globalization offers at the same time new opportunities for strengthening and improving ILO activities, especially the strengthening of standard-setting and supervisory mechanisms. There is no doubt that the globalization and liberalization of world trade jeopardizes the basic workers' and trade union rights. So it is the ILO which is expected to use its full mandate to play a decisive role in the future promotion of the social dimension within the process of globalization and in the fair distribution of the benefits arising from the global economy.

We appreciate the efforts the ILO is making to ensure the universal ratification of the core Conventions. There is no doubt that these fundamental Conventions represent one of the most important instruments for the protection of the workers and human rights, and they should be fully implemented and observed.

In the region of Central and Eastern Europe and in the Czech Republic we see, as in many other countries of the world, a strong drive against the trade unions. The present Government of the Czech Republic has made many attempts to violate trade union rights, the last one being the proposal of a Bill on strikes which in fact made strikes impossible. It was only after our strong reaction that the proposal was withdrawn.

We also fully support the proposals of the Director-General's Report concerning the ILO social labelling. Although there are many doubts about how such a system will function, we are convinced that this idea should be further worked out within the ILO bodies and the governments should consider it very seriously. In this context I would like to stress the necessity of the future close cooperation between the ILO and the WTO. Within the framework of these relations, the ILO should also pay appropriate attention to the proposal of the social clause. Everybody knows that this idea was put aside during the Singapore summit, but it must not be forgotten.

The governments in Singapore committed themselves to promoting the application of the core ILO Conventions and we will be very glad if the governments can understand and take the social clause not as a means of protectionism but as another significant instrument for the promotion of social justice.

Finally, let me say one general remark concerning the region of Central and Eastern Europe. All our countries are passing through a very difficult period of transition and facing plenty of social and economic problems that have a negative impact on the workers' social and living conditions. Many economic policies have already failed. As you have certainly noticed, the famous neo-liberal model of the Czech Prime Minister Klaus has recently also failed. I remember the lessons he was giving to all Western countries — how to build capitalism. Now, at a recent meeting we heard Mr. Klaus advocating social dialogue. It always happens when things are normal, nobody listens when labour talks. When trouble starts then everybody wants to speak to the unions.

In conclusion we appreciate the assistance the ILO has been providing and is ready to provide in the future.

Original Spanish: Mr. ARENAS BOCANEGRA (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Spain) — I would like to begin, Madam, by congratulating you on your election to conduct the work of this Conference and for the great skill that you have demonstrated in so doing. I would like to express my full agreement with the contents of the Report by the Director-General to the effect that the Organization and its constituents are the ones which must take up the instruments and procedures that will respond to the needs of societies and models of economic activity that are completely different from what we have known hitherto.

I consequently support the proposal of the Director-General to revitalize the international labour standards procedure by publicly stating first that we are committed to the principles that are contained in the ILO's Constitution and in the Philadelphia Declaration. We are convinced that in those words there are obligations that pertain to all the member States. Second, we are also convinced that it is the duty of the ILO to set up the right multilateral legal framework that will effectively guarantee that globalization and the liberalization of international trade will always go hand in hand with social progress and improved living and working conditions. Third, we are also quite sure that it is necessary to have universal compliance with human rights in the workplace as enshrined in the ILO Conventions on freedom of association, collective bargaining, prohibition of forced labour, the absence of discrimination and the requirement for a minimum working age. Furthermore, we are convinced of the need for the ILO to step up the world campaign to achieve greater ratification of the Conventions by those States that have not yet done so.

I wish to focus on the elaboration and discussion of a draft solemn declaration that, rather like the Philadelphia Declaration, will serve to define the duties of the member States regarding their basic social rights. I would like also to express my support, in the name of the Spanish Government, for the work that is being done and measures proposed by the Director-General to reinforce the respect for basic workers' rights at the place of work through the establishment of periodic reports on the degree to which these standards are being met by the member States. This, along with tripartite discussion, makes it possible for public opinion to assess the genuine efforts undertaken by each country to translate economic development emerging from the globalization and liberalization of trade into real social progress.

Spain supports the ILO's standard-setting activities, as shown by the fact that our country continues to be the member State with the highest number of Conventions ratified, 126 in fact, subsequent to the most recent ratification of the Safety and Health in Mines Convention, 1995 (No. 176). Furthermore, in order to further demonstrate Spain's readiness to cooperate with the Organization, I will refer to Spain's efforts in the last 12 months in applying many of the principles on which the ILO's life is based.

Two of the core Conventions, Nos. 87 and 98, are at the root of social dialogue and the participation of the social partners in the establishment of the right conditions for good labour relations. The ratification 20 years ago by Spain of these two Conventions was celebrated this February by a visit from the Director-General to Spain. The Government of Spain wishes to help the recovery of social dialogue which had deteriorated, and I think we can say that dialogue among the social partners has not only improved — it has in fact become very strong, sometimes tripartite, sometimes bipartite — but the outcome has been a series of agreements on some of the most crucial aspects of labour relations, employment and social protection within the framework of ever greater trade liberalization and economic globalization. This has promoted first and foremost competitiveness, but without detracting from solidarity. In less than a year, we have managed to achieve extra-judicial solution of labour disputes, with regard to vocational training, occupational safety and health, consolidation of social security and employment.

The most representative trade union organizations — the UGT and Comisiones Obreras — and the employers' organization (CEOE) and the small and medium-sized enterprise representatives have all reached an agreement in Spain which demonstrates its high level of responsibility, for it makes it possible to generate more jobs and ensure a future that will be marked by the search for dynamic and stable employment rather than temporary or precarious jobs.

I will close by saying that this very significant experience we have had in the field of labour relations in Spain, which is now beginning to bear fruit and is exemplified by political agreement and a process of economic recovery, does in fact confirm what was said by the Director-General in his Report, with regard to the need for institutional support so as to achieve the right kind of balance between competitiveness on the one hand and solidarity on the other.

I have to close these remarks and I wish in so doing to support all the proposals made in the Director-General's Report and to show that, as always, Spain is ready to cooperate in the organizational and technical fields in the ILO's programmes. As I have said many times, we are on the eve of the twenty-first century and our societies cannot work if they are not competitive, but on the other hand they will not be desirable if they show no solidarity. Therefore, the challenge for the new century is to combine competitiveness and solidarity. Spain is and will remain determined to achieve this.

Original Arabic: Mr. MONGY (Workers' adviser, Egypt) — On behalf of the workers of Egypt and on my own behalf, I would like to congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents on their election, while expressing the hope that this session will move us closer to making the principles and noble objectives of the ILO into a reality.

For Egyptian workers, our participation in the Conference comes at a special time, as it follows democratic and free elections which were held last year and which set up new union structures, with posts filled for a five-year period.

The structural adjustment programmes and policies and the privatization currently under way in Egypt have for some years now placed a heavy burden and new responsibilities on the trade union movement in our country. We are facing transformations which are inseparable from the changes on the international scene. The understanding and cooperation of all interested parties is required if we are to strike a balance between the higher interests of society and those of the workers who, need I remind you, represent the majority of the population.

The Director-General's Report, The ILO, standard setting and globalization, is very timely, especially as international labour standards have become very important, and it is important to promote them at the international level. They must be universally recognized. These standards were referred to at the Copenhagen Summit, and they must be taken into consideration at the highest decision-making levels. Indeed, they must be reflected in social and economic reality. In this context we would like to express our satisfaction with the Ministerial Declaration issued by the World Trade Organization in Singapore at the end of last year, which acknowledged that the ILO is the competent body to set international labour standards. For us, the workers of Egypt, and I think also for the workers of many other developing countries, this is important because it puts paid to attempts to link international labour standards to trade. We support most of the proposals made by the Director-General to strengthen the supervisory machinery for international labour standards. But we would like to express our reservations as regards the supervisory system. There has been a proposal for an inspection system, as part of a voluntary international labour Convention, which would make it possible for each State to freely decide whether all the products manufactured in its territory would be eligible for the global social label. This proposal could be exploited by some to make free trade linked to the standards. This we cannot accept — even if it is voluntary. We are afraid that the ILO might be pushed into a field which is not its own, and that its machinery could be improperly used to marginalize the developing countries and to keep them from benefiting from the fruits of globalization, leaving them subjected to unemployment and poverty.

We would like to express our support for any measure that strengthens and maintains the role of the ILO in its standard setting activities. We would like the ILO to continue to work for the effective application of international Conventions by consolidating the principle of tripartism in law and in practice at the international, national and regional levels. The new needs and rapid changes in today's world must be taken into consideration when we select subjects for new standards. All forms of technical assistance must be provided to the member States which face problems in ratifying and implementing the international labour Conventions, as especially the core Conventions.

We would like to pay tribute to the efforts made by the Director-General, to prepare the Appendix to his Report devoted to the situation of Palestinian workers in the occupied Arab territories. We regret that our hopes and the hopes of pacifists all over the world are not always taken into consideration. The situation has been constantly deteriorating since May 1996. The International Labour Conference — which reflects the conscience of the world because of its tripartite composition — must express its support and continued solidarity with the Arab workers in Palestine and in the other occupied Arab territories, where men and women suffer from oppression, unemployment and poverty, so that the occupation of Palestine, the Golan Heights and southern Lebanon is brought to an end so that a just and comprehensive peace can be established, and so that the region can concentrate its energies and resources on improving all its peoples' living and working conditions.

In the same context, we appeal for solidarity and support with the peoples and workers of Libya and Iraq, with a view to lifting the embargoes imposed on them, and which not only cause them suffering but also negatively affect the lives of millions of people in neighbouring countries and in countries farther afield.

Mr. LATIEF (Minister of Manpower, Indonesia) — The topic which we are preparing to discuss at this session of the Conference is of the greatest importance since it has a crucial bearing on the lives of so many people. Indeed, we are gathered here to represent people from independent countries which are slaving and struggling to improve the quality of life and welfare of all their peoples as we ourselves are doing for the workers in our own country.

As a developing country we do not have either the potential or the access to determine market prices whether for the export or the import of goods as we are simply the price-takers. We therefore have to pay high prices for both capital goods and imported raw materials from the developed countries. The same goes for the price of our exports and we are thus forced to sell them at relatively low prices.

This certainly does not mean that we practice political dumping or that we use this strategy to promote our competitiveness. In this respect, developing and poor countries are not in a position to practice political dumping of this kind. Unfortunately, this reality is not spelt out in the Report of the ILO Director-General.

Furthermore, the same erroneous conclusions are implicit in the report of the Working Party on the Social Dimensions of the Liberalization of International Trade when it states that the developing countries have largely benefited from the gains created through international trade. This is simply based on false assumptions. Given the international trade mechanisms mentioned above, most of the gains derived from international trade are in fact enjoyed by the developed countries and we are of the mind that the ILO should conduct an in-depth study on this subject before the wrong conclusions are drawn at random. It should also be mentioned that Indonesia has substantially suffered from the activities of certain groups which have resorted to manipulating workers simply for their own political interests. The situation and cases have, as a result, had detrimental effects on our national economic development as well as on the workers. We should therefore distinguish between the true struggle of the workers to protect their interests and this gross manipulation of a certain group whose political aim is the exploitation of workers' interests. Companies, if not whole sectors of the economy, stand to suffer from this state of affairs as it disrupts the peace and harmony which should characterize labour relations.

As an ILO Member, Indonesia has put to good use the agreed ILO principles, either by directly ratifying several Conventions or indirectly adopting those principles through the creation of various legal instruments which incorporate them. None the less, it must be added that several ILO Conventions have now reached a state of irrelevance in regard to today's labour conditions. It is therefore very important that those Conventions be reviewed and revised, including the so-called core or fundamental labour standards, in order better to prepare the labour conditions of the twenty-first century.

Indonesia highly appreciates the ongoing efforts undertaken in the field of activities linked to standard setting. These guiding principles are basic guidelines intended to enable the States to take concrete measures aimed at materializing the noble aims of social justice, a mandate of the Constitution of the ILO. In this respect, I would like to reiterate the fact that the ILO is a voluntary association of governments that cannot impose the ratification of these standards and recommendations upon the member States. Such an attempt would be in total violation of the fundamental principle of international law, that is respect for state sovereignty.

My delegation can only endorse the efforts undertaken to have more ILO Conventions ratified by as many ILO member States as possible while at the same time assisting the member States to overcome the difficulties they may encounter in fulfilling this goal. Furthermore, the need for sanctions would be reduced as a result since the latter undoubtedly create a climate of tension which is detrimental to the workers. We also have to note, unfortunately, that some countries, especially developed ones, are applying double standards in this respect.

International trade and the application of labour standards are two different matters and are handled by two different institutions. Although they are related to one another, there are, nevertheless, cases when they should be kept separate. The WTO and other related institutions have a prime mandate to deal with international trade and evaluate the weaknesses of trade mechanisms. Indonesia is of the view that attempts made to link labour standards with the comparative advantages of the developing countries in free world trade are clearly in contradiction with the understanding and decisions agreed upon and contained in the WTO Singapore Ministerial Declaration.

Before concluding I would like to briefly address another subject. That is the plight of the Palestinian people who live in abject economic conditions as Israel continues to curtail their opportunities for a decent livelihood. Under various pretexts Israel is not only causing Palestinian unemployment to soar but is also depressing living standards, disrupting whatever limited commercial activity is still possible there and generally bringing the economy of the newly autonomous areas to the brink of collapse.

By way of conclusion, I would just like to invite us all to carry out and protect the noble interests of the ILO, free from the interference of certain groups.

Original Spanish: Mr. NAVARRO MOREIRA (Minister of Labour, Nicaragua) — May I offer the President my heartfelt congratulations and my very best wishes for success in her important task.

As was the case 13 years ago, the Director-General has submitted his Report on the standard-setting activities of the ILO and on this occasion he has set it within the context of globalization. Trade liberalization and the globalization of the economy have led to the need to revise and update the existing body of standards. They have further strengthened the meaning of the fundamental rights of workers and, for this reason, it is a great pleasure for me to attend and participate in the decision to amend the Constitution that will be adopted at this session of the Conference.

My Government endorses the activities to promote the essential conditions for social progress which should draw on the principles enshrined in the ILO Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia. We support the universal recognition of fundamental rights, in particular the rights of freedom of association, collective bargaining, the ban on forced labour, including child labour, equality of treatment and non-discrimination. We are well aware that social progress is a task that does not pertain exclusively to governments; it is also up to manufacturing and marketing enterprises and consumers to play their part. There should therefore be tripartite consultation to correctly allocate the fruits and benefits of globalization so that it can improve the various sectors of society in our respective countries.

We support the Director-General's proposal to prepare a periodic report on global social progress, followed by a tripartite debate. We concur wholeheartedly with what has been presented in the second part of the Director-General's Report, endorsing the effectiveness of fashioning standards to be enacted through international law. We endorse and support all efforts to opt for a better method of selection and evaluation especially to ensure that the instruments emanating from this session of the Conference are given the status they deserve.

Let me state once again that Nicaragua respects, and will continue to respect, the principles of the ILO Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia in our endeavours to promote peace and social justice. Some of the instruments enshrining these principles and which are to be adopted by the International Labour Conference, may need to be reworked, taking into account the advances made in trade liberalization and the globalization of the economy, so that countries like my own can draw full advantage from their provisions.

In conclusion, I would like to share with you the greetings of the people of Nicaragua, and express our greetings to all the participants at this 85th Session of the International Labour Conference. Once again, let me state that we intend to strive wholeheartedly to work for a more worthy, democratic, peaceful and free world.

Mr. ARUNACHALAM (Union Labour Minister, India) — Let me first congratulate Mrs. Keltošová on her election as the President of the Conference. I would also like to thank the Director-General of the ILO for submitting his Report, The ILO, standard setting and globalization.

The purpose of economic development is to promote social progress consistent with human dignity and social justice. The ILO should promote labour standards in accordance with the Constitution and regard them as benchmarks for development, fully recognizing the difficulties in their application and implementation for developing countries, as progress in this field will relieve poverty, unemployment and deprivation.

We are a constitutional and functional democracy fully committed to economic development, social progress, freedom of association and social justice. We are also fully committed to the principles enshrined in the ILO Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia. We are actively participating in the process of adoption of ILO Conventions and Recommendations, and have so far ratified as many as 37 ILO Conventions. I am happy to inform the Conference that we are in the process of ratifying some more ILO Conventions.

My Government supports the ILO's role in promoting the ratification and implementation of the fundamental Conventions. The principles enshrined in ILO Conventions, such as freedom of association, collective bargaining, non-discrimination and freedom from any form of bondage or exploitation, are also part of our Constitution, and are enforceable through our independent judiciary. Three of the fundamental Conventions, that is Convention No. 39, Convention No. 100 and Convention No. 111, have already been ratified by my country, and we are in the process of ratifying the fourth one, Convention No. 105. The principles of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 are applicable to all industrial workers in India under national laws and regulations. We face some technical difficulties in ratifying these Conventions because of the special position accorded to civil servants who none the less enjoy constitutional safeguards and have access to special grievance and redressal mechanisms.

We believe that Convention No. 29 and Convention No. 138 are insufficient as regards the problems of child labour. Therefore we will invite you to adopt the new instrument to prohibit the most intolerable and exploitive forms of child labour under the double discussion procedure to take place during 1998-99, which subscribes to the view that ILO Conventions should be implemented effectively by utilizing the ILO's existing procedures. The most effective means of implementation of labour standards is to promote the universal ratification of core labour Conventions. The proposal to adopt the declaration on core standards and to extend the existing special procedure applicable to freedom of association will undermine the voluntary character of ratification of ILO Conventions. If there are inadequacies in the existing supervisory procedures, we should take recourse to the ILO Constitution for finding effective remedies.

We appreciate the need to initiate action at the national and international levels to address concerns relating to social progress such as environmental issues, occupational health and safety, etc. However, we have noticed with concern, an increasing tendency amongst the various international organizations under the United Nations system to assume roles for which they have no mandate and to encroach upon areas where others have been entrusted with the task. These tendencies lead to an overlapping of functions and responsibilities, thus creating an unnecessary burden on national governments in the form of reporting obligations on the same subject. Matters relating to international labour standards should be dealt with exclusively in the ILO.

In the name of achieving social progress, we see the ILO moving into areas which are beyond its mandate. We cannot therefore accept the proposal for overall social labels and mechanisms of international action through the ILO. We believe that the alternative way forward must be found to promote the ILO's work related to labour standards with the objective of securing the dignity and welfare of workers in accordance with the objectives of the ILO Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia. The ILO must pursue labour standards in their own right as an integral part of the process of societies linking them to the process of development in assisting the attainment of higher standards of liberal trade to which my country and my Government are fully committed. The ILO must focus on all three areas of its work. Namely, standard setting, technical cooperation and analysis of labour trends.

Mr. TREU (Minister of Labour, Italy) — I think we are all aware that we are discussing crucial issues at this Conference which have to do with how to manage the globalization of the economy and also the globalization of social standards and this implies also a reconsideration of the role of the ILO in this respect. We have discussed these issues in quite a few recent national and international meetings. We have indicated possible solutions but the theme remains controversial so I think we need more reflection.

A first point which I want to make is that the balance between economic and social progress is possible but it is difficult. It is difficult in developed countries. I think it is more difficult if we have an international scenario with great disparities in employment and living conditions. So if this is true, I think that major efforts must be made in order to link the issue of standards, even basic standards, to the promotion of growth and development. It is not enough in this area, less so than in any other, simply to say that legal standards are necessary. What is important is to remove the causes that hinder the improvement of labour standards and to create the conditions for general progress towards this end. Therefore I think the initiatives which go in this direction — technical assistance cooperation, improving working and living conditions throughout the world — must have priority.

A second point is that we need to take a gradual and proactive approach, more than a deterministic and normative outlook. The gradual aspect does not mean postponing the decision indefinitely, it means linking the implementation of standards to the level of social and economic development of different countries. I think that this gradual and proactive approach is important if we want to improve mutual understanding and create a climate of confidence. Because only mutual confidence can pave the way for the acceptance of more binding commitments towards the targets which are indicated in the Report of the Director-General.

Time has not passed in vain however. I think it is important to acknowledge that consensus has grown on quite a few important points. The need to improve the standard-setting procedures, the need to widen the coverage and the acceptance of existing ILO Conventions and also the importance of focusing efforts on basic principles. Those, as the Director-General says, which have more added value.

Furthermore, it is important that here too, even though we have heard a variety of statements, the role of the ILO has been largely acknowledged. The ILO has received a stronger mandate in this field and the Italian Government believes that the ILO has the legitimacy, the experience and the strength to fully implement its traditional role with the new tasks which come from the new world. The Report of the Director-General has indicated some proposals which we consider appropriate, realistic and useful. He particularly supports the idea of a declaration, a declaration which will make explicit some basic principles and fundamental standards which are implicit in the ILO Constitution and therefore should be a target respected by all sectors and all markets. A more proactive role for the ILO in setting and promoting these principles is important in order also to reduce the risk of unilateral and protectionistic initiatives. Protectionist unilateral moves may give to individual countries some short-lived advantages but be detrimental to long-term common development by undermining this consensual approach which is essential for the implementation of common objectives.

Then, if we move from the principles to the ways and means to implement them, here we have even more controversial ground. The existing ILO supervisory system certainly must and can be improved, but I think it is advisable to discuss, to exchange views, in order to detect those instruments which can be reasonably accepted and which can be seen by all countries as objectives, because of course there are different perspectives here. And I think that the monitoring and supervisory action of the ILO must also be geared more to the promotion of good practices than to the imposition and ratification of legal regulations. The Report on social progress in the world goes in this direction.

Finally, let me underline that the Director-General's Report constitutes a realistic basis for discussion and for action. In the years ahead the ILO will be confronted with major challenges which will certainly increase its responsibility. Market globalization is a great opportunity for economic growth. We would like the opportunities to be shared equally among the various countries, but this will not happen automatically. Global markets, in the same way or in fact more so than local markets, need to be guided and accompanied by both political and regulatory action. I stress the importance of both. The challenge is not only to improve regulations but to promote better policies aimed at sustaining growth and social welfare. The ILO is in a key position to play these roles due to the tradition and experience in trilateral consensus building. The ILO perspective is particularly appropriate to see together the needs of the markets and the values of the people. That is the importance of social cohesion and welfare. The Italian Government is committed to support this role of the ILO present and future and all the initiatives that starting from the outcome of this Conference we contribute to pursue a better balance between economic and social progress.

Original German: Mr. KISS (Minister of Labour, Hungary) — I would like to pass on to the Director-General the appreciation of the Hungarian Government for the activities of the International Labour Organization.

The ILO, standard setting and globalization, the Report of the Director-General, discusses most relevant issues. We have been analysing the impacts of globalization for years, both here at the ILO and other international fora. One of our main conclusions so far is that these impacts can vary to a large extent. However, we would all like them to be equally favourable, bringing about economic prosperity and social progress.

Responsibility for that rests first of all with governments. However, our current challenge to find a solution to the most crucial dilemma of balancing social equity against market efficiency is more difficult than ever. We can only hope to reach an effective solution together, on the basis of social consensus, through dialogue with the social partners.

In full awareness of this shared responsibility, our Government, together with the social partners, drew up a work programme to strengthen the institutions of social dialogue. Our major efforts are aimed at promoting collective agreements, accelerating the settlement of labour disputes, strengthening labour inspection and further developing tripartite consultation.

We count on the ILO's professional assistance with respect to all of these activities. It is my conviction that we are not the only ones to ask for this in the Central and Eastern European region.

The ILO Budapest Office has taken an active part in the elaboration of our work programme. We would like to rely upon their invaluable professional assistance in the future, and I would also like to thank them for their efforts so far here at this forum.

I fully agree with the statement of the Director-General that joint action to influence the impact of globalization should be taken at the international level. The most suitable forum for that is, beyond doubt, the ILO, as was reaffirmed by the Social Summit and more recently by the WTO Ministerial Conference. We place great hopes in the professional guidance of the ILO in the elaboration of the social dimension of globalization.

The Report of the Director-General is yet further proof that these expectations are well founded. In what follows, let me briefly comment on the main points of the Report.

The Hungarian Government gives its full support to the expansion of ratification of the ILO Conventions embodying fundamental human rights. We have already ratified these core Conventions, with one exception. To demonstrate our commitment to the objectives of the ILO, we intend to ratify the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138). Let me note here that our current legislation actually exceeds the requirements of the Convention on this issue in providing for a minimum age that is one year higher.

We also support the idea of a solemn declaration aimed at universal respect for fundamental workers' rights.

I welcome the innovative idea of qualifying the products of various countries with what has been described as an "overall social label". Although its implementation raises many theoretical and practical problems, the Governing Body will be the appropriate forum to settle these satisfactorily.

I also agree with the proposals of the Director-General urging a more targeted choice of subjects for a more effective implementation of Conventions, more thorough preparation and regular evaluation.

Overall, I believe that the proposals of the Report and those made by the Conference will together mark out the path to follow in order to achieve progress towards harmonizing equity and efficiency, and therefore ensuring that everyone benefits from the positive results of globalization.

It is in this spirit that I wish the Conference success in its further work.

Original French: Ms. SMET (Minister of Employment and Labour, Belgium) — The Report of the Director-General and also the subjects debated in the technical committees help us to attack several specific questions resulting from globalization. That subject gained greater credibility at the ministerial meeting of the WTO held last December at the same time that the competence of the ILO was confirmed for the definition and implementation of fundamental labour standards.

We should not undergo globalization. It cannot be used as a justification for policies or practices which are harmful to social progress. Nevertheless it does lead States and enterprises to adapt to the harsh realities of international competition. Workers must better understand this context and take account of it in their attitudes in order to avoid suffering dramatically from it. In bringing together governments, employers' organizations and workers' organizations, the ILO has been called upon to play a strategic role in managing the effects of globalization.

For this reason I appreciate the fact that the Director-General's Report has made a series of suggestions, intended on the one hand to strengthen and to concentrate the standard-setting system of its work, and also to bring together the various initiatives in order to develop social labels. The ILO and States should periodically re-evaluate its means of action if it wishes to continue to be convincing. For my part I should like the ILO to make increasingly effective the Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy. A context of restructuring and closure of enterprises has led me to call upon the Office to give an interpretation concerning the respect of local practices in employment policy.

Furthermore I should like to highlight the fact that more and more enterprises are aware of the responsibilities they shoulder in an increasingly global context. Initiatives are flourishing throughout the world to think about a new relationship between business and society. These initiatives should be expressly encouraged. The Enterprise Forum organized last November moves along these lines and I encourage the ILO to participate in this growing awareness.

Our primary task however is that of ensuring that our mission can be fulfilled in promoting the fundamental labour standards. I agree with the idea that membership of the ILO entails minimum obligations with regard to fundamental labour standards. I support the idea of a declaration in order to legitimate the supervision of fundamental labour standards which could cover all member States. Next year we should decide about the terms of strengthening the monitoring of those standards. The ratification of the most recent modern standards adopted is also an important sign of this trend. As far as I am concerned the ratification of Convention No. 171 on night work is highly significant in terms of employment policy, and also in terms of equality between men and women.

As to the other subjects of the Conference, I observe that they all contribute to redefining essential requirements for the legal and economic framework in which our enterprises must situate themselves.

Small and medium-sized enterprises, which create most of global employment, are worthy of particular attention. In certain Western countries they should benefit from programmes for reducing their administrative, fiscal and social burdens.

For these enterprises, economic subcontracting offers considerable opportunities which may be employment-generating. However, I am not unaware of the pressure that may be brought to bear upon workers who are asked to show more and more flexibility. In Belgium we are in favour of rules for governing such practices. Rules which are flexible but which nevertheless guarantee equality of treatment amongst workers, irrespective of the legal nature of their labour relation.

For a more effective management of the labour market we must also accept the idea that private enterprise will cooperate with the public sector. It is no longer the status of an enterprise that guarantees the best distribution of resources or efficiency. This is the merit of discussions on Convention No. 96, demonstrating that we have taken note of this trend.

In the very active sector of training and placement, at the end of proceedings we will have a modern standard which reconciles competition, cooperation and complementarity between the private and the public sector.

I am pleased to be able to come to the ILO because I am sure that the Organization, to which my country is most attached, retains its ability to call into question and to make proposals concerning the major issues in the world of work. This is indeed the case this year. I hope that our work will help us to find the appropriate responses.

Original French: Mr. CHOTARD (Government delegate, France) — Mrs. Martine Aubry, who is Minister of Employment and Solidarity, asked me to say to you how sorry she is not able to be here today.

You are well aware of how supportive she is of the ILO's ideals, of the values enshrined in this tripartite international Organization, and of the goals that it pursues, which are increasingly important at this time, as the economy becomes ever more international in nature.

Mrs. Aubry has thus asked me to take part in this discussion by presenting the position of the French Government regarding the Director-General's Report. But first, if I may, I would like to congratulate the President on her election to chair this prestigious meeting.

The main ambition of our Organization, ever since 1919, has been to establish a body of international labour legislation. Since then, however, the world has radically changed. Still, the need for universal rules is greater than ever before in our open and multipolar world, where values and points of reference can quickly become blurred.

Today once again we have to try to respond to the two pressing questions that have been put to our Organization ever since it came into existence:

— How, despite all of the obstacles, can international labour legislation be made as effective as possible?

— How can we build a foundation of fundamental human rights in the workplace that is genuinely universal?

The Director-General and the Office have prepared a report on this subject that is both coherent and imaginative.

France fully supports the ideas and proposals contained in this remarkable document.

I should like to draw attention to a few aspects of the two themes that I have just referred to.

I will look first at the need to revitalize the system of standards. This system is in a way a victim of its own success. Because of its large scope and its resulting complexity, an extra effort must be made to ensure that the system is coherent.

The Governing Body Tripartite Working Party on Policy regarding the Revision of Standards has already discussed certain aspects of this matter. A close review of each of the Conventions is under way at the moment. In my view, the very interesting work that has been done on this occasion should be published. Furthermore, I believe the Office should now begin to turn to governments to encourage them to denounce certain old Conventions while simultaneously ratifying the more recent ones that replace them.

In order to improve the preparation of new instruments, the French delegation strongly hopes that the Director-General will very soon follow up on the practical and innovative proposals that are contained in the annex to the Report.

Finally, for the more distant future, we strongly support the idea of preliminary discussions being held on what might be called the consolidation of the standards by major theme. The publication by the Office of the existing standards organized under the chapter headings should indeed serve as a precious indication as to how this can be done.

Secondly, I should like to turn to the most important question, fundamental workers' rights. I can only state once again the importance that my country attaches to the adoption of a solemn declaration at the next session of the Conference. This declaration should be the response of ILO member States to the appeals that were launched in Copenhagen and Singapore.

With this in mind, the Office's activities for more extensive ratification of international standards should continue. Perhaps one part of the Director-General's annual Report could systematically address the question of the fundamental standards that could be better understood thanks to the surveys conducted under article 19 of the Constitution. Here too, it is vital to have a real awareness of the complex reality in the social sphere in our world.

As for the question of social labelling as it is described in the Report, this has already given rise to considerable discussion and to some negative reactions. The fact is that throughout the world there is already a plethora of labels appearing, and we certainly cannot ignore this question. Let us therefore take it up in a calm tripartite dialogue, as our Organization is well equipped for such a discussion.

In conclusion, I would like to recall that we should bear in mind that behind our discussions on political and legal themes lies an extremely important reality, for our task is the improvement, throughout the world, of the daily lives of working men and women.

Original Turkish: Mr. ÇELIK (Minister of Labour and Social Security, Turkey) — Madam President, it gives me pleasure to address the Conference with you in the Chair. I wish to congratulate Madam Olga Keltošová, the Minister of Labour of the Slovak Republic, a country with which Turkey enjoys friendly relations, on her election as President of this august body.

I am confident that under her able leadership the work of the Conference will come to a successful conclusion. I wish also to extend my congratulations to the distinguished members of the Bureau. Moreover I wish to congratulate the distinguished Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, for addressing in his annual Report a current important theme, globalization and the standard-setting role of the ILO. I believe that it will be useful to translate the outcome of our discussions on the valuable views and proposals contained in the Report into concrete actions. I hasten to add my conviction that this Conference will contribute to the establishment of social justice and social progress all over the world.

In the view of my Government all workers should benefit in an equitable manner from the increase in welfare resulting from liberalization in international trade, and globalization should be achieved in conjunction with social progress. Therefore measures to be taken by the ILO to that effect deserve our support.

Since its foundation the ILO has been successfully playing its role in standard setting and supervision with an understanding of democracy and participation and with the necessary structures in keeping with its fundamental objectives such as democracy, full employment, social justice and social peace.

The final Declaration of the World Summit for Social Development held in Copenhagen in 1995 emphasized that the ILO, as the most appropriate and the only competent body in the working life and social matters at the international level, should play a leading role in these matters. This view was once again reaffirmed in the Declaration adopted at the Ministerial Conference of the World Trade Organization held in Singapore in 1996.

At a time when the world is going through a rapid process of globalization, Turkey supports the Director-General's proposals calling for the adoption of an additional declaration that will become binding for all member States of the ILO and will place workers' fundamental human rights under more strict guarantees, irrespective of whether such Conventions are ratified by them or not. In the same vein, provided that they be implemented effectively, we find noteworthy the Director-General's proposals calling for the adoption of new Recommendations which would be supervised both by national and international tripartite structures. Thus the benefits of globalization could be streamlined towards the objectives of social progress.

The Director-General's proposals on social labelling and the social code, which we believe could be taken up at a later stage, deserve serious consideration. It will be most useful if these proposals are elaborated technically by the working group which has been continuing its work in the Governing Body on the social dimensions of international trade.

In addition to Conventions Nos. 87, 98, 100, 105 and 111 of the seven ILO core Conventions concerning workers' basic rights which Turkey has already ratified, Convention No. 29 on the abolition of forced labour and Convention No. 138 on the minimum age for admission to employment have been submitted to the Parliament for ratification. Moreover, my Ministry has already submitted Convention No. 159 on vocational rehabilitation and employment of the disabled for examination. Thus, protective provisions which already exist in Turkish legislation in these areas have been further strengthened by ratification of Conventions Nos. 29, 138 and 159.

Before concluding I would like to point to the problems faced by migrant workers which have reached serious dimensions at present. The problems encountered by migrant workers in the countries they live in, and at their place of work, stem from discriminatory and intolerant practices that in some cases have reached the level of xenophobia. We welcome the fact that such issues continue to be included in the ILO's focus of work. We hope that in order to find solutions to these problems the ILO will continue to pursue continued cooperation with countries receiving and sending migrant workers.

Mr. BRADFORD (Minister of Labour, New Zealand) — Madam President, my delegation congratulates you on your election and the conduct of this session. New Zealand supports the ideals and the objectives of the ILO and has done so since we became a founding Member in 1919. We willingly support the role of the ILO and the role it can play in improving the lot of working people of the world and the people who employ them. The real challenge is to ensure that the standards embodied in the Conventions, and the way they are applied, are relevant in today's contemporary world. For a number of reasons, New Zealand supports a fundamental reassessment of the ILO's labour standards, a reassessment of the ILO's standard-setting processes, a reassessment of the manner of surveillance of labour standards, and a reassessment of the ILO's budgetary and administrative structures. For a decade, New Zealand has been a consistent voice in support of such changes. For over six years now, New Zealand itself has implemented labour legislation which has always been consistent with the principles behind the ILO's Conventions. On a few occasions, we have not been able to satisfy the printed letter of one or two Conventions, most often those we have not ratified. But we simply deliver the principles of the ILO in a different way than ILO processes slavishly require.

For it to be relevant in today's world, where increasing diversity and changing economic systems are the norm, New Zealand strongly believes the ILO must adjust to the changing reality around it. ILO standards deserve constant review. Effectiveness and relevance are key tests to apply in this context. With this in mind, New Zealand strongly supports three complementary and fundamental initiatives. First, existing standards, not excluding the contents of the core human rights standards, must be reviewed against these key tests. We should not be bound to the past, nor complacent that small successes reached thus far are enough. Secondly, the bureaucratic proliferation of subject-matter on standards raises real questions about the appropriateness of this approach. Less prescriptive, more flexible standards may be a better way to promote the core principles of the ILO. We must avoid the "death by a thousand cuts" of bureaucratic intervention, telling Member countries not only what to do, but how to do it. The ILO needs to concentrate on measuring and promoting the outcomes of the principles making up the labour standards. Thirdly, we would support an initiative to improve ILO evaluation procedures. Has a particular standard really achieved what it set out to do? In other words, measure and evaluate outcomes against the ILO's principles rather than simply assess and criticize compliance with labour standards, some of which are of questionable moment in a modern world.

The Director-General's Report contains some helpful suggestions on the use of Recommendations as possibly a more flexible vehicle to obtain outcomes. But another suggestion, social labelling, is one New Zealand cannot support. Social progress can be made in conjunction only with economic growth. Restrictions on trade will rebound against the achievement of social progress, and unfortunately the social labelling proposal has the capacity to destroy the very objectives it wants to achieve. Coincidentally, it also raises questions of consistency with international trade obligations. The Director-General has also floated the idea of some form of statement of principles to strengthen the universal application of core worker rights. New Zealand is prepared to contribute to a process to consider the establishment of such an instrument, but we have some fundamental questions to pose. What objectives do member countries want to achieve? What alternative ways are there to achieve those objectives? Will the proposed solutions compromise the principles of voluntarism and flexibility in achieving those objectives? The core Conventions mentioned in the Director-General's Report will have to be fit for the challenges of globalization and the twenty-first century, not the wish for a past long gone. The challenge for the ILO is to cast aside the yoke of prescription in favour of a renewed commitment to achieving, in a flexible way, the outcomes intrinsic to the ILO's core principles.

Original Spanish: Mr. JIMENEZ AGUILAR (Employers' adviser, Spain) — Allow me to congratulate the President on her election to lead the deliberations of this assembly, and also to congratulate the Vice-Presidents.

I should like to commend the Director-General for including in his Report the question of standard-setting policy.

Thought must indeed be given to the future of international labour standards, and to the need to adapt them to the globalization of markets and the factors of production. ILO's priority should be to protect the fundamental rights of workers and employers. ILO standards should also be adapted to the needs of today's world for creating productive employment. We need a new standard-setting policy based on subsidiarity to strengthen the ILO's effectiveness in the field of fundamental rights, and to contribute to modernizing instruments so that they can be duly applied and not halt employment creation.

In this context, I should like to stress the following: on the one hand, there is a need to continue the programme of revising the Conventions in force, while bearing in mind the difficulties of ratification. On the other hand, we need to enhance the role of Recommendations as standard-setting instruments which are valuable in themselves and not only as a complement to the Conventions.

Along with the question of standard-setting policy I would also like to refer to the recent agreements reached in Spain within the framework of the social dialogue.

I wish to share with you how pleased we are with the signature of agreements by the social partners and also between social partners and the Government of Spain. Among those agreements I would like to mention the tripartite agreement on extra-judicial remedies to collective disputes, agreements on vocational training policy and continuous on-the-job training and the agreement on investment policy and agricultural employment. In addition, an intensive policy for coordination to prevent labour hazards has been discussed.

Lastly, on 28 April the employers' trade union organizations signed three important agreements on job stability, collective bargaining and coverage for certain breaches in standards in those sectors which currently lack adequate collective regulation.

The agreement with the most significant impact on society is the agreement on employment stability. This was negotiated and signed by trade union organizations and employers' organizations. It must be stressed, in this regard, that the Government was in favour of the proposed objective. It was able to remain on the sidelines without encroaching on the autonomy of the parties concerned and was involved in the ultimate success by transposing the agreements reached into legal texts which were later endorsed by Parliament. The Government has made a meaningful contribution to the momentum to bring about changes in standard setting through a series of measures relating to contracts of indeterminate duration.

In connection with these agreements, I should like to make several observations. First, the main achievement in this process has been social dialogue because the parties concerned were able to solve such sensitive issues as the causes for dismissal and amounts of compensation to be granted, and also labour contracts for both a specified period and of indeterminate duration.

Although employment is the outcome of many variables, including economic policy and an adequate framework of labour relations, I believe that, generally speaking, the agreements will have a positive effect in improving current labour market problems in Spain and will generate sufficient confidence between workers and employers in order for a contribution to be made to job creation.

In the field of collective bargaining, the trade union and employers' organizations have also agreed to work together over the next few years with the objective of creating a better coordinated system for collective bargaining. This would involve encouraging further thought on the purpose of such negotiations, improving the contents of collective bargaining and including criteria on the issues to be negotiated in each field and lastly regulating some substantive issues pertaining to labour relations for some sectors of activity where collective bargaining is not highly developed.

It is my express wish that in Spain we will achieve the objectives we have set ourselves with these agreements and, indeed, I am convinced that we will.

Ms. ANDERSEN (Minister of Labour, Denmark) — I would like to congratulate the President on her election to preside over this session of the International Labour Conference.

The Report of the Director-General to this session of the Conference states very clearly that the increased liberalization of world trade makes heavy demands on us all to ensure that similar progress takes place as regards social development. These two elements should walk hand in hand.

The ILO has a special commitment in connection with basic workers' rights. This was also clearly established at the Social Summit in Copenhagen and was later confirmed at the Ministerial Conference of the World Trade Organization in Singapore.

This year the Report goes a step further when it comes to ensuring basic workers' rights. In the ILO, as in other international organizations, ratification of Conventions is voluntary. However, this does not apply to the Conventions concerning freedom of association and the right to free collective bargaining. All Members of the ILO are bound by these two Conventions whether they have ratified them or not. I think it would be natural for member States also to be bound to observe all the fundamental workers' rights. In addition to these two Conventions, these are: equal remuneration, non-discrimination, prohibition of child labour and prohibition of forced labour. This could be done by adopting a declaration to supplement the Constitution of the ILO. I hope that such a declaration can be adopted at the Conference next year.

Another subject I would like to mention is the question of labelling. The consumer who wishes basic workers' rights to be observed will obtain more and more power. This is a trend that will continue. In order to avoid unjustified use of this power it is important that governments assume their responsibility. I find it difficult to see whether it will be possible to establish such a system for a whole country, but in any event the ILO can contribute to further deliberations on this issue.

One of the basic labour standards is the prohibition of child labour. In recent years the ILO has done good work in this field, especially through the International Programme on the Elimination of Child Labour (IPEC). I hope we can adopt a Convention on this subject in 1999. However, prohibition cannot stand alone; it must be supplemented by various forms of support programmes. Such programmes must be adapted to local conditions.

It is also important to move on and go ahead with the proposal to make more use of Recommendations.

I would like to state that we all support the Director-General in the implementation of his proposals. In particular, I find it important that the proposals be implemented within the existing framework of the ILO. We should not adopt new instruments.

Let me conclude with two issues which I have at heart: employment and equality. There are about 1 billion people in the world who are unemployed or underemployed. This is really our greatest challenge today. If we are to cope with this situation we must intensify our efforts to create jobs for these people.

Women are more seriously affected by unemployment than men. There are many reasons for this, for instance, poor education and training, traditional attitudes in families, in society and maybe even among the women themselves. We must continue our work to change this situation. As a follow-up to the Beijing Conference we should ensure that the equality perspective is integrated into all ILO programmes and projects in order to create equal opportunities for both men and women in connection with employment.

Mr. LEE (Minister for Labour, Singapore) — On behalf of the Singapore delegation, may I join our colleagues in congratulating the President on her election of the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference. I am confident that under her able leadership this Conference will come to a successful conclusion.

We are meeting today under a more favourable economic environment. The IMF has projected a 4.4 per cent growth for the world economy this year. Both advanced and developing countries are expected to register healthy growth.

This scenario is contingent on trade liberalization and economic integration worldwide. Goods and services must move more freely, trade must increase to stimulate economic expansion and job creation for the benefit of workers.

Trade liberalization was given a strong boost at the inaugural WTO Ministerial Conference held in my country in December last year. The Conference produced concrete results in key trade issues. The WTO member States agreed to promote trade liberalization, reject protectionism and establish a fair and more open rule-based international trading system. The Ministerial Conference also dealt with the issue of linking labour standards with trade. While renewing its commitment to the observance of internationally recognized core labour standards, the Conference however rejected the use of labour standards for protectionist purposes, and upheld the comparative advantage of low-wage developing countries.

We are therefore perplexed that against this backdrop of trade liberalization, the ILO Report entitled The ILO, standard setting and globalization has proposed a link between social progress and globalization resulting from trade liberalization. Under this proposal all member States will be required to comply with the seven core labour Conventions, regardless of whether they have ratified them. The ILO further proposes awarding global social labels to countries which show comprehensive respect for fundamental labour rights and principles.

If the measures proposed by the ILO Report were to be pursued, member States could be coerced into complying with the core labour Conventions. For some countries, given their stage of economic development, it may not be possible for them to do so and they would run the risk of trade discrimination. Global social labelling could also lead to indiscriminate consumer boycotts and trade sanctions which will contradict the effort to promote trade liberalization.

The resurfacing of the "social clause" has assumed that progress in the member States can be achieved through the adoption of labour standards. In reality, labour standards alone cannot create jobs or prosperity or enhance the well-being of people. Social progress and the elimination of poverty are the consequences of economic growth and not the direct result of acceptance of labour standards. These can be seen from the significant social progress achieved by the Asian NIEs and the emerging economies in many parts of the world as a result of vigorous economic growth. Conversely, the United States which has only acceded to one of the seven core labour Conventions cannot be said to be lacking in social progress.

History has also shown that social progress is a consequence of economic development and prosperity. Take for example the issue of child labour. Professor Gary S. Becker, the 1992 Nobel Laureate for Economic Sciences, has recently pointed out that "child labour did not decline to negligible levels in all parts of the West until the second half of this century. Although legislation, unions and other factors contributed to this decline, studies have indicated that greater prosperity was essential. It was general economic growth that raised the living standards of the family at the lower end of the ladder, so that they were able to forego their children's earnings".

While we agree that child labour is undesirable and should be eliminated, we do not believe that Conventions and penalties can achieve this objective. To stop child labour the ILO must help to promote an environment conducive to increased investment and trade so that economic growth will enable parents in developing countries to forego the meagre earnings of the children.

The Report's proposals are also not in line with the long-standing approach of the ILO on ratification of Conventions by member States. Since its inception the ILO has adopted the principle of voluntary ratification of Conventions by its members. Through the process of consultation and promotion, member States are encouraged to ratify relevant Conventions. This has helped the ILO to build consensus in the promotion of social justice and progress.

We are concerned that some proposals in the Director-General's Report are likely to cause conflict and division among member States. Proposals such as global social labelling could be abused for protectionist purposes and would adversely affect the promotion of freer trade and economic growth, resulting in further set-backs for the developing countries. We therefore urge the ILO to refrain from taking steps which could seriously undermine its effectiveness as an international tripartite body for the promotion of social progress.

In conclusion, Singapore would like to join other member States in urging the ILO not to pursue compulsory compliance with the core Conventions and global social labelling. Instead the ILO should continue to uphold the principles of voluntary ratification of labour standards. The ILO should assist member States in their efforts to achieve economic growth and create jobs. This approach will enable the ILO to achieve its primary objective of bringing about social progress and a better life for workers throughout the world.

Original German: Mr. NORDMANN (Director, Federal Office for Industry, Arts and Crafts and Labour (OFIAMT), Switzerland) — The first task of the Report of the Director-General is to encourage the ILO constituents to engage in discussion. The response in the media and the lively discussions in the corridors illustrate amply that the Report has fulfilled this function. I would therefore like to thank the Director-General for a Report which is extremely innovative and full of highly pragmatic ideas. The Report quite rightly points out that on the threshold to the next millennium the ILO and it finds itself in a unique position. The Copenhagen Social Summit and the Singapore Ministerial Conference have given it a clear mandate. Globalization and liberalization of trade should be accompanied by a social dimension and the latter should be defined and implemented by the International Labour Organization.

How to attain this goal? Switzerland suggests two stages of reforms. First of all the ILO should focus on its core activities. More and more States, including Switzerland, find it difficult to ratify Conventions that are too detailed. This is damaging to the ILO's credibility, which is the most important means it has of exerting pressure, its moral powers of persuasion. This development must be stopped, through a reorientation of our standard-setting activities. We urge quality instead of quantity, giving us less leading to more. In practical terms this means that existing Conventions have to be pruned back consistently and reviewed at regular intervals. Reforms in the work of the Committee on the Application of Standards are also needed, as an IMEC paper prepared following Switzerland's initiative in 1996 already stated. Strict criteria should be established to determine the need for new instruments. We also require better preparation and selection of topics by the Governing Body and a consistent attitude on the part of governments. Governments should only support standards if they are sure of being able to put them before their own parliament for the purposes of ratification.

Focusing on core activities also means more intensive efforts to circulate the most important standards and gain support for them. In principle, we are in favour of a declaration on the fundamental principles of the ILO provided this declaration is not merely a statement of intent, provided it leads to concrete results. What we would prefer would be universal ratification of the fundamental Conventions themselves. I have therefore undertaken to submit to the Swiss Government, the Federal Council, the ratification of Conventions Nos. 98 and 138 which would mean that Switzerland would not only have ratified all seven core Conventions but would be committed to respecting them, in accordance with our ratification procedure, and thus make our contribution to the promotion of international labour standards.

Secondly, this strengthened ILO must also take a new approach. In a globalized world, standards are no longer sufficient. While the international community has spent years discussing the problems of the social clause, the NGOs and the economy have found a positive response to negative threats of boycott, i.e. voluntary labels. Without hampering trade, these labels make it possible for the consumer to express social preferences in their buying decisions. That is why labels are already being supported very actively by Switzerland today. At the same time, however, we are concerned about the proliferation of these labels and the lack of control over their implementation. Here the ILO has a role to play. Similarly to what was done at Amsterdam, we would like to urge the ILO to introduce a constructive dialogue on the subject in the framework of a social forum at next year's session of the Conference.

The Report of the Director-General promotes the development of the ILO without actually calling for a revolution. Rapid results are possible and indeed necessary. Since Singapore, the world has turned to Geneva and the ILO full of expectations. This is a unique opportunity for the ILO, and for us the Members of the Organization this means an historic responsibility. What is at stake is not just the future of our Organization. Once again the world is faced with the question raised by President Wilson in 1919 "What shall be the conditions of labour?" At the time the reply was war and poverty. Today we have to prevent the backlash against globalization of which the Director-General has warned. This is a considerable challenge and Switzerland is ready to face up to it and has announced its readiness to participate in a national study on the social dimensions of globalization and its intention to ratify all the core Conventions.

Mr. MANNAN (Minister of State for Labour and Manpower, Bangladesh) — The Report of the Director-General entitled The ILO, standard setting and globalization is doubtless the result of painstaking work. My delegation looks forward to actively participating in the debate that will continue well beyond this session on the challenging ideas. Developing countries have their own perspectives on these issues. We believe only the most candid discussions on these matters will bear fruit.

The ILO's basic parameters are designed to serve the welfare and dignity of workers. The relative stages of socio-economic development obtaining in various countries need to be considered as an essential element in this exercise. The ILO needs to come forward in assisting States to progressively attain higher standards of labour welfare. The norm-setting of the ILO is not an end, but a means that would need to be dovetailed into broad-based social progress.

Hopes of many in our times have been raised by the globalization of production and the liberalization of trade. Some countries, whose problems are structural, have not been able to seize these opportunities. For the least developed countries exports and FDI-flows have fallen sharply. Yet Bangladesh, like many other similarly placed countries, has placed its faith in these values.

Despite many constraints, countries like ours enjoy the marginal competitive advantage of low labour costs. The WTO Ministerial Conference in Singapore stressed that they should not in any way be called into question. It is our expectation that the ILO would actively support, inter alia, the comparative advantage of such countries in its standard-setting activities. Any Convention, Recommendation or declaration seeming to undermine this would run counter to the attainment of social progress in these countries.

Such social progress can only be achieved through the ratification of ILO Conventions. All our domestic labour laws have been harmonized with international standards, that is, the ILO Conventions. Of the seven core Conventions, we have already ratified five; of the other two, the Government has decided to ratify the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100), while the seventh is already in effect reflected in our practices.

We believe the State still has a major role in the pursuit of our social aims. This is best done by facilitating initiatives by various actors within civil society. Bangladesh's acknowledged success, however modest, in our development efforts owes much to a productive partnership between the Government, NGOs and the private sector. This is evidenced in the innovative micro-credit system on the Grameen model, or in the non-formal education of BRAC, or in the MOU signed by BGMEA with the ILO and UNICEF.

Equal access to the global labour market would facilitate attainment of minimum global standards. This would include wages. Without such access, all standards would continue to be determined by national market realities. There is no reason — economic, ethical or social — why labour should not enjoy unfettered cross-frontier movement along with other factors of production. Protectionist tendencies that deter this free flow will impede the attainment of our broadly accepted objectives. Bangladesh believes the rights of migrant workers should be scrupulously protected.

The Government of Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina, the daughter of the Father of the Nation, Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman, is taking all appropriate steps to advance the interests of our workers. We hope thus to realize Bangabandhu's vision of "Sonar Bangla", or the "Golden Bengal". We are no less committed to these goals at the international level. As a titular member of the Governing Body, our endeavours in this respect will remain sustained, steadfast and unflinching.

Original French: Mr. RATOVONELINJAFY (Minister of Public Service, Labour and Social Law, Madagascar) — The delegation I have the great honour to head on behalf of my Government congratulates the President warmly on her election to the presidency of this session of the Conference and expresses our best wishes to her and to the Officers of the Conference for the success of our work.

The globalization of the economy, the coexistence of the modern or structured sector side by side with the informal sector, the existence of new and atypical groups of workers who are disadvantaged and hence particularly vulnerable, as well as the imbalance caused by the current situation of wealthy and developing countries and, more particularly, that of the least developed countries which are already on the sidelines and therefore do not always benefit from relocation and the liberalization of the economy worldwide show, once again, that the fundamental objectives of social justice, of improving living and working conditions and of poverty attenuation are still topical and still valid.

In line with this, my delegation welcomes the fact that the Director-General of the ILO has chosen The ILO, standard setting and globalization as a topic for his Report, and fully supports this important document, which quite rightly emphasizes social peace and an equitable distribution of the income generated by this new economic situation. My delegation remains convinced that the ILO is taking on a mission of crucial importance in order to meet the requirements of the world of work today.

Currently, Madagascar is fully attuned to this concept of social justice, which puts man at the centre of overall economic and social development policy by advocating the establishment of a new humanist and ecological society.

In the interest of lasting social peace, in the interest of just democracy, again embodying the noble concept of equal treatment for all, Madagascar wishes to set up, in partnership with the ILO, a system of social protection which will cover all wage-earners, of course, but also those workers who have been excluded up to now: agricultural workers, workers in the informal sector and the self-employed workers. However, if we are to meet the present and future requirements of social justice in a changing world of work and offset any form of socio-economic imbalance, we must, as a matter of urgency, carry out effective measures to train workers with the aim of renewing human resources in Madagascar.

This will be reflected in modern labour legislation providing a democratic framework for labour relations which are accepted by all, together with all the guarantees for social protection which our country has undertaken to provide to working people. In order to implement these objectives, the support of the International Labour Office is essential, and Madagascar would like to request this help.

Ms. WINBERG (Minister of Labour, Sweden) — I would like to congratulate the President on her election to chair this important session of the Conference.

The Director-General has tabled before us an extremely rich and thought-provoking Report. He has seized the messages from the World Summit for Social Development held in Copenhagen in 1995 and from the first World Trade Organization Ministerial Conference in Singapore last December. There, member States renewed their commitment to observe internationally recognized fundamental labour standards and recalled the ILO's major role in defining and implementing those standards.

The Swedish Government attaches great importance to ILO standard-setting activities and I now welcome the Director-General's Report, which is rich in ideas, proposals and convincing arguments for future action. What he needs is our confirmation that he should elaborate further on these proposals. He has my full support to go ahead.

I therefore welcome the idea of a solemn declaration confirming the obligation to respect fundamental human rights that is already included in the ILO Constitution and as part of ILO membership. Such a declaration should clarify existing constitutional provisions and define the universally acknowledged fundamental rights. This can be done independent of the ratification of the relevant seven ILO core Conventions referred to, namely those on freedom of association and collective bargaining, the prohibition of forced labour and child labour (a question which concerns more and more people in Sweden and other countries) and on equality of treatment and non-discrimination.

Such a declaration should be accompanied by a simultaneous strengthening of the ILO's supervisory functions. This does not imply that an entirely new mechanism has to be established. I can foresee a procedure and a function parallel to that which already exists today under the Governing Body with regard to freedom of association. Nevertheless, I think it is advisable for the Director-General to elaborate on several options for the Governing Body to decide on next November.

I would, however, like to voice a word of caution. The recognition of the fundamental, constitutional nature of some rights does not mean that all other standards are to be placed in a less important category. Those fundamental rights are an absolute condition for the good functioning of the global labour market, establishing a number of principles not tied to levels of economic development.

The Director-General notes the growing awareness among enterprises of the social and environmental consequences of their activities — also having an effect on their image — and the growing concern among consumers of the consequences of their purchasing decisions. This is a trend that I think should be encouraged.

The convergence of these concerns has led to a proliferation of voluntary charters and labels of different kinds, claiming to guarantee the manufacturer's or distributor's respect for given criteria. And those labels have in some instances proved to be useful in the promotion of desirable social aims.

But it is also observed that this kind of labelling may risk being arbitrary, singling out a particular right, or product being put to improper use. For instance, it may be directed only to export sectors, leaving workers in domestic trade sectors abandoned.

As an alternative, the Director-General is launching the idea of a global social label, awarded to countries which show comprehensive respect for fundamental labour rights and principles and which agree to international monitoring. This could be done under an international labour Convention. I find this proposal very attractive and look forward to seeing this scheme further elaborated.

I have studied with interest proposals put forward to revitalize ILO standard setting. A new emphasis on the evaluation of standards has my strong support. This also goes for extending the range of choices of new items on the Conference agenda, and also the other proposals.

The Report ends with a chapter and an annex on the contents of the standards and the drafting process. My delegation recognizes the problems described and the need to review the way in which questionnaires are drafted as a basis for preparation of new instruments.

Finally, I fully agree with the statement made by the Danish Minister, Ms. Andersen, about unemployment and equality.

Mr. KOHLI (Employers' delegate, India) — On my own behalf and on behalf of the Employers' group from India, I extend our heartiest congratulations on your being elected unanimously to the high office of the presidency of the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference. We are very confident, Madam, that under your inspiring stewardship, the session will reach momentous decisions for the benefit of humanity.

I take this opportunity to compliment the Director-General for his Report on The ILO, standard setting and globalization. The Report is lucid and thought-provoking, containing as it does a number of important suggestions for bringing about improvements in the field of standard-setting activity. Standard setting has been a subject of intense debate in almost every session of the Conference, as it has far-reaching consequences for all the three social partners.

It is well recognized that economic progress as a result of the liberalization of trade and globalization cannot be achieved unless adequate attention is paid to social progress. After all, economic growth is only a means to human development and satisfaction, which is the ultimate goal. The imperative need for removing poverty and making concerted efforts to improve education, health care, housing, safe drinking water, etc., need hardly be overemphasized. The social aspects cannot be sacrificed at the altar of economic progress. The Indian employers are fully conscious of this fact and would extend all the help and cooperation to other social partners and the ILO.

When we talk of social progress, the ILO's role comes naturally into focus. Attempts at bringing in social clauses in trade agreements have been most unfortunate. The World Trade Organization's Singapore Declaration of December 1996 puts the whole issue in its proper perspective when the Trade Ministers rejected the use of labour standards for protectionist purposes and agreed that the comparative advantage of countries, particularly low- wage developing countries, must in no way be put into question. The Declaration, however, emphasized the need for observance of internationally recognized core labour standards, and they affirmed the ILO as the competent body to deal with these standards. These core standards have already been identified, and we would agree that there is undoubtedly need for ensuring their observance, but the employers from India would not like a body like the Committee on Freedom of Association to be set up, or even complaints regarding infringements of these core standards be entertained, if the country concerned has not ratified the relevant Convention. One would, however, agree that the time has come to outline a strategy for the promotion of fundamental labour standards in addition to the right to freedom of association, for which there is already an established procedure.

I take this opportunity to briefly comment on some of the ideas put forward in the Report. Item VII of the agenda regarding abrogation of obsolete Conventions has been most appropriate, and in fact should have been thought of much earlier. As was the experience with home work, one does need to ponder deeply about the choice of subjects selected for adoption of Conventions. The employers from India feel that the subject of contract labour does not lend itself to a Convention.

At a time when the role of governments is contracting, new Conventions and labour laws are seeking ever to expand the role of government. Adoption of a Convention on this subject will not be fruitful as the member States will find it very difficult to ratify it. Moreover, employers feel that in a globalized and competitive environment, standard setting in this area would be counter-productive and work towards restricting the creation of more employment. At best we can examine the need for adopting a Recommendation. There are many other Conventions and Recommendations which help in guarding the interests of contract labour.

As is evident from the Director-General's Report, there is an imperative need for greater effort to be put in by the Office and the social partners at the national level, greater recourse to the national tripartite machinery and the multidisciplinary teams for the selection of items to be included in the agenda and for deciding upon the form of instrument. The suggestions given in the Annex to the Report need to be given serious thought. I would suggest that beside the reactions which would be available during the present discussions, the social partners in each country need to be given more time to study the issue in depth.

Yet another important point made by the Director-General is about governments voting for a Convention, even though at the time of voting the governments know that it will not be possible for them to ratify the Convention. I for one would be totally opposed to such an anomalous situation. When the governments know that they cannot ratify a Convention, they should oppose the adoption of such an instrument, and the subject-matter can possibly come up at a more appropriate time in future, when the situation in most parts of the world is ripe to accept such a Convention.

Coming to the question of social labelling, the Employers' group from India strongly feels that such a practice should be best left to the prerogative of each State to decide upon its own legislation and enforcement. We also feel that such labelling would legitimize the use of labour standards for protectionism and by implication endorse the social clause. This is not acceptable to us.

While it is agreed that the consolidation of existing instruments is an extremely complex undertaking, the Director-General's suggestion that the ILO should once again bring out an international labour code needs a wider debate.

Before I close, I would once again like to mention that the Director-General's Report has highlighted a number of important issues, and I am confident that it should be possible for the participants at the Conference to reach a consensus on the ways and means to tackle the problems posed in the Report. Moreover, employers feel that in a globalized and competitive environment, standard setting in this area would be counter-productive and work towards restricting the creation of more employment. At best we can examine the need for adopting a Recommendation. There are many other Conventions and Recommendations which help in guarding the interests of contract labour.

Mr. PARTAP (Minister of Labour and Cooperatives, Trinidad and Tobago) — Before I proceed I would like to add my voice to the many before me in congratulating the President on her election to the presidency of the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference. Congratulations are also extended to the three Vice-Presidents on their well-deserved elevation to such an office.

I must confess that this is the first time that I am attending the International Labour Conference. I deem it a privilege to be here on behalf of the delegation of the Republic of Trinidad and Tobago and to address this distinguished meeting of social partners.

Permit me also to extend greetings to the Director-General of the ILO. His Report on The ILO, standard setting and globalization, I found to be frank, enlightening and, at the same time, extremely thought-provoking and challenging. And the main challenge, if I may use some of the Director-General's words, is to determine how the ILO can make a "dazzling entrance into the third millennium"?

Indeed this is a very profound and far-reaching question and the time to answer it must be now, rather than later. In the face of the changes in the world of work brought about by the phenomena of globalization and trade liberalization, how does the ILO remain valid and retain its credibility in the twenty-first century?

I believe we would be pondering and discussing this issue well into the 86th Session. One significant change in the world of work is the proliferation of contract labour. I dare say that the atypical practices associated with this mode of employment seem to threaten the very foundation on which the ILO was built.

My delegation has a keen interest in this particular subject and we welcome its timely inclusion in the agenda for this Conference. In fact we have had some discussions on the issue both at the national and regional levels.

Not surprisingly, concerns similar to those of the Director-General were raised at the 14th meeting of the Standing Committee of Ministers of Labour in the Caribbean Community, which I had the privilege of chairing just last month in Trinidad and Tobago. We too have acknowledged the need to assess our achievements, our present position and our future needs in terms of a clearly defined vision of where we, as Ministries of Labour in the CARICOM region, would like to be as we enter the next millennium.

At the national level, my Government is conscious of the critical need to balance globalization and trade liberalization with social justice and satisfactory labour standards. In this regard, I am pleased to inform you that our Convention No. 144 tripartite committee has been in operation for almost one year now and, as a result of the hard work of its chairman and members (comprising the social partners), the Government of Trinidad and Tobago has recently ratified Convention No. 100 on equal remuneration for men and women workers for work of equal value.

I would like to assure you that my Government is committed to the ratification of all the fundamental or core ILO Conventions. The last one still to be ratified in this regard, namely Convention No. 138 on minimum age, is presently receiving the attention of the Convention No. 144 tripartite committee.

Maternity protection for women workers is also one of our priority concerns. Mindful, however, of the proposed revision of Convention No. 103 by the ILO, my Government has decided to go the route of protective legislation. In fact draft legislation has already been prepared in this area.

In addition, we are also drafting legislation on basic conditions of employment that would apply to all workers so as to ensure that our non-unionized workers in particular would enjoy some basic standards in the work environments, in accordance with the guidelines set by the ILO.

Will there be a role for the ILO in the third millennium? My answer is unreservedly in the affirmative. As long as social justice does not occur naturally alongside economic development, the International Labour Organization must persist.

In closing, it is my view that this Conference is indeed a unique forum that brings together the diverse groups for the common purpose of determining labour standards. I welcome the opportunity to be among this gathering and I pray God's blessing upon this Organization and upon our current deliberations. I thank you for the opportunity to address the sitting.

Mr. ARTIN (Employers' delegate, Sweden) — Madam President, let me first add my personal and friendly congratulations to you for your election and my congratulations to the Conference for having elected you to this position. I would also like to congratulate my own Minister, Mrs. Winberg, for her speech just a few minutes ago. Although I might not agree with all she said, I think we think to a great extent in common about this.

In this important debate, on issues crucial for the future of the ILO, it is fortunate that so many delegates wish to contribute. Of course the other side of the coin is that the time-limits are now very strict and we all have to limit ourselves to talk only about one or two points. So for this reason I shall only speak about Part II of the Director-General's Report and not go into the often controversial proposals in Part I. I wish, however, to make an observation in passing about Part I and that is that the Director-General, when he tackles the future of globalization, seems to me to be often very much a prisoner of the thinking of the past and of the ideas of "social engineering" which were abandoned by most others after the 1970s. He also seems to take it for granted that all principles that were natural in 1919 or 1946 must necessarily be valid also for a totally changed world of work of the next millennium. I am not so certain of that.

But as I said, I will now concentrate on Part II of the Report. On behalf of the Swedish Employers' Confederation I very much welcome the analysis of past successes and failures that the Director-General presents. He has the courage to say some things that were perhaps already rather general knowledge, but which it was not politically correct to bring out into the open. At the same time, however, he underestimates the problems and misses an important element.

This is most obvious when he deals with the events during last year's session of the Conference in connection with the Convention on home work. It is good to read that he sees it as a major problem that the former consensus on ILO aims is threatened by the fact that one group refused to discuss the contents of a Convention, but he is in error when he reduces the problem to an isolated one of form.

In fact, many of the problems that the Director-General raises, such as especially the dwindling of ratifications, from being made earlier by a minority into today's ratifications by the odd few, are symptoms of a longer and deeper illness of the ILO, hidden by the misuse of tripartism. Many governments have been playing this game, showing a rather peculiar form of neutrality between workers and employers. They vote with the workers during the Conference in adopting this series of less and less relevant Conventions, and then back home they vote with the employers in not ratifying what they adopted during the Conference.

To one who has been active in Geneva for only a few years, it is surprising that the Director-General now tells us that these problems have been brought up as early as 1946, and then more and more consistently in later years. It is however sad, that it took the so-called "incidents" at last year's Conference to make these problems visible also to the Office.

The Employers' group has, for a number of years, brought forward suggestions for a better and less irrelevant standard-setting procedure, but we have had little, if any, response from the other groups or from the Office. But these problems with standard setting and the situation of the three constituents of the ILO are quite serious today, and even more so for the future. If one of the three constituents of this tripartite body feels that its Members are not getting much, if anything, out of this whole business, but on the other hand finds itself consistently voted down by the other two, it will sooner or later start questioning why it is present to give legitimacy to what is against its strong beliefs. It will be especially difficult to give a good answer to that question when the product of this business is not even, in the final count, bought by those same governments who voted for it during the Conference. I should perhaps remind the Conference that for employers and workers, there is no real obligation to take part in this work.

Several of the proposals for the future by the Director-General are indeed in the right direction. It is for instance helpful that he sees the dangers of voting new and detailed standards where the value added is questionable. And his pleading for more regular use of Recommendations standing free of Conventions is very convincing. The results of this and next year's discussions on contract labour will, in our view, be crucial as an indication of whether the ILO is going in the direction that the Director-General advocates and the employers have demanded for so long, or if it will once more confirm the inability of the workers and many governments to break the evil circle of the ILO over later years, and that will be a serious threat to its credibility and its future.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL HAROON (Employers' delegate, Kuwait) — In the Name of Allah, the Merciful. It gives me pleasure at the outset to convey to you all the greetings and regards of the Kuwait Chamber of Commerce and Industry, which represents the employers in my country, and which I am honoured to represent within the Kuwaiti delegation to your esteemed Conference; and to congratulate you Madam President and your Vice-Presidents of the tripartite parties for the deep confidence bestowed upon you by the Conference in electing you to preside over this session, wishing you all the success in your mission.

To be fair, I would like to commend the Director-General for the good choice of the topic of his Report to the Conference about The ILO, standard setting and globalization, as we are all concerned with the social effects of globalization and the process of development towards the general welfare of all countries. Moreover, we share with him the opinion that all member States, by virtue of their acceptance of the Constitution as well as the objectives and principles of the ILO, are bound to a minimum of obligations with respect to fundamental rights, and we confirm with him the need for reconsidering the standards set by the Organization to cope with the present economic and social developments.

Despite the brave and objective criticism of the Director-General of the method of selecting the topics of standards, we notice that the International Labour Conference during the last five sessions, including the present one, has been discussing topics like labour in the informal sector, part-time labour, household labour and subcontract labour. The aim was to subject all these topics to standards that impose more restrictions on countries, thus hindering their development, although such kinds of employment are considered amongst the most important ones, being sources for the creation of new and non-traditional jobs that can absorb a good proportion of the labour market input.

Please permit me in this connection to draw attention to the necessity of developing the traditional role of the ILO, which should still concentrate on standards and their application, and it is worth mentioning here that the forms and mechanisms of selecting, conforming to and observing the application of the standards has become outdated and incapable of matching the speedy succession of international developments.

I have the feeling that the Report of the Director-General implies, in one way or another, a sort of submission to the idea of linking trade globalization to international labour standards. This is clear in his proposal to grant a kind of "social label" to the products of countries that abide more by the application of standards. Despite the efforts put forward to promote the proposal and eliminate any possible reservations, permit me to highlight the following precautions.

The ILO should be immune to all possible pressures that may be exerted on it, thus it should not act according to the likings of the strong at the expense of the aspirations of the poor.

Our Organization is not solely for the élite but for all its Members; thus it should take into consideration the differences and the means and capabilities of all the member States. The natural law that will govern interstate relations under the globalization umbrella is conflicting interests and wills, and should the ILO side with anyone, it should definitely side with the less capable and the most vulnerable.

The proposed social label, if decided upon, will definitely be to the benefit of the well-developed States that have long experience in the export business, hence will not be a motivator anymore.

The ILO from its very beginning has clearly drawn its own policy, goals and means. Its goals concentrated on social peace based on justice and principles of human rights, and its means of reaching its goals is that unique democratic approach, namely the tripartite structure which is considered as an international parliament of the social partners from different member countries. These are the fundamentals that we should all adhere to, with no modification or change, while all other issues are variables related to performance, efficiency and development of work methods. It is in this context that we dedicate our call for development and renovation.

Original Russian: Mr. GONCHARIK (Workers' delegate, Belarus) — I would like to join the previous speakers in congratulating the President on her election to chair this session of the International Labour Conference. Her election was well-deserved.

The respect for fundamental labour rights, (such as the right to free and safe employment, to remuneration for work, to freedom of association and collective bargaining, etc.), is a major indicator of the maturity of States and societies, and of their capacity to ensure economic growth and social justice. It is only on this basis that we can create the conditions necessary to raise standards of living and to permit personal fulfilment on a harmonious basis.

We believe the choice of the subject of the Report of the Director-General is thus highly topical. Our rade union confederation bases its activities on a principle enshrined in the Republic's Constitution — hat Belarus should become a democratic social State based on the rule of law. We think this will be the case.

Unfortunately, for the time being it is true to a large extent only on paper.

Recently, we have noted in the activities of the pub- ic authorities an attempt to lower the level of legal and social protection of our citizens. There have been massive violations of labour legislation, working con- ditions have deteriorated, and workers have received heir pay only partially or with great delay, even when wages were low. There is a very high level of hidden unemployment.

There have been attempts to limit the ability of un- ons to protect workers' rights, economic and social ntitlements and their interests in general, including y restricting the right to take labour action.

In April we had an extraordinary plenary of the ouncil of trade union federations, which adopted a pecial declaration on the respect for labour rights nd the social and economic rights of citizens. The lenary expressed its concern about the situation and equested the Government to lift the restrictions mposed on trade unions, and to bring the list of ranches in which strikes are prohibited in line with LO standards. We also asked that the current legisla- on aimed at protecting the constitutional rights of itizens be modified and amended. The trade unions' osition of principle, which is in keeping with the onstitution, is that we should build relations be- ween the unions, employers' associations and the ublic authorities on the basis of mutual respect and ocial partnership.

This means that the partnership should work on an galitarian basis.

The responsibility to carry out the agreements they each should be shared by all parties. We protest — nd will continue to protest — against the violation of e rights of working people and the rights of trade nions.

I think this proves that it is not enough for ILO onventions simply to be ratified. It is important that e ILO member States fully observe their obligations ith regard to fundamental rights. That is why we sup- ort the idea of a mechanism capable of assisting in e implementation of these principles. As we see it, is must include a comprehensive study of the situa- on in the field, as well as consultation with all parties ncerned. Objective conclusions must be drawn, and ey should lead to recommendations; in addition ere should be strict monitoring to ensure that these commendations are carried out.

At the same time, while we are very much in favour defending democratic rights and freedoms and wish improve the situation, we would like to ask all of u, including workers' organizations, to be very care- l when it comes to calling for strict trade sanctions ainst certain countries. In the case of Belarus, such nctions would aggravate the economic crisis. The epublic, as you probably know, is still overcoming e very serious consequences of the Chernobyl disaster. Sanctions would worsen the situation of workers still further.

We feel that there are still plenty of opportunities to improve the situation on a constructive, democratic basis, without resorting to any economic or trade restrictions.

Our federation is prepared to cooperate with all national and international groups with a view to doing so. We are counting on your understanding and help.

Original French: Mr. WADE (Employers' delegate, Senegal) — On behalf of my delegation, I should like to pay tribute and convey my warmest congratulations to the President on her brilliant election. Allow me to extend these congratulation to the other Officers of the Conference, and in particular to Ms. Sasso Mazzufferi, for her competence and her commitment, from which the Employers' group has always benefited greatly.

This year the Conference is taking place at a crucial time in the history of the human race. In the face of rising perils, namely wars, genocide, coups d'état, and the population explosion, societies are becoming increasingly fragmented. A social rift has split the world and is growing wider. While worldwide GNP has increased by more than 40 per cent in the course of the last decade, the poor have continued to grow in number, particularly in Africa, where they may make up 32 per cent of the population by the beginning of the twenty-first century, compared to 16 per cent in the 1980s.

At the same time in most regions of the world there has been no progress with regard to employment, particularly in Africa; the situation is worrying, especially in the case of productive employment.

This unprecedented situation seems to have created a new state of mind amongst the social partners today, who have grouped together around the core issue — using concertation as the most appropriate means of handling labour disputes, and safeguarding jobs, particularly in the case of enterprises facing difficulties.

In this context, our Organization must continue to be a haven for all of those who have lost confidence in a world in search of hope. It is up to us to strengthen its credibility and its effectiveness by undertaking the necessary reforms. This step requires courage, perseverance, lucidity and innovation in finding solutions to the problems afflicting humanity.

It is up to us to place the ILO at the forefront and to make it a guiding light for organizations that aim at proactive reflection, economic action and social progress. The ILO should be perceived more as a modern organization, able to adapt to changes in the world, which are as rapid as they are radical.

We should welcome the decisive action carried out to adopt Conventions which have contributed substantially to the defence of human rights, to safeguarding principles such as dignity and freedom. However, we should question the relevance of certain Conventions which have become obsolete over the years. Indeed, a number of texts have met with very few ratifications despite the many efforts made here and elsewhere.

We should therefore renew what already exists but we should also innovate by thinking about future actions that are in step with the economic and social problems of our times. In other words, we must be proactive.

This is no doubt one of the many challenges before us as the century draws to a close. If we fail to face it we run the risk of stagnation and sclerosis, which jeopardize the life and development of any organization. We should therefore seriously envisage covering topical issues but also think of eliminating obsolete texts. The Director-General is quite right in speaking of "more targeted standards for a greater impact". In this exercise, we should adopt a marketing approach based upon the supplier/client relationship, the former being the ILO, which should have a better understanding of demand, and the latter being the constituents. In other words, what we need is flexibility, the ability to adapt, anticipate, and evaluate ex-ante and ex-post. These must, henceforth, be the major strategic approaches of the ILO's standard-setting policy.

We must settle this question today. The solution we choose will probably help shape the future of our Organization at a time when the distinction between the economic and social realms has become very tenuous and when the near monopoly it has exercised to date is no longer a panacea. Indeed, it is this ability to change and to adapt which is expected of the ILO's partners and feared by its detractors. We should bear in mind that there can be no social development for the well-being of men and women, young and old on our planet, without this attitude.

This is why all the possibilities of boosting competitivity should be explored, all levers used to promote employment creation. In Senegal, interesting reforms are now under way. Tripartite consultation is largely based upon the Tripartite Concertation Committee set up in 1994 following the change in parity of the CFA and the French franc. This body, which groups together all the relevant ministries and workers' and employers' organizations, meets every month to examine all the economic and social issues of concern to the social partners in a tripartite framework.

In addition, a General Committee for Concertation on Development, presided over by the Prime Minister, was set up between the Government and the private sector. It meets every quarter to examine strategic and operational problems. Furthermore, a number of initiatives are being taken to reduce unemployment in a tripartite framework; I should like to mention the discussions currently under way with a view to setting up an employment solidarity fund.

Moving on to another subject we have been asked to discuss two important items in committee: general conditions to stimulate job creation in small and medium-sized enterprises, and contract labour. As employers, these subjects are of concern to us. Dealing with them requires pragmatism, clarity of vision and intelligence. The ILO report World employment 1996-97 sounds a warning: the employment picture worldwide is still grim. Concerning developing countries, the report concludes that there is an immense need for more productive and better-paid jobs and that this need should be met by rapid job creation.

The same observation made by other institutions, as also by our own, calls for vigorous strategies based upon bold institutional and economic reforms. Essentially, we need to turn our States into modern States, that is, whose aim is to achieve the common weal effectively and equitably, and modest States, in the sense that they should husband their resources and create a stable business environment by carrying out the reforms that are necessary in order for private initiative to flourish.

In short — an effective and capable public sector, to back the initiatives of a capable private sector. In order to attain this objective, a number of employers' organizations are carrying out strategic planning with the support of ACT/EMP. This is the case of the National Council of Employers of Senegal, which in January 1997 adopted a Five-Year Development Plan. This is the royal road to providing enterprises with quality services worthy of the twenty-first century, which is just around the corner, bringing with it unbridled competition, demanding, informed consumers, well-organized and highly skilled workers, quality products and increasingly sophisticated production tools. In this fiercely competitive world there is no place for losers, and the first act of this titanic struggle has already begun.

I am convinced that like me you are counting on winning.

Mr. RISKI (Employers' delegate, Finland) — Let me join those who have already congratulated the President on her election and commend her for the efficient way in which she has conducted her duties.

In his Report, the Director-General deals with the important issue of how the ILO should respond to the expectations that the international community is placing on the Organization. He puts forward a number of controversial proposals to achieve greater relevance of the so-called core Conventions. The proposals cover a wide range of issues and include ideas such as the adoption of a declaration of principles, the sharpening of supervisory mechanisms, the introduction of social labels, and an improvement in the selection of future standard-setting items.

I will focus my comments on the feasibility of the declaration of principles and some of the issues relating to the low rates of ratification. Before elaborating on these, let me say that I remain opposed to the idea of social labels because of the inherent potential fo them to be used for protectionist purposes.

It is understandable that liberalization of trade has raised the issue of the protection of workers' rights which in this context means the ILO's core Conventions. As the Director-General points out in his Report, the Declaration of the Summit in Copenhage dealt with the same issue. The WTO's Ministeria Conference in Singapore late last year also looked a this issue from another angle.

The low rate of ratification of ILO Conventions ha also been debated. The ILO has tried to promote ratification without sufficient reflection on why so man member countries have failed to adopt the Conven tions.

Especially in recent years, the instruments have often been adopted by the Conference by only a sligh majority. Those governments that have voted for thes instruments have at the same time cast the decisiv votes in favour of their adoption. Often, the same governments, that during the Conference have decided o the form and the contents of the instruments, fail t ratify them in their own countries. For whom therefore, if not for themselves, do the representatives o these governments elaborate such instruments?

Once ratified, the Conventions are binding. IL member States represent a vast spectrum of differen cultures at different stages of economic developmen Because of this, Conventions that are too detailed an too far-reaching are, and will naturally remain, at low level of ratification.

In his Report, the Director-General attempts to find ways to increase member States' observance of the so-called core Conventions. One of the main proposals for achieving this is to change the obligations of membership. The ILO has its Constitution as do the member States. In Finland, at least, an international agreement must undergo a constitutional decision-making process before it is accepted and recognized as a national obligation. I do not see it possible for a new interpretation of the ILO's rules to circumvent or override the national decision-making process. Neither is it possible for a new declaration, even if it would deal only with principles, to become binding without the proper acceptances and decisions at the national level.

How can the ILO improve the rate of ratification of its Conventions? The idea of promoting the principles is a good one and we, employers, have for a long time called for the adoption of such principles. An emphasis on principles in Conventions rather than on details could produce international instruments that would allow greater flexibility which is nowadays required in the labour markets. Such Conventions would also gain greater acceptance, respect and have a greater impact at the national level. I do not believe that interpretational tricks will increase member States' commitment to the ILO.

Original Arabic: Mr. DAHLAN (Employers' delegate, Saudi Arabia) — In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! Madam President, may the peace of God be with you. On behalf of the employers of Saudi Arabia and on my own personal behalf I have pleasure in congratulating you most warmly on your election to the presidency of this session of the International Labour Conference which, we hope, will achieve the wishes and aspirations of the three groups.

The choice made by the Director-General of a number of technical issues connected to the work of the ILO is a very good one, that is the least we can say, quite apart from our support for the recommendations and proposals contained in the Report. The standard-setting activities of the ILO in the era of globalization is one of the most important issues within the framework of the mandate and activities of the Organization and one which casts a new light on the role of the Organization on the eve of the twenty-first century, entailing new working methods in line with social developments throughout the world. We hope that this question will be the subject of an in-depth study by experts and advisers in the three groups so as to reach useful conclusions whilst emphasizing the fact that according to the Singapore Declaration the Organization is the competent body empowered to carry out standard-setting activities. Our present procedures cover the monitoring of the application of standards, which is an economic regulatory procedure, meaning that we do not have to create a new mechanism for follow-up and monitoring.

The agenda of this session includes a very important technical item as far as we are concerned as employers. We are referring to the general conditions to stimulate job creation in small and medium-sized enterprises. This is a question of particular importance to the private sector in my country. The Chamber of Commerce and Industry supports small and medium-sized enterprises to enable them to survive and indeed succeed. Commercial banks and development funds also lend their support to these enterprises. The Government of Saudi Arabia through these various organizations provides its support and assistance to these enterprises so as to remove any obstacles they may encounter and so as to create an environment that is favourable for investment. This is done by lowering taxes and customs duties. The Chamber of Commerce and Industry is doing all it can to create an environment favourable to productivity. It is carrying out studies and researching training and retraining programmes for administrators, since these enterprises can absorb a considerable number of national and migrant workers. The support given to SMEs, in the form of tax exemptions, direct support towards the costs of electricity, water and support services, a reduction in customs duties, and promotion of exports and infrastructure is an example of the privileges enjoyed by small and medium-sized enterprises.

I wish to say, on behalf of the employers of the Middle East, that we would like to have more assistance from the Organization through its Office in Beirut, to strengthen the technical programmes for employers' organizations of the Middle East, through training programmes, seminars and meetings, in order to support the economic development process in our region. We hope that more credits will be allocated to the Beirut office for this purpose.

We are very pleased with the efforts undertaken by the Organization to promote social justice and equality, and with the support given to workers in Palestine and the other occupied territories whose rights have been encroached upon. We would like to emphasize the need for this role to be pursued, so that the Palestinians can regain their rights and there can be an end to the injustice they are suffering in the occupied Arab territories and southern Lebanon. We are convinced of the need to reintroduce peace and to implement international agreements. To end I would like to thank you, the Director-General, his staff and everyone who helped in the preparation of this Report.

Original French: Mr. VITTORI (representative of Pax Christi International) — Allow me to congratulate you, Madam President, on your election. I would also like to thank the interpreters who have accepted to work well beyond their normal hours.

The organized struggle of workers against unjust working and living conditions, and the support they have received from major philosophical, ideological and religious streams of thought might not have been enough in 1919 to give birth to the tripartite ILO without the major fear that was engendered by the Bolshevik Revolution.

The Director-General in his Report states that the disappearance of the managed economic system has led to the advent of a global market whose laws, promises and risks have now expanded throughout the world. The same response is necessary when coping with the equally disastrous consequences, disastrous for freedom, dignity and well-being of two discordant systems that only agree in the exploitation of man by man.

The first was unable to solve the problem of social justice in full freedom, and in response to them the ILO found its standard-setting activities in tripartism. Over the years this was refined and developed, going from the general to the particular. Today, the time has come to trim things down, but are the instruments under consideration really obsolete in all countries? For example, is Convention No. 45 of 1937 concerning women of all ages employed in underground work in mines, obsolete everywhere?. Whatever the case, the question arises less in the number than in the effective application of standards which, as the Director-General points out, find their source and their inspiration in the values that are enshrined in the Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia.

The Director-General welcomes, as do we, the flattering references to the standard-setting activities of the ILO made by the Copenhagen Summit in 1994 and by the WTO conference of trade ministers that met in Singapore in 1996 which described the ILO as the competent body to establish these standards and to apply them. However, the conference did not express the slightest intention of referring to this in the rules of world trade that they wanted to be without any impediment whatsoever. The tribute that was paid to the respect for human dignity in labour is not accompanied by the kind of political will to have this prevail in all circumstances. The same governments, therefore, seem to forget in the WTO what they say in the ILO. I do not know if this is due to a lack of consistency, an absence of synergy or what.

Anyway, the ILO can enforce its standards according to its own machinery and it certainly manages with patience in democratic countries or those in transition to democracy and the idea of awarding an ILO labe to the best is certainly interesting. But what do you d against the dictatorships which continue to marke throughout the world the production of prison labou or, indeed, the output of manpower that is deprived o all possibility of individual or collective defence of it elementary rights? Therefore, there seems to be closed barrier between business and human rights an one may wonder if there is going to be any real effec within countries under a dictatorship of any solem proclamation of a body of fundamental rights. Ther is an undeniable risk of sliding from specific and concrete standards towards general declarations tha have little constraining force, that could finally be reduced to the Universal Declaration of Human Right which celebrates its 50th anniversary next year.

I cannot comment now on the Director-General' Report on the situation of workers in the occupie Arab territories. It is extremely severe, but it is objective and courageous and unfortunately confirms great many worries for the establishment of a just an lasting peace which will only emerge, doubtless, whe the end of the occupation takes place.

Fifth sitting

The PRESIDENT (Mr. KHALIL) — In the Name of Allah, the Merciful, the Compassionate. We start this sitting with the continuation of the discussion of the reports of the Chairperson of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Original Arabic: Mr. EL HARRAS (Employers' adviser, Morocco) — On behalf of the Employers' delegates of Morocco to this 85th Session of the International Labour Conference I have the honour to extend my most sincere congratulations to the Chairperson of the Governing Body of the ILO for his report, and to the President on her election to the presidency of this Conference.

As regards the Report submitted by the Director-General of the ILO, which this year addresses the ILO, standard setting and globalization, in all objectivity and honesty we must recognize its great wealth, both in terms of its content and the proposals it sets out.

Allow me to focus on three themes: first, the social dimension and the liberalization of trade; second, how to adapt labour standards to the liberalization of trade; and third, the promotion of employment, the flexibility of labour law, and the encouragement of the creation of enterprises.

As regards the first point, the social dimension and liberalization of trade, social questions are becoming more and more global in nature, reflecting economic globalization and the liberalization of trade. Trade liberalization and globalization are very closely linked, as we can clearly see today. Moreover, the idea that trade liberalization cannot proceed without social progress is gaining currency.

Competitiveness is the key to economic progress. The advantages that developing countries draw from their levels of wages and social protection, which are low in comparison with those of the developed countries, are self-evident and stem from the logic of production. They should be maintained neither artificially lower nor artificially higher than their genuine productive capacities.

We can thus see the great difficulty of resorting to simplified and uniform solutions in the social field as trade is liberalized.

It would appear that the idea of adopting a social clause has been set aside for the time being. But the ILO was called upon to take care of the social dimension. The Report of the Director-General of the ILO sets out proposals for a social label instead of the social clause, which is perceived as having a more protectionist connotation.

While it is true that this proposal is innovative as regards its concept, methods and objectives, we must recognize that it involves a great threat as regards the exclusion from the world market of products coming from most of the developing countries.

I cannot claim to have an alternative overall solution to this problem. However, allow me to invoke a strategy which is no doubt nothing new, but which is still quite valid. Let us seek adequate, appropriate and effective means to ensure that wage levels and social protection develop hand in hand with the competitiveness of the different national economies concerned.

For this to occur, two needs must be met. First, the fundamental rights of workers must be respected. But these rights must be appropriate, flexible and capable of evolving. Secondly, there must be a social dialogue in a tripartite form at the local and national levels.

The Kingdom of Morocco, through on the one hand the National Council for Social Dialogue and on the other hand meetings and gatherings which bring together trade unions, employers and the public authorities, has made significant progress in this respect.

However, regardless of what kinds of internal socio-economic and socio-political reforms might be introduced in the developing countries, I think the developed countries should contribute their help and assistance to allow for an acceleration of economic and social development in these countries. In this sense, the recent 50th anniversary of the Marshall Plan is particularly significant for economic and political reasons. But that Plan was for European countries.

Secondly, I would like to address the question of how to adapt labour standards to the liberalization of trade. In an ever changing world, the standard-setting activities of the ILO cannot be left on the sideline. Hence the importance of better targeted standards, with an optimal added value.

In this regard we can quite clearly see the importance of striking a balance between regulation on the one hand and on the other hand initiatives taken by the social partners to ensure their freedom of action, as is stated in the report. This underscores the importance of Recommendations which are perfectly independent, accompanied, no doubt, by new follow-up methods, such as awareness programmes at the national and international level, training programmes, etc.

It would appear, furthermore, desirable to evaluate and revise the Conventions which already exist, so as to maintain those which are still adapted to the economic situation.

Thirdly, as regards the promotion of employment, flexibility of labour law and the encouragement of the creation of enterprises, it is more and more clear for developed countries and all the more so for developing countries that the main challenge is now the promotion of employment, while at the same time the respect of the fundamental rights of workers — the basis of social peace — cannot be disregarded.

We must acknowledge that it is not an easy task to work on both these problems at once.

One possible solution in the offing involves "flexibility with regard to labour law", accompanied by a genuine strategy for the promotion of enterprises. This entails taking all the necessary measures to promote employment by stimulating the creation of enterprises, and particularly small and medium-sized enterprises. The ILO's choice of this theme for the agenda of this session is most timely.

A labour-law strategy which is flexible in the positive meaning of the term would necessarily involve two conditions: firstly, the promotion of a genuine strategy, and then a search for appropriate means.

Original Spanish: Mr. ARTHUR ERRAZURIZ (Employers' adviser, Chile) — Madam President, the changes that have taken place in the world in the last decade have been accompanied by a revitalization of the concept of free enterprise, that countries, which previously had very different ideological approaches, now recognize as the best way of achieving full employment and an increase in standards of living, as set forth in the Declaration of Philadelphia.

Companies are once more assuming their role as protagonist which the economic policies of most countries had conferred upon them, yet with a different face from the time when the ILO originally adopted most of its standard-setting activities. The technical requirements of the modern firm mean that the contribution of specialized workers is reducing the relative importance of capital, so that amongst other factors, the differences that inspired the initial Conventions are no longer prevalent.

Although the protection of workers continues to be a need to which the ILO must attend through its standard-setting activity, it is obvious today that the most urgent problem is to solve the problem of unemployment which is affecting most of the countries in the world. For this reason, it seems to us that the ILO's first priority should be to reorient its standard-setting activities with a greater commitment to the creation of productive employment which is the most serious problem today. This commitment is reflected in the need to make standards more flexible, not in order to lessen the impact, but instead to guarantee their application to a wide variety of different situations in countries with very different degrees of development.

Flexibility in terms of labour is becoming an even more pressing need, if one bears in mind the process of trade in goods and services, and the movement of capital which accompanies the globalization of the economy.

Some countries have attempted to establish so-called social clauses in international trade treaties in order to protect themselves from dumping to which they feel they are exposed in negotiating with countries with a lesser degree of development, and consequently, with lower wage levels.

The International Organization of Employers, like the Singapore Ministerial Conference, categorically rejected the use of labour standards with protectionist purposes, and agreed in recognizing the legitimacy of the notion of comparative advantage of developing countries with their low wage levels. No developing country is proud of having this comparative advantage. Instead, it is in our interest to achieve development, and with it, better standards of living and working conditions in general. This obliges us to struggle against any protectionist barrier of any kind whatsoever in order to continue to make progress towards the attainment of the aforementioned objectives.

In the Singapore Declaration, the signatories committed themselves to observing internationally recognized labour standards, and expressed their support for the ILO's promotional activities. In this sense, we support the effort being made by the ILO to promote core labour Conventions and we encourage the ILO to find the appropriate supervisory mechanisms even in those countries that have not yet ratified these Conventions.

However, the idea of establishing labels to identify those products which have been made in full observance of basic labour laws, seems to us to undermine the ethical commitment which ultimately should guide countries towards fulfilment of standards.

In order to assume this task, the ILO should gain in credibility through the effectiveness of its instruments. There is no doubt, as stated by the Director-General in his Report, that Conventions are one of the means, no doubt the most important means available to the ILO, of achieving its objectives and of making the values set forth in the Constitution more tangible. However, the proliferation of unratified Conventions, even in the case of those countries that voted in favour of these Conventions, has undermined its credibility. We believe, therefore, that it is indispensable to do away with the policy of adopting one or two Conventions per year, and instead to have recourse to the process of drafting standards only when absolutely necessary, when the health or the fundamental rights of workers are affected.

The Report recognizes that the globalization of the economy obliges us to rethink fundamental values and concepts in standard-setting activity, while expressing concern about the validity of fundamental values, beginning with social justice which seems difficult to preserve in an environment which is governed by unbridled competition. First of all, we do not desire unbridled competition. We want competition which is based upon the basic principles of the ILO.

We can understand the doubts and uncertainties created by such a sudden change on the world stage. However, we do not understand the doubts expressed concerning the capacity of an economic system based on competition to generate better conditions of employment and to promote social justice. This is the only system that has been able to promote development and to improve the living standard of workers in countries that have adopted them. Let us look at this forum. Which countries have the highest standards of living? Those whose governments, for decades, have based their development patterns on the centralized planning systems of states, or those that have been involved in a system of free enterprise which is becoming a free and competitive market? Why was the existence of social justice never called into question when prevailing economic systems condemned their countries to stagnation and their workers to poverty? Globalization of the economy can transfer well-being from the more developed countries towards those which, since they have a lesser degree of development, have comparative advantages in terms of wages. Yet this does not harm the principle of social justice. On the contrary, it serves to promote it.

There is no doubt in my mind that the future is promising, more so than the recent past. Whether this hope materializes depends, to a large extent, on the attitude assumed by the social partners. Private enterprise in an atmosphere of healthy national and international competition is the best instrument to continue to open up new opportunities for progress. The ILO is called upon to encourage this process and to channel it through the basic labour principles which guarantee effective social justice.

Mr. ABDELLA (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Ethiopia) — It is indeed a pleasure and an honour for me to be accorded this opportunity to address this august Conference. At the outset, allow me, Madam President, to congratulate you on behalf of the Federal Democratic Republic of Ethiopia, and on my own behalf, for your well-deserved election to the presidency of this historic Conference. My delegation is fully confident that, with your able guidance, our deliberations will reach a successful conclusion. May I also seize this opportunity to commend the Director-General and his competent staff for the well-researched and comprehensive reports placed before us. These valuable reports draw our attention to the most topical issues of all time.

This Conference will be a landmark in the history of the ILO and it will enable us to reassess ILO's past achievements and meet the challenges of the twenty-first century. My Government reiterates its support and commitment to the ILO and attaches paramount importance to its role as a centre of excellence and reference in the areas of international labour standards. The Report of the Director-General, entitled The ILO, standard setting and globalization merits careful consideration. We appreciate his tenacious efforts to reconcile varying views on the most controversial issues of the link between international trade and labour standards.

The World Trade Organization's Singapore Ministerial Conference, in paragraph 4 of its Declaration, reaffirmed the commitment of governments to the observance of internationally recognized core labour standards and they acknowledged the central role of the ILO in setting and dealing with such standards.

The same Ministerial Conference has categorically rejected the use of labour standards for protectionist purposes in international trade and agreed that the comparative advantage of countries must in no way be put into question. In this regard it is important for the ILO to reassert its role in the field of standard setting to ensure that labour standards in all countries are promoted for the betterment of workers through, primarily, the strengthening of the existing supervisory mechanisms as contained in article 19 of the Constitution for the application of core and fundamental Conventions of the ILO.

As you may be well aware, the Government of the Federal Democratic Republic of Ethiopia is committed to a radical reform programme with the objective of moving to a free market economy. The transition from a command economy to an economic system driven by market forces had to take place in a particularly difficult and complex situation because of the need to rehabilitate the war-devastated economy. The objective reality of Ethiopia has been transformed in the past six years so radically that what we are talking about today is a new Ethiopia which has begun to fulfil its economic potentials. An average growth rate of gross domestic product of more than 7 per cent over the last four years after decades of economic decline, clearly indicates that Ethiopia is about to take off. On the political front, we have put in place the necessary political institutions and democratic structures that guarantee for the country and its peoples durable peace and stability.

Similarly, our national labour law guarantees tripartite consultation and we are fully committed to these principles with social partners.

With regard to the problems and crisis created within the Supreme Council of the Confederation of Ethiopian Trade Unions for almost the last three years it has now been overcome after relentless effort on the part of the workers. To this end, on 25 April 1997, the eighth General Assembly of the CETU decided to reorganize and reinstate the Confederation of Ethiopian Trade Unions based on the free will of its entire members. The establishment of the Confederation of Ethiopian Trade Unions is a most gratifying outcome, especially for the leaders of the industrial trade union federations who have sorted out their differences for the sake of trade union unity and in the interests of the working people of Ethiopia. On the employers' side, the Ethiopian Employers' Federation was already established, thus making it possible for us to be here as a tripartite delegation. In this connection, allow me to express my sincere gratitude to the ILO officials and experts as well as to the Director-General for their valuable support for the reinstatement of the Confederation of Ethiopian Trade Unions. Let me reiterate that we remain committed to international labour standards as our guiding principles governing worker-employer relations and labour matters, ensuring social justice and social peace.

Turning to the remaining agenda items, particularly the issue of contract labour, general conditions to stimulate job creation in small and medium-sized enterprises and the revision of the fee-charging employment agencies Convention are all timely and pertinent to the work of this session of the Conference.

My delegation believes that the adoption of such international instruments to address problems of our working population and in view of the dynamic global, economic and social changes should be our prime concern.

In conclusion I would like to share with you today that our experience has taught us the difficulty of establishing and promoting democratic culture in developing countries like Ethiopia. The democratization process in my country is bound to be slow and full of daunting tasks. Nevertheless, despite the hurdles, the Federal Democratic Republic of Ethiopia is determined to pursue the ideals of democracy and development with vigour and determination. In this regard we attach paramount importance to the ILO's technical assistance activities and to its active partnership policy in particular. We request the Director-General to upgrade and strengthen the Addis Ababa multidisciplinary team and the ILO Area Office with the necessary personnel including experts in the field of labour standards, to enable the team and the Office to discharge their responsibilities fully and efficiently.

Mr. MINTOO (Employers' delegate, Bangladesh) — The Director-General has submitted a well-prepared Report to the Conference. Like many other LDCs, we are concerned about certain aspects of his Report, especially those which place emphasis on uniformity of observance of core labour standards by member countries, to ensure that social progress in all countries accompanies the economic progress resulting from trade liberalization. In other words, the Director-General's proposal is to confer on countries a social label for their products in return for the observance of core labour Conventions. This amounts to a more wide canvas than the WTO proposal as it will cover not only the goods which are traded on the international market but also those traded on the domestic market. We agree with the Director-General that social progress is indispensable to the consolidation of the multilateral system but this has wider implications for the less developed countries.

If the LDCs have to address the core social agenda and use benefits arising from globalization to achieve social progress, they invariably need time-bound partnership programmes and reciprocation from the developed countries. The developed countries ought to recognize the developing countries' competitive development as a positive or supplementary factor in their own growth process, instead of imposing ill-conceived conditionalities based on lofty-sounding principles such as environmental sustainability, social rights, etc. Nothing short of renewed international commitment will enable the less developed countries to achieve social progress, as nearly 30 per cent of their workforce remain unemployed or underemployed. The developing countries are second to none in ameliorating the social conditions of their people if they have the means to do so. Several countries have already initiated measures which could not have been contemplated a few years ago. For example, Bangladesh has taken determined steps to take millions of children out of work and admit them to educational institutions to ensure their education and skill development. All such efforts, in order to be sustainable, require resources. Social progress cannot be achieved by adopting the so-called core Conventions. Bangladesh has been a signatory to all but one of the five core ILO Conventions, but these have been of least help to its task of socio-economic development. On the other hand, social progress will become easy when developing countries are able to integrate equitably into the world economy and become new growth poles. For this they need increasing development assistance, direct investment and technology, so as to develop competitive capacities in manufacturing and services. It is universally recognized that the developing countries are not claiming anything which is against the legitimate interests of the developed countries. Developing countries are asking for what they fully deserve, if there is to be a shared future for our world.

The precarious resource constraints of the LDCs have been highlighted in an UNCTAD study. It shows that, despite the recovery in the world economy, the real GDP growth of the LDCs fared poorly during the first four years of the 1990s, declined from the 2.3 per cent achieved during the 1980s. With the average annual growth rate of the population at 2.9 per cent, GDP per capita declined 1.1 per cent annually, thus threatening to worsen the already precarious income-consumption levels, as well as to widen the savings-investment gap in these countries. Assistance to the developing countries (ODA) has declined. The GNP/ODA ratio for the donor countries declined to 0.07 per cent in 1993, as against the target of 0.20 per cent. The flow of foreign direct investment (FDI) to all LDCs amounted to less than 1 per cent. Surely much remains to be done at the international level.

However, the growth rate of Bangladesh has been somewhat better than most of the other LDCs. The average GDP growth rate has been nearly 5 per cent for several years. Notwithstanding the limitation of resources, Bangladesh has introduced a wide range of policies and institutional reforms to accelerate the socio-economic development. Special focus has been placed on human rights, human resources development, increased participation of women in development activities, poverty alleviation, environmental protection, and so on.

Original Spanish: Mr. SADHALA (Employers' delegate, Dominican Republic) — The delegation of the Employers of the Dominican Republic presents its greetings to the delegations present at this 85th Session of the International Labour Conference, which is taking place at a time of great changes and important challenges in our world, and also of opportunities for this Organization.

We we would like to express our warmest congratulations to the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Michel Hansenne, for the excellent work carried out during the past year and for the decision to select standard setting and globalization as the theme for his Report this year.

Major changes have occurred in the world since the great economic powers agreed to live in a world of peace, where the battles are fought at the commercial, economic and technical levels, with interdependent capital and labour markets.

Development, democracy and respect for human rights have become the driving force of human action. Today more than ever, these concepts are interwoven, even more so since the Singapore Meeting and the Copenhagen Summit, when the ILO's role in promoting respect for its Conventions was acknowledged. We consider it a great step forward that the participants in both meetings recognized the ILO as the appropriate body to deal with social questions at the world level.

In the Dominican Republic we are striving to perfect our democracy by encouraging our citizens to become more involved and by ensuring respect for basic human rights. We are making tremendous efforts with a view to integrating our economy in the global context, to ensure that it is both competitive and can support extensive human changes.

We believe that the ILO continues to be an ideal instrument to pioneer change and bring about social justice without disorder or violence. But we also believe that the time has come for this Organization to strengthen its new role and to become a true creator of human liberty. We would like its standard-setting activities to be studied in detail, as many of its standards no longer match the new realities of a world whose economy is undergoing globalization.

The power of private initiative requires a fresh boost, which only a revision of the ILO's standards can provide. "Certification" of observance of labour rights, or a "global social label" would only place obstacles in the way of global development, as it would reduce the independence of our constituents' action and make trade, investment, technological change, capital markets and human resources dependent on arbitrary factors. This would not be compatible with our approach on the eve of the third millennium.

This Conference, with its theme of standard setting, may itself be considered a standard-setting event, and this should prompt us to seek new ways and mechanisms to ensure that our work finds its place in the international community.

In essence, we must strengthen the ILO's supervisory mechanisms for the fundamental Conventions while at the same time adapting the Organization to new challenges and opportunities which its constituents now face.

We believe that a balance between economic development and social welfare must be dynamic, and can only be possible if the relatively less developed countries succeed in obtaining international cooperation, as well as the cooperation of the capital markets. It will only be possible if they receive the necessary investment, with which to increase productive employment and generate wealth for their population.

We subscribe to the proposals made by the Director-General of the ILO with regard to an overall mechanism to assess the Conventions and Recommendations. We would like to reiterate our support for tripartism, which we see as an appropriate vehicle for achieving a consensus between the various social players, including the members of civil society.

We urge the ILO and the Director-General to take specific measures so that existing standards can be revised and adjusted to the phenomenon of globalization. We firmly support the liberalization of international trade concurrent with an improvement in our democratic systems and respect for fundamental and inalienable human rights, with a view to achieving peace, development and fulfilment for all of humanity.

Original Nepalese: Mr. NEUPANE (Minister of Labour, Nepal) — At the outset, let me on behalf of the Nepalese delegation extend our warmest congratulations to you Madam President on your unanimous election to the high office of the President of the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference. It is indeed a great pleasure for me to be amongst you in this beautiful city of Geneva and have this opportunity to address this important Conference.

We attach great importance to the Reports of the Chairperson of the Governing Body and of the Director-General. These Reports have covered the major issues emerging in the context of an ever- changing world. The Report has also clarified the ILO's position on social justice, poverty and the welfare of the working masses, for which my delegation would like to extend its sincere thanks. However, our attention has also been drawn to those aspects of the Report that are well beyond our ability to implement.

We attach great importance to the role of the ILO in standard setting and the promotion of labour standards. We fully reaffirm our commitment to observe internationally recognized core labour standards. However, labour standards should be seen only as an integral part of social progress. Attempts to link labour standards with trade and social labelling seen with a one-sided perspective naturally concern us greatly. The prevailing socio-economic situation in our country does not allow us to accept such conditionalities. In this context we share the concern expressed by many delegations of the developing world in this Conference.

Nepal is one of the least developed countries of the world as well as being land-locked, and is striving to accelerate the pace of socio-economic development under the multi-party system of the Government adopted since 1990. As a non-aligned country committed to non-interference we upheld the Charter of the United Nations as our guiding principle. We are making sincere efforts to implement the principles and plan of action adopted by the World Summit for Social Development held in Copenhagen in 1995.

In the context of increasing globalization, Nepal cannot remain indifferent to this issue. However, liberalization, globalization and the market-oriented economy should be adopted in favour of the working community to the maximum possible in order to achieve sustainable progress.

In order to supplement our national objectives, the Ministry of Labour has, over the years, been laying down considerable emphasis on issues of employment promotion, particularly for the underprivileged and economically backward communities and the rural poor, through providing requisite skills to such a population to prepare them to find jobs in the labour market.

In our socio-economic context, problems of child labour and bonded labour are the sad realities and the reflection of existing acute poverty, exploitative socio-economic relations and to some extent the feudalistic social conservatism. In our view, progressive elimination of child labour is to be given top priority. This does not however mean a passive policy with a feeling that it would take a very long time, or an abrupt elimination with extreme measures like boycott of third-world export items, blamed on the use of child labour. With regard to liberation of bonded labour, the determined efforts of Kamaiyas (the bonded agro-labourers) themselves are the most important prerequisites. However, the State should encourage them to start organized efforts and should protect their basic human rights. In this connection the MOL has already established a child-development and welfare fund, and various efforts are carried out in association with social partners and NGOs under the cooperation of ILO/IPEC. Similarly, HMG Nepal is making efforts to liberate Kamaiyas from bonded conditions and to make them enter the labour market and have fixed minimum wages.

The greatest challenge faced by the social partners engaged in social development is to reform labour and social policies in such a manner that promotes productivity, fair wages and full employment while ensuring a fair distribution of national wealth in this society.

As my country is primarily agricultural, with more than 81 per cent of the workforce involved in rural agriculture, we highly recognize the significance of the Conventions on rural and agricultural workers. We are thinking about empowering the rural workers' organizations. It is to be noted that remaining tripartite constituents in our country are also asking for the ratification of ILO Conventions on rural and agricultural workers. In this connection my delegation is pleased to reveal here that HMG Nepal has already ratified some of the ILO Conventions and some are in the process of ratification, including the Conventions on rural and agricultural workers.

The theme of general conditions to stimulate job creation in small and medium-sized enterprises assumes profound significance. Such enterprises have been regarded as a major instrument for redressing the issues of employment and poverty alleviation. We are fully aware that sustainable progress and growth is dependent on how well such enterprises respond to the needs of the economy. Hence we strongly opine that these enterprises need to be reoriented with new attitudes and a new outlook to enable them to play a key role in enhancing national productivity, economic efficiency and job creation while ensuring general working conditions to meet challenges in a globalized economy.

My delegation feels that the issue of contract labour has assumed strategic importance in the field of labour relations. It is really an urgent need to emphasize the sufferings of casual workers as an outcome of the present mode of globalization. In our opinion contract workers need to be protected and should be covered by the comprehensive social security network.

With regard to the amendments to the Conventions of the ILO, we feel that the time has come to review a number of these Conventions. Such instruments need to be abrogated according to the needs of the changing world situation.

To conclude, my delegation would like to reiterate that the least developed as well as land-locked countries, such as Nepal, need closer attention of international agencies and developed countries to accelerate the pace of development and socio-economic welfare. We would also like to urge here as in the preceding sessions to upgrade the office of the senior ILO Adviser in Kathmandu with increased resources and activities to meet the growing needs of the country in the labour-related field. With a firm conviction that fruitful and pragmatic resolutions will emerge from the deliberations of this Conference, I wish this session a grand success.

Original Spanish: Mr. BONILLA GARCIA (Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, Mexico) — Allow me to congratulate the President most cordially on her election. The Report of the Director-General presents a topic which the Government of Mexico considers to be of utmost importance: concern about how the ILO should shoulder its responsibilities faced with the challenges of our times.

Mexico subscribes to the fundamental principles set out in the Report: freedom of association and collective bargaining, prohibition of forced labour, equal remuneration, non-discrimination and minimum age. These are principles which the Mexican Constitution has enshrined since 1917, whose spirit, just as that of the ILO Constitution, is based on the conviction that nations must adopt labour systems based on justice and equity.

The ILO has a host of ways to promote the objectives of social justice. In keeping with the solemn obligation to encourage programmes which allow for the economic progress of its Members, as contained in the Declaration of Philadelphia, the ILO must pay equal attention to standard setting and to other methods related to cooperation. In this way it will be able to exert an influence in areas where otherwise it would be unlikely to find the values contained in its standards.

We must support a new initiative, through the competent bodies of the Organization, to bring about a transformation of the social and economic realities of all countries. Employment promotion as a means of increasing living standards, the development of vocational training, the improvement of the quality and scope of education, the identification of the factors which restrict employment creation and the development of comparable information, provide, inter alia, a formidable set of tasks for the Organization and its member States.

Changing this reality is essential for the ratification of Conventions, since ratification not only expresses political will but a real and effective possibility of observance. The Declaration of Philadelphia also includes this specific point, specifying that the procedures for application have to take into account the degree of social and economic development of each people.

If we, the Members, were to subscribe to the idea of a mechanism through which the ILO would "certify" the observance of Conventions — even ones that have not been ratified — as well as progress in favour of social justice in each country, we would be ignoring our different national realities. We would be denying the freedom of each Member to determine its obligations in a sovereign manner and we would be giving up the inherent right of the citizens themselves to judge and assess the progress achieved in their own countries. To require that standards be observed which have not been approved by the competent bodies of the States is therefore a dangerous initiative.

The supervisory tasks proposed would bypass the practices established by the Organization and could even be detrimental to the legal framework of the member countries.

In his message to the Conference on 3 June 1997 the Director-General pointed out the importance of not examining an initiative such as that of a social label with haste and instead viewing it as a long-term matter for reflection for which he proposes a possible way of proceeding and not a ready-made solution. Indeed, because of its importance and potential impact it would be necessary to examine with the utmost objectivity its appropriateness, and its possible content and associated processes. We must avoid the risk that, starting from the lofty labour and human objectives to which it aspires, it could in practice become a major source of restriction to trade, and at the beginning of an era, if not of persecution, then of confrontation and exclusion, instead of being a time of collaboration for progress and cooperation for development.

As regards the regrouping of standards, we agree with the Director-General on the appropriateness of drawing up a list which avoids dispersion and which would serve as a guide to facilitate the identification and implementation of these Conventions which, following the proposed new examination, were considered relevant.

Lastly, I would like to stress that the labour conditions of a country are determined by its historical, political, economic, cultural and social circumstances. The opening up of trade is only part of the whole. It is recommended that the ILO maintain an overall view so that one specific element does not determine the direction its activities take.

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT (Mr. KHALIL) — The list of speakers on the reports of the Chairperson of the Governing Body and of the Director-General is now closed.

FIRST REPORT OF THE FINANCE COMMITTEE OF GOVERNMENT REPRESENTATIVES: SUBMISSION, DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT (Mr. KHALIL) — We shall now proceed to the first report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives (Provisional Record No. 13). I give the floor to Mr. Etiang, Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, Uganda, and Chairperson and Reporter of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives, who will present the report.

Mr. ETIANG (Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, Uganda; Chairperson and Reporter of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives) — I have the honour to submit to the Conference the first report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives. This report is circulated as Provisional Record No. 13 and contains four resolutions authorizing Cape Verde, Paraguay, Dominican Republic and Djibouti to vote.

The Finance Committee considered the requests received from the Governments of the four countries and was satisfied that the failure to pay their contributions had been due to conditions beyond the control of the Members and that adequate measures were proposed for settlement of the arrears.

The Finance Committee adopted four resolutions which propose that, in conformity with paragraph 4 of article 13 of the ILO Constitution, Cape Verde, Paraguay, Dominican Republic and Djibouti should be given authorization to vote. The texts of the resolutions are contained in the appendix to the report.

You will recall that yesterday the Conference approved an amendment to article 32 of the Standing Orders. With the adoption of that amendment Paraguay has regained its right to vote. It will therefore now only be necessary to consider the resolutions in respect of Cape Verde, Dominican Republic and Djibouti.

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT (Mr. KHALIL) — I thank Mr. Etiang for submitting his report. We shall now move on to the discussion of the report. If no one wishes to take the floor, we shall proceed to the adoption of the body of the report, i.e. paragraphs 1 to 38. May I take it that paragraphs 1 to 38 are adopted?

(The report is adopted — paragraphs 1 to 38.)

May I take it that the resolution concerning the arrears of contributions of Cape Verde is adopted?

May I take it that the resolution concerning the arrears of contributions of the Dominican Republic is adopted?

May I take it that the resolution concerning the arrears of contributions of Djibouti is adopted?

May I take it that the report as a whole is adopted?

RECORD VOTE ON THE RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE ARREARS OF CONTRIBUTIONS OF CAPE VERDE

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT (Mr. KHALIL) — We shall now take a record vote on the arrears of contributions of Cape Verde. I would remind you that the Conference may, by a two-thirds majority of the votes cast by the delegates present, permit a member State in arrears to vote if it is satisfied that failure to pay is due to conditions beyond the control of the Member.

The vote shows that we do not have a quorum at this stage. We shall therefore postpone any further voting until later.

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT (Mr. KHALIL) — We shall now resume our discussion of the reports of the Chairperson of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Ms. FITZGERALD (Minister for Labour Affairs, Ireland) — The process of globalization has opened up many exciting possibilities but it has also generated many fears about the possible impact on employment and working conditions. It is clear that the underlying issues could be very divisive and, if they are not dealt with in a way which commands widespread agreement and respect, could have a considerable negative impact.

Accordingly, the international community faces a major challenge. It is a measure of the respect which is accorded to this Organization that in Singapore the World Trade Organization turned to the ILO to meet the challenge. The Conference provides a major opportunity to make progress in the debate on globalization and social progress which has been under way for some time, and while this is an urgent and important debate, it is extremely important that we all listen to one another. No course of action has any prospect of success unless it commands widespread support. It will fail if it is seen to unfairly favour some economic interests over others. Above all there must be tolerance and mutual understanding, a preparedness to listen to each other if this job is to be successfully completed. It is crucial for member States to see that we all have a shared interest in seeing that the potential of globalization for economic progress and social development is fully realized and this will not happen unless we can establish a broad consensus.

I now turn to the Director-General's Report which provides us with a very thought-provoking and comprehensive analysis. A number of points stand out.

Firstly, it is clear that while the ILO Constitution does not rank the different standards in order of priority, there is broad agreement on what constitutes core labour standards and I think the more targeted approach suggested by the Director-General is important if we are to achieve what we set out to achieve.

Secondly, there is the question of what means need to be adopted to make progress on this issue. The possibilities are either to develop new instruments, amend the ILO Constitution, or proceed within the existing Constitution. We believe that proceeding within the existing Constitution is more likely to command widespread support and establish the consensus we require.

Finally, it is important to recognize that different countries are at different levels of development, and in establishing core standards it is important to distinguish in an objective way between countries which have not reached those standards because of a level of underdevelopment and countries which have chosen not to make any serious attempt on those standards.

I was very much struck yesterday at a meeting between the European and Asian countries at what the Indian delegate said. He reminded us that nobody is more concerned about low labour standards than the people of the country concerned. It is not a question of the world community from the outside having a concern, those concerns are most deeply felt among the people of the country concerned.

In helping, in a very positive way, countries which are underdeveloped to meet the core labour standards, it is important that we look at the amount of time it takes to make progress. In the European Community, in terms of the project on economic and monetary union, the Maastricht Treaty lays out particular standards, but it also recognizes as valid, countries which are making a serious effort to meet the standards. In other words, it is not the absolute achievement of the target but the fact that there is steady, substantial and serious progress on the way to reaching those standards by a target timetable, and I think that this approach is also one we could adopt in the achievement of labour standards across the world.

Finally, as the Director-General has noted in his Report, discussion of this issue in the past has often degenerated into mutual accusations of social dumping and protectionism. It is important that we have a more productive debate. In particular, I think it is important to recognize that high social standards are not associated with a loss of competitiveness. That would be an entirely false understanding or basis for the debate. High social standards are not incompatible with competitiveness and, indeed, they enhance competitiveness. The role of social protection systems in facilitating adaptation to technological change has often been noted. The role of social partnership and recognition of collective bargaining in ensuring progress has been noted and when one considers the problem of child labour, which was the theme of last year's Conference, it is clear that any country which tolerates child labour and fails to ensure that its children are properly educated, is condemning itself to permanent underdevelopment. Accordingly, it is important that a comprehensive understanding of the complex relationship between economic and social progress underpins the debate.

In conclusion, I want to say that I think we must all listen to one another and I think a very important task has been assigned to the ILO. The future of this Organization, the esteem in which it is held, will depend on how successfully we manage that challenge, in partnership, in solidarity and in understanding with each other.

(Ms. Keltošová takes the Chair.)

Original Arabic: Mr. AL-KULAIB (Minister of Social Affairs and Labour, Kuwait) — In the Name of Allah, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I have the honour to congratulate you, Madam President and your Vice-Presidents, on your election to the presidency of this Conference. I hope that our discussions will be fruitful and positive and help to foster peace and justice in the world.

I wish to thank the Director-General for his Report on standard setting and globalization. And after reading the Report and the various suggestions for increasing the effectiveness of international standards, I wish to share a few ideas and raise a few questions.

First of all, the ILO has done a very good job in adopting over 300 Conventions and Recommendations, which are the backbone of international labour legislation, as regards freedom of association, non-discrimination, human rights, occupational safety and health, the regulation of employment and working conditions, etc.

Secondly, international labour standards have had an impact on the national legislation of member States and have thus contributed to promoting conditions of work and equality of opportunity for millions of workers. Studies have shown that the supervisory and follow-up machinery, together with a growing national awareness, has been conducive to an improvement in national employment practices. As Wilfred Jenks once said, in less than half a century the ILO has created an encyclopaedia of social justice that has had a real impact on social legislation in a number of member States.

Third, the recent drop in the number of ratifications in recent years should not discourage the Organization from continuing setting standards and making them more relevant. The drop in ratifications is only to be expected, as the Organization has adopted a considerable number of instruments in the past few years.

Fourth, the globalization of the economy and its possible effect on future standard-setting activities, the growing inequality of earnings and the varying levels of protection are other suitable areas for standard setting. The ILO should continue guaranteeing respect for fundamental rights by all the partners in the multilateral trade system, by means of programmes conducive to full employment, social security, equal remuneration, freedom of association, non-discrimination and improved standards of living and with a view to the attainment of social justice.

Fifth, we agree that instruments should be better targeted, more in line with latest developments and more conscientiously applied. We also agree with the report about the intrinsic suitability of standards, which should benefit as many workers as possible (especially the most vulnerable workers), about the value added of the proposed instruments and about the need to revise and reassess them from time to time. In his 1964 Report, the Director-General, speaking about the content of standards, said that they should confine themselves to a number of essential points without too many mandatory clauses and superficial detail.

Sixth, we feel that the existing supervisory and follow-up machinery provided for in the Constitution is sufficient to achieve the ILO's objectives. Setting up new machinery would make the Conventions much less flexible and discourage member States from ratifying new instruments.

I would like to make suggestions for improving the application of standards at the national level. I believe that any new standards that are adopted should correspond to reality. Above all, the wording should be flexible enough to give national legislatures a certain leeway. One form of flexibility is to allow the partial ratification of certain provisions. The ILO must continue to provide its Members with technical assistance to help them overcome their difficulties, prepare the required reports and amend their legislation. It must also help them consolidate their labour inspection services so that they can do their job properly and implement the provisions of the Conventions effectively.

Kuwait has reached a balance between the protection of the middle classes and of the least privileged segments of the population by catering to the needs of families. There is hardly any taxation; income tax is no more than 1.5 per cent compared to 22-43 per cent in some countries. We have a well-established family policy under which needy families receive benefits. The Government supports cooperatives and non-governmental organizations and provides assistance for infants, young people, old people and certain specific groups.

Before I conclude, I would like to stress how dangerous Israel's settlement policy is in the occupied Arab territories of Palestine, the Golan and southern Lebanon, where it is having a disastrous effect on the situation and living conditions of workers and thus threatening peace and stability in the region. We appeal to the parties concerned to the relevant international resolutions and agreements that have been concluded.

I am sure that, with the will of the parties present at the Conference, we can achieve the ILO's objective of a better world where prosperity and social justice reigns for millions of workers who aspire to the realization of the fundamental rights embodied in the ILO Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia.

Original French: Mr. OUEDRAOGO (Government delegate, Burkina Faso) — Madam President, distinguished delegates, it is an honour and a great pleasure for me to take the floor before this large family of the world of labour, that is the International Labour Organization.

First of all, before making any other comments; I wish to associate myself with those that have taken the floor before me in addressing, on behalf of the delegation of Burkina Faso and on my own behalf, our warm congratulations to Ms. Olga Keltošová, Minister of Labour and Social Affairs of Slovakia, and also to the other officers of the Conference on their election to head our august assembly. Their qualities and their broad range of skills, which have been seen in the way they have led such fruitful debates, reassure us as to the success of this Conference.

As to the Director-General's Report, allow me to commend it for its quality, its relevance, and the depth of analysis it.contains. Yet again the Director-General has been able to reflect the concerns of States and their social partners, and to defend the ideals of the International Labour Office in its continuous, concerted and dynamic action for the economic and social development of our various countries.

In the course of this session we are called upon to think about a subject which is important, sensitive and also topical with regard to the global economic context, in other words, The ILO, standard setting and globalization. We no longer need to prove how relevant this theme is at a time when our countries are confronted with the need to adapt their legal environment in general and their labour legislation, in particular, to the economic changes under way. It is thus with pride that I wish to add the modest contribution of Burkina Faso to that of other countries committed to this brainstorming, which should make it possible to propose appropriate solutions likely to improve the action of the International Labour Organization.

Burkina Faso is aware that our developing countries and other peoples in the world cannot content themselves with undergoing globalization. Globalization should be accompanied by efficient standard-setting action in order to ensure social progress and social justice that people are entitled to expect. For this reason my country endorses the major guidelines advocated in the Director-General's Report in order to orientate the action of our Organization in the years to come, as follows:

First, the ILO should ensure even greater universality of application of the International Labour Organization's standards concerning the fundamental rights as a condition for the participation of workers in the benefits of globalization.

Secondly, the ILO should improve the selection of new standards and explore further the variety and flexibility of means of action in the International Labour Organization in order to enhance the relevance and the effectiveness of those standards.

As to the former aspect, Burkina Faso is proud to be one of those countries which has ratified the relevant Conventions of the International Labour Organization concerning the fundamental rights of workers. We remain convinced that these instruments have a definite impact on economic and social development and undoubtedly contribute to the reinforcement of the democratic process under way in our country. For this reason in its national legislation Burkina Faso has given full effect to all these Conventions, particularly in its Labour Code.

As to the latter aspect my country fully endorses the idea whereby the International Labour Organization should ensure a better targeting of its standards in the future, ensuring that they better reflect real needs in order to exercise a real impact. This approach should make it possible to take better account of the particularities and real needs of developing countries.

Requiring of all countries, without distinction, the observance of fundamental labour rights is no doubt a necessary precondition in order to enable all workers to benefit from globalization, and the ratification by Burkina Faso of essential Conventions on this subject bears witness to the adherence of Burkina Faso to these fundamental values.

Nevertheless, please allow me to express several concerns in this connection. Indeed, it is to be feared that introducing a social conditionality into economic and trade relations may penalize developing countries, more especially African countries, if not accompanied by appropriate measures in order to assist developing countries to develop strong, competitive economies. How can our countries ensure the optimum application of labour standards, if at the same time they are required to lower the level of social protection in order to be attractive to foreign capital? The rules and logic which prevail in the current economic order do not favour social progress in developing countries. The growing marginalization of Africa, the burden of indebtedness, unemployment and poverty are the principal factors which make it difficult for standards in favour of social progress to be respected. It is thus both urgent and necessary to act upon these causes so as to help our countries along this path.

In this connection the International Labour Organization should continue with and intensify its action in order to help member countries to develop. For this reason Burkina Faso welcomes the specific measures described in the Report submitted to us. Their adoption and implementation will no doubt contribute to strengthening the action of our Organization, the need for which and the irreplaceable role of which seem even more striking today. May the discussions under way at this session provide a fresh impetus to the International Labour Organization so that in the years to come it can make an ever greater contribution to the cause of social justice, progress and peace.

Original Chinese: Mr. LI (Workers' delegate, China) — First of all please allow me to express my sincere congratulations to the President on her election to the presidency of this session of the Conference. My congratulations also go to the two Vice-Presidents. I believe that under their guidance our session will surely achieve complete success.

Standard setting and implementation are an important means for the ILO to realize its aims and objectives of achieving lasting peace based on social justice and protect the basic rights and interests of workers worldwide. We hope that the debate of the current Conference on the theme of The ILO, standard setting and globalization will play a positive role in promoting even wider ratification and more effective implementation of international labour standards.

At present, amidst the growing trend towards economic globalization and regionalization, as well as international trade liberalization, the inequitable international economic order has aggravated South-North contradictions. Unemployment and poverty have become the most outstanding issues in today's world, with hundreds of millions of working people struggling for their basic existence. In many countries trade unions are faced with severe challenges of being further weakened in their rights. In view of all this, labouring people the world over have always cherished the hope that ILO will be able to protect their vital interests in real earnest in setting and effectively monitoring the implementation of international labour standards. Despite the fact that the ILO has helped somewhat in maintaining social justice and promoting social progress through its standard-setting activities over the years, in terms of real impact it has neither succeeded in mitigating the severity of the problems of unemployment and poverty, nor has it played its due role in protecting the legitimate rights and interests of the labouring people. Therefore I would like to make the following comments.

First, in the course of setting and implementing international labour standards, the ILO should take due consideration of the will and wishes of workers in countries at different stages of economic and social development, especially those of workers in the developing countries. The criterion of the international labour standards is to see whether they are conducive to protecting the vital interests of workers in various countries. The Director-General has proposed in his Report such measures as "social labelling" and a solemn "declaration" to strengthen the ILO supervisory mechanism. We cannot but feel deeply worried whether these will help to find solutions for the pressing problems faced by workers of the world and workers in the developing countries in particular. We call on the ILO to acknowledge the vast differences in the economic and social development levels in various countries. We hope the ILO will strictly follow the provisions of the Constitution and take effective measures to promote greater tripartite dialogue and cooperation based on equality.

These are the ways through which the ILO can effectively promote the ratification and practical implementation of international labour standards, thus giving full play to the role of those standards in safeguarding the rights and interests of the workers.

Secondly, the ILO has been the competent body to set and supervise the implementation of international labour standards, but it has long been faced with dissatisfaction with the ratification and implementation of these standards. This is a fact which calls on us to question ourselves in the discussion about how to strengthen the ILO's supervisory mechanisms. We believe that, in standard-setting activities, the ILO should ensure the full involvement of its constituents, and more importantly, the effective participation of the developing Members, so that the Conventions adopted can meet the diversity of the present world. This is also the prerequisite for the ratification of international labour standards. We stand for the strengthening and improvement of the ILO supervisory mechanisms, but we are opposed to any abuse of them. The principle of impartiality should be deeply rooted in the supervisory activities so as to prevent the use of the international labour standards by protectionism as a pretext to undermine the vital interests of the workers in various countries, especially in the developing countries. To this end, all the ILO decision-making bodies should be universally represented. Only by so doing will it be possible to realize the renewal of the ILO's standard-setting activities as expected by the Director-General, and only by so doing will it be possible for the ILO to accomplish the historical mission entrusted to it by the Copenhagen Social Summit.

Chinese trade unions have always actively participated in government activities in ratifying and implementing international labour standards, by conducting a large amount of investigation, research and publicity work. We have edited and published all the ILO Conventions and Recommendations as part of our consistent efforts for the ratification and implementation of labour standards. With the active efforts of the Chinese trade unions, the Government of China has drawn on the useful experience of international legislation in its drafting and formulation of labour law and more than 260 regulations and rules which have a direct bearing on the vital interests of workers, thus providing a reliable legal framework to safeguard the legitimate rights and interests of the workers under the conditions of a socialist market economy.

The Chinese trade unions will, as always, stand ready to strengthen cooperation with the ILO and other trade unions in other countries so as to make joint efforts for the further promotion of the ILO standard-setting and supervisory activities, and to ensure that the ILO is in a better position to face the challenges of the next century.

Original French: Mr. THYS (representative of the World Confederation of Labour) — The World Confederation of Labour believes that globalization is not in itself necessarily a bad thing. While it is, of course, a new phenomenon for humanity, it can also be seen as an opportunity, beckoning us to live better and more closely together.

However, it may also encompass very different realities, and those which we are experiencing today will certainly not lead to a greater degree of well-being for tomorrow. But that is what too many speeches have attempted to make us believe. The World Confederation of Labour feels that too many people involved in the decision-making process in all fields submit to an ideology which, under the cover of economic laws, is imposed by the power of money and the profit motive. We in the WCL are not, of course, calling into question free trade, individual creativity and economic growth. But we do challenge the disruption to society which comes with linking the concept of capitalist, mercantile and financial organization to it. The sum of the profits made by the few, be they enterprises, companies or individuals, will never improve conditions for all. On the contrary, we see today increasing poverty in the populations in the developing countries, as well as high levels of unemployment and very clear social regression in the industrialized countries.

Things must change, and urgently. From this point of view the Report of the Director-General is not without interest. Indeed, while it does not differ explicitly with the ideology I have just denounced, it implicitly calls it into question, for example, when it argues in some of its proposals for a strengthening of the impact of standards and the promotion of social policies.

Indeed, the member States must act in a manner which is consistent with the statements and commitments they have made in relation to social justice and full employment at major international meetings such as the Copenhagen Summit. Their willingness to ensure respect for the standards of the International Labour Organization is the real test. But what is the situation in fact?

The WCL agrees with Mr. Hansenne's idea of a solemn declaration, which should be considered part of the Constitution and should bring member States, by virtue of their very membership in this Organization, to respect and ensure respect for fundamental rights. Without, of course, calling into question the existing procedures, an additional system to handle complaints should be introduced as soon as possible for the fundamental rights.

The WCL, of course, understands clearly that this in no way diminishes the importance of the need to promote all the standards of the ILO, and specifically those relating to occupational health and safety or social security.

The WCL does not support the idea mentioned in the Report of "taking a break" from standard setting, nor that which calls for particular encouragement and promotion of Recommendations at the expense of the Conventions. On the other hand, it is not opposed to the introduction of a new procedure for the selection of standards with a view to ensuring that they are operational and implemented as best possible.

Finally, the WCL supports the idea of a social label. But our organization would like to draw attention to the fact that such a label or labels should take into consideration production conditions for both the domestic market and the export market, and should not be restricted solely to certifying respect for the fundamental rights.

Those countries which respect and promote these rights must be encouraged but so should those which have made real efforts to distribute fairly the costs and benefits of development, as well as those which support the efforts of democratic social organizations.

The WCL's support for the social label does not close the door, however, on the so-called "social clause". On the contrary, the WCL feels that they are complementary to each other, as both tend to promote the development of fair and effective international legislation, as long as they are designed and supervised in a multilateral way, and thus leave no room for protectionism.

I would like to conclude by making an appeal to the Governing Body, the Director-General and all those who have responsibilities in the ILO. I would ask them to take all initiatives within their power and in their fields of competence to convince international bodies, be they commercial, economic or financial, and politicians and decision-makers at all levels, as well as all those who have an influence on the decision-making process, to encourage them to ensure universal implementation of all the international labour standards. I would also call on them to continue the work for the promotion of the fundamental standards, including those relating to child labour, which is going to be, of course, the theme of the next session of the Conference.

Original Portuguese: Ms. FERNANDES RODRIGUES (Minister of Vocational Training and Employment, Portugal) — Madam President, first of all I would like to congratulate you on your election and express the wish that this session of the International Labour Conference will contribute to economic and social development through the creation of employment and the improvement of standards of living and work, so as to attenuate some of the most pressing current social problems.

Governments, the social partners and the ILO regional offices in the framework of their respective domains, work towards the creation of productive and free employment so as to improve in a balanced fashion the living and working conditions of peoples. The Report of the Director-General proposes an in-depth reflection on the need to and the means of guaranteeing the fundamental rights of workers in all the member States. These fundamental rights relating to freedom of association and the right to collective bargaining, non-discrimination, the prohibition of forced labour and the exploitation of child labour, spring from and find their foundations in the freedom and equality of all people, which are an integral part of the universal values which any constitutional State of law must recognize and guarantee.

The definition of the fundamental rights applicable to all the member States of the ILO thus finds its justification independently of the social repercussions of the liberalization of international trade. The debate on the social dimension of the liberalization of international trade has made it more obvious that we need to define the fundamental rights of workers. The Portuguese Government endorses the definition of the fundamental rights of workers which States must observe and enforce as a result of the simple fact that they are Members of the ILO. The sovereign will of States will continue to be respected and for this reason they will be free to subject themselves to the fundamental rights, but they express the desire to accept them when they become Members of the ILO.

The liberalization of international trade creates conditions for the economic growth of all countries, which must ensure the social development of their populations to the extent that economic growth permits. The reinforcement of social justice will contribute to the integration of national and regional economies, will promote peace throughout the world and will be the most effective guarantee for the failure of the protectionist concepts advocated by some.

The ILO must adhere to the Singapore Declaration approved during the Ministerial Conference of the World Trade Organization, particularly the part which excludes the use of labour standards for protectionist aims and which recognizes that low wages in developing countries are a legitimate comparative advantage in world trade. However, developing countries must not demand that the social rights of workers be levelled down with the aim of safeguarding comparative advantages. On the contrary, these countries must accept the development of freedom of association and collective bargaining and through them the improvement of the social rights which enable workers to benefit from the economic growth created by international trade.

As the Director-General acknowledges in his Report, a definition of the fundamental rights of workers must have an adequate monitoring system. This surveillance could be organized on the basis of two elements which are already part and parcel of the ILO's usual instruments. First of all, the submission of periodic reports on national and legislation practice in relation to fundamental principles. Secondly, a procedure to assess the representations concerning specific cases, identical to that used in connection with freedom of association. The assessment of these cases would make it possible to create a set of judicial precedents relating to the content of the fundamental principles, very useful for the preparation of legislation and for decisions of national courts on fundamental rights.

It is essential to define and apply sound policies to confront unemployment, the social scourge which neglects precious human resources, involves considerable financial resources for social protection, creates the insecurity for families and has a detrimental effect on social cohesion. State policies and the role of the social partners and international cooperation in stimulating employment creation in small and medium-sized enterprises, are topics for discussion at the Conference, and we would like to stress their importance. This is why we wish to have strengthened cooperation to be able to implement measures, and enable the ILO to play a role on the world stage.

Mr. HERMINIE (Minister for Employment and Social Affairs, Seychelles) — It is a great honour for me to address this 85th Session of the International Labour Conference and add the contribution of the Republic of Seychelles to the high level debate of this august assembly.

The main discussion this year is on the issue of standard setting, one of the oldest and most important functions of our Organization. This fundamental activity aims to contribute to the Organization's overall goal of ensuring that each member State has a multi-skilled, versatile, satisfied and motivated labour force, operating in a safe and healthy working environment with good working conditions, sound industrial relations practices, and meaningful participation in the process of development of their home countries.

Today, the ILO's mandate has been extended, by the World Summit on Social Development of Copenhagen, to cover the social dimension of the liberalization of world trade. This development has turned the limelight on the ILO, not only to ensure human rights and social justice to all workers in all of its constituent countries, but also to mediate and facilitate the implementation of such values in the context of new realities, characterized by radical and profound changes in the world economy. These changes present major challenges to all countries in both the economic and social spheres. This new and complex phenomenon of globalization, illustrated especially in the increased flow of goods, services and resources across national boundaries, is breaking down all traditional barriers and is permeating and meandering through all national economic structures. It is also turning the world into a small and accessible global village, even into a global village market.

As globalization gathers momentum, we must ensure that it takes on a human face. In realizing this, we find guidance in one of the fundamental principles of our Organization in the Declaration of Philadelphia, which states and I quote "lasting peace can be established only if based on social justice. All human beings, irrespective of race, creed or sex, have the right to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity".

If we ignore this principle, we run the risk of creating a world of inequality and injustice, where the rule of the jungle becomes the norm of the day.

Indeed, globalization, if left to the rules of spontaneity, poses itself as a threat and may create serious repercussions in national economies which, in turn, may lead to a catastrophic impact on human rights and social justice in general.

However, I firmly believe that the process of globalization, when viewed from a developmental perspective is not only a challenge but also, and more importantly, an opportunity for all countries to optimize the utilization of their resources for sustained economic growth in the best interest of their peoples.

Against this background, the guiding principles, instruments, standard-setting and evaluation mechanisms have proven, and I am sure will continue, to be invaluable in the promotion of the kind of economic development that respects social justice.

In the wake of new realities, the ILO and its standard setting must become dynamic, proactive and responsive to the demands of this fast developing world. It is for this reason that I would like to extend my support to the Director-General when he calls for a more systematic and selective process for the re-examination of standards, and indeed, for the introduction of any new ones. The constitutional amendment before the Conference to abrogate Conventions it considers obsolete is a step in the right direction.

If we are to reap the maximum benefit from the challenges and opportunities offered by globalization, it is incumbent on governments to ensure good governance and adopt rational economic policies and strategies which place people at the centre of development. In Seychelles, we have, as much as possible, taken advantage of such an opportunity by consolidating the existing economic mainstay and exploring new avenues of development. We are actively promoting small and medium-sized enterprises, which today, are recognized as a locomotive for job creation, and Seychelles is being turned into an international business centre. Both measures are an integral part of our new economic strategy.

In our effort to make optimum use of the window of opportunities offered by globalization, our social protection programmes remain at the core of our national development plans and these programmes are being modernized, rendered more effective and responsive to new realities.

Finally, there are unfounded fears that the application of core, fundamental and other vital standards might negatively influence the competitive positioning of countries in the context of globalization and international trade. In fact, it is being proven that their application will, in the long term, strengthen the economic performance of these countries and allow workers to claim their fair share of economic progress generated as a result of globalization.

It is therefore our duty as members of the ILO to intensify our activities in the field of standard setting, and it is equally important for us to have a vision of development which turns every challenge into an opportunity for economic growth and prosperity for our peoples.

Our Organization has a primordial role to play in enabling member States to forge ahead in the next millennium and successfully undertake the tasks that await us. All our efforts must be geared to achieving these noble objectives. I am convinced that together we can make it.

Original French: Mr. MUTERAGIRANWA (Minister of Labour, Craft Industries and Vocational Training, Burundi) — On behalf of the delegation of the Republic of Burundi to the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference, allow me to associate myself with those speakers who have taken the floor to address my warm congratulations to the President of the Conference, Mrs. Keltošová, Labour Minister of Slovakia, and also to the Officers of the Conference for their brilliant election to head the work of this session.

I also take this opportunity to express to the Director-General of the International Labour Office, Mr. Michel Hansenne, and to all his assistants, how pleased the delegation of Burundi is with the quality and relevance of the background documents submitted for the analysis of delegates, and for the excellent organization of the work of this session.

The Director-General's Report entitled The ILO, standard setting and globalization provides a relevant analysis concluding with the advisability of adapting the International Labour Code to the multi-faceted requirements of our time marked by very deep changes in the field of labour. These changes are basically linked to the globalization of the economy with the strengthening of trade liberalization, structural adjustment programmes, and the democratization of political and institutional systems. It is up to the member States of our Organization to determine the role which the ILO should play so that the populations of the various regions of our planet can derive the greatest benefits from the positive effects of those changes. However, for that purpose, we must also endow our Organization with mechanisms which enable it to play its role to the hilt.

The 85th Session of the International Labour Conference is taking place at a time when my country, Burundi, is still confronted with the effects of a socio-political crisis which has lasted for more than four years. The consequences of this crisis are highly significant both at the human and material levels. More than 150,000 lives, including those of many active or potential workers, have already been lost by the fratricidal war which has affected Burundi since October 1993.

Deterioration in the country's productive mechanism following the destruction of economic infrastructure has had a considerable negative impact on the living conditions of the population, at large, and of workers, in particular.

Since October 1993 Burundi has been caught in a downward spiral of political and ethnic violence which, over time, may very well cause its total disintegration. Given this disastrous prospect, the political change which took place at the State Summit on 25 July 1996 set as its ultimate objective the saving of the Burundi nation from its state of political, social and security despair.

Unfortunately, the reasons for that change were not immediately understood in all quarters. Some persons even regarded it as a blow to democracy. In view of this misunderstanding, the countries of the Great Lakes subregion decided to impose an embargo on Burundi following the Second Arusha Regional Summit on Burundi in Tanzania on 31 July 1996.

Hence, the misinterpretation of the facts led to a very important decision, the consequences of which deepened the tragedy with which the Burundi people had been faced for more than three years.

Indeed, the period of embargo which lasted between July 1996 and April 1997 was marked by a period of deprivation and suffering for the Burundi people, affecting in particular the most vulnerable sectors of the population already severely tested by three years of warfare.

That embargo severely hit the social actors in the field of labour including employers and workers. As a corollary, there was a significant reduction in the operation of enterprises — to the point of closure in some cases — and loss of employment, depriving workers of the means of subsistence for themselves and their families.

The efforts made by the Government of Burundi for a return to peace and security for all the people of Burundi, particularly through the initiation of a dialogue with the principle faction in the army, the National Council for the Defence of Democracy under the auspices of the Community of Saint'Egidio in Rome, gradually showed the international community, in general, and the countries of the Great Lakes subregion, in particular, that the Government was acting in good faith following the political change over which took place on 25 July 1996.

We welcome the decision of the heads of State of the subregion of the Great Lakes at the Arusha Summit held on 16 April 1997 which made the wise and realistic decision to reduce the embargo in order to ease the suffering of the Burundi people.

We reaffirm the commitment of the Government of Burundi to continue to work for true and lasting peace for all the people of Burundi. From this podium we launch an appeal to the international community, in general, and to the neighbouring countries of Burundi, in particular, for their full support in the implementation of the programme for lasting peace to which all Burundi aspires.

We should like to bring to the attention of the distinguished delegates at the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference that one of the long-awaited forms of support is the complete lifting of the embargo.

The promotion of employment and international labour standards is an ongoing concern of our Organization. This requires the prior establishment of political stability and security for all citizens in our States. In other words, employment security and the application of international labour standards depend first and foremost on security per se. We therefore appeal to the entire international community to foster, in all regions, an environment guaranteeing the respect for the fundamental rights of the human person and, above all, the right to life.

In conclusion, we express our best wishes for the successful completion of the work of the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference in the legitimate interest of all the actors in the member States of our Organization.

Ms. JAAKONSAARI (Minister of Labour, Finland) — Madam President, I congratulate you warmly and welcome you to the Chair. This is a very important and challenging Conference and I hope it gives useful results. New policies, old social responsibility and joint commitments are emerging.

The international community has focused attention on the capacity of the ILO to live up to great expectations. This the ILO must rapidly respond to. The fact that the continuing increase in unemployment and the widening gap between the "haves" and the "have-nots" coincide with the globalization of the world economy and the worldwide trend towards technology-based production challenges us to face the current threats, to maximize the positive effects of globalization, to seize opportunities offered.

The positive implications of the liberalization of world trade and of the rapid development of information technology need to be identified and maximized, and we have to channel development so that the goals of full employment and eradication of poverty become a reality.

The key to sustainable development — as I see it — is the recognition that the core of the work, its employment-creating nucleus, is the capacity of creative thinking — the human resources element. This cannot flourish in conditions where the dignity of human beings is not respected. Fundamental workers' rights have to be respected universally and we must see to it that, where development brings economic welfare, a fair distribution of this welfare ensues.

I welcome the proposal to incorporate the principles of fundamental labour rights in a declaration or charter to be adopted by the International Labour Conference in the near future. There is an urgent need to renew the commitment of governments, social partners and enterprises to work together to promote productivity, competitive ability and employment, and to fight against poverty and social exclusion. In this way we could proceed to realize the commitments entered into at the Copenhagen Summit. Thus we would further social progress and social justice, the true aims of this Organization.

However, present developments reveal that recognition of the path to social justice is not enough. The ILO faces the challenge of proving that this journey is socially indispensable and economically profitable. A more focused follow-up is needed. As proposed by the Director-General, this could in a concrete way show how the observance of fundamental labour rights is universally progressing.

The evaluation of the impact and shortcomings of standards and the widening of the scope of the General Surveys are proposals that need to be examined urgently. I feel it is necessary to increase the coherence of measures and the relevance of new standard setting.

The question of social labelling is interesting but also very complex; I agree with the Director-General that there is no doubt that it deserves to be looked at in depth and with care.

The Report pays considerable attention to more targeted standards for greater impact; rightly so, because some Conventions adopted in the recent past may, by their greatly detailed texts, have impeded ratifications. The procedures of preparation and the choice of new standards need to be reformed, and I trust that the Governing Body will proceed in the work it has already embarked upon. The evaluation of standard setting will certainly be an extremely helpful tool.

In this connection, I wish to underline the importance of ILO advice and technical cooperation activities in identifying and removing obstacles to ratification and implementation.

Ms. TOLLE (Government delegate, Kenya) — Madam President, allow me on behalf of the Kenyan delegation to join those who have spoken before me in congratulating you on your unanimous election as President of the 85th Session of the ILO annual Conference.

My delegation is confident that, given your vast experience, you will steer our deliberations to a fruitful conclusion.

The Honourable Philip Masinde, Kenya's Minister for Labour and Manpower Development, is unable to be here today due to unforseen circumstances. He has therefore asked me to read the following statement.

The Government of Kenya notes that the main theme for this year's session of the Conference is on the topic entitled The ILO, standard setting and globalization. Indeed, as the Director-General clearly points out in his Report, the main task of the ILO since its inception in 1919 has been to improve the conditions of life and work through its standard-setting function. The Organization's founders felt that standards laid down through the joint efforts of governments, employers and workers would be realistic, solid and universally applicable.

We note with appreciation that over the years the ILO has built up a core of international labour standards in the form of Conventions and Recommendations relating to a whole range of issues affecting the world of work including workers' fundamental rights. Again, as the Director-General points out in his Report, it is important for the entire ILO constituency to undertake a review of the Organization's standard-setting function, with the aim of revitalizing and adapting its means of action to the changing world environment. Likewise from a standard-setting point of view, it will be necessary to pay due attention both to the need for revising and updating the existing body of standards, and also to the need to focus attention on the particular significance of workers' fundamental rights in the context of trade liberalization and the globalization of the world economy.

Generally speaking, Kenya agrees with the Director-General's proposal on the need for revising and updating the current body of standards with a view to making such standards more easily ratifiable and adaptable to the present-day needs. In this respect the Kenyan Government notes the Director-General's acknowledgement that, so far, very few ratifications of ILO standards have been registered by the various countries. This is a clear indication that most of the existing standards have not been widely ratified by as many countries as expected for a variety of very good reasons.

First of all, the Organization has produced very detailed standards which many countries, especially developing countries, have not been able to ratify since they cannot implement them. It is in this respect that Kenya would like to support the ongoing debate in the Governing Body for an urgent and thorough review and rationalization of the existing standards. Kenya also supports the view that there is a need for strengthening the relevance and efficiency of the current standard-setting machinery, by making a more judicious choice of subjects and exploiting better the variety and flexibility of the means of action provided for under the ILO Constitution.

Kenya would also like to suggest that the ILO should make every effort to discard obsolete standards, and to update existing ones with the aim of making them more flexible, adaptable and relevant to present-day needs. Kenya believes that the whole process of ratification and application of ILO standards could be greatly improved if its standards were limited to general principles on which there was broad consensus without going into details or creating unnecessary inflexibilities. Such targeted standards would ensure a greater impact upon implementation.

Let me now turn to the Director-General's views concerning some aspects of the social dimensions of the liberalization of international trade. In this respect, Kenya concurs with the Director-General's views that all workers should be able to have a fair share of the fruits of globalization and that, to be able to attain such an objective, a system of tripartite consultations should be undertaken at the national level. Consequently, Kenya endorses the view that ILO member States should be encouraged to voluntarily ratify and implement at the right time the seven core Conventions as identified both by the recent World Summit for Social Development and the Singapore Ministerial Conference of the World Trade Organization. In particular, priority areas should cover those standards in the fields of freedom of association, the right to organize and to bargain collectively, abolition of forced labour, equal treatment and non-discrimination.

In the seven decades of its existence the ILO has done a very commendable job in the promotion of social justice throughout the world. The cardinal principles which have always characterized such excellent work by the ILO over these years are its basic philosophy of voluntarism, tripartism and free choice of its social partners. At no time was there any threat to use coercive measures in order to enforce ILO labour standards including those covering workers' fundamental rights. Both the membership and ratification of ILO standards have always remained a matter of free choice by the country concerned.

It is against this background that the Kenyan Government reaffirms its total rejection of the current attempts by the ILO to establish a non-existing linkage between trade and labour. In my delegation's view, such a linkage clearly goes against the principles of free trade and would only serve as a protectionist tool at this point in time. My delegation recalls vividly that during the Uruguay Round trade talks, several attempts were made by some developed countries to introduce the so-called social clause and the same were overwhelmingly rejected. The same scenario was again repeated at the Singapore Ministerial Conference in December 1996.

We should not lose sight of the fact that the ILO membership has always remained purely voluntary and that respect for its labour standards have always depended on moral persuasion and not on the imposition of trade sanctions, since the ILO is not about sanctions. These principles must be respected during the ongoing debate to amend the ILO Constitution through the adoption of a Declaration with the aim of making it mandatory for all countries to ensure the universal guarantee of fundamental rights as a prerequisite for workers to be able to share the benefits of globalization. In our view the Director-General's proposal for the introduction of a global system of social labelling to guarantee that internationally traded goods produced under humane conditions is tantamount to introducing protectionism through the back door.

I wish to reiterate the Kenyan Government's commitment to the promotion of ILO standards as a sure way of enhancing promotion and respect of workers' basic rights in our country. In this respect since our accession to ILO membership in 1964, Kenya has ratified and fully implemented a total of 46 international labour standards which include, inter alia, several workers' fundamental rights Conventions such as the right to organize and bargain collectively and the abolition of forced labour. Kenya has so far ratified four out of the seven core labour standards on workers' fundamental rights as identified during the recent World Summit for Social Development.

In conclusion it is the view of my Government that there is urgent need for this noble Organization to develop a public relations and communications strategy which will increase the visibility and credibility of the Organization and public awareness of its work. This should give member States renewed hope and strength to face the next millennium.

Original French: Ms. SASSO MAZZUFFERI (Employers' delegate, Italy) — We can only acknowledge that the Copenhagen Social Summit and the Singapore Conference have strengthened the role and the importance of our Organization at the international level. As the Report of the Director-General notes, it is now up to us to make the qualitative leap to achieve greater universality in the promotion of social progress accompanying globalization, and to improve the selection of topics in the production of new standards.

I agree with these ideas. But they cannot be carried out without a constant effort on the part of all the tripartite constituents of the ILO. Let us leave aside the false debate on the standardization of social protection, forget the fears of social dumping and ignore the temptations of protectionist seclusion.

The ratification campaign which is under way has already met with some success. But we must maintain the momentum of our commitment, as there is still much to be done.

We quite simply must accept the rules of the game when it comes to the social aspects of globalization, with the conviction that they are useful to governments and to the social partners, as they can avert conflicts which can also represent dangerous economic development and production.

All the measures proposed by the Director-General to adapt the field of action of our Organization to the new challenges of globalization are valid, and should be studied. The Governing Body should examine them next November and the next session of the Conference should be presented with specific proposals.

I agree that the means of action that the ILO already has at its disposal must be used more wisely, and that it is not necessary to create new ones through reforms which would produce mechanisms involving lengthy and complicated procedures.

The Employers' group has requested a renewal of the standard-setting policies. It was proposed that those Conventions which are obsolete or have a particularly low number of ratifications, often owing to the rigid, murky or complex nature of their texts, should be subject to a systematic revision programme. I reiterate that this is an urgent need.

The acknowledgement of the specific and unique role of the ILO in the social field means that the Organization must strengthen its ability to ensure observance of the principles underpinning the seven Conventions on the fundamental rights of workers.

That is the reason behind the proposal for a solemn declaration embodying these principles. It could solve the problem of a lack of ratification of these essential instruments, and above all, strengthen the ILO's effectiveness in a field unique to our Organization, i.e., the safeguarding and universal application of these essential rights.

A new standard-setting policy, if it is to succeed, should take into account the new needs arising in many of our countries, which require more flexibility in legislative frameworks and also in industrial relations and social policy.

The Director-General's Report stresses that the international labour Conventions are one of the means that the ILO can use to attain its objectives, and reaffirms the value of Recommendations as independent instruments. The Employers have for a long time endorsed these ideas.

Many of the other proposals contained in the Report deserve a more in-depth study with the aim of mustering as much support as possible for their implementation. I may cite a few examples, such as the production of new, more selective standards by means of an increase in the number of subjects available for selection; the study at the regional level of the ratification prospects for a possible Convention; and an impact assessment of instruments, in legal as well as economic and social terms.

It is true, as stated in the conclusions of the Report, that globalization opens up a whole new field of possibilities for standard-setting activities. Our Organization must take advantage of this opportunity, for the benefit of its tripartite constituents, who bear responsibility for promoting the consensus required to take important decisions, while at the same time understanding the need to be coherent and to avoid adopting contradictory positions at the various organizations.

The Italian employers are prepared to make these commitments. We are convinced that we should not conjure up new means of action, but rather, as the Director-General states on page 70 of his Report, that it is "a matter of finding the necessary will to exploit those with which the Organization is already particularly well endowed".

I should now like to say a few words on the employment problem, which is at the heart of the Employers' group's concerns, and even more so at the heart of the Italian employers' preoccupations. Many initiatives have been taken in recent years, in particular to promote the employment of young people. To name a few examples, cooperation has been strengthened with schools at all levels; we have stepped up programmes for in-house apprenticeships, held university-industry fora and career days to bring young people and the world of production together; there have been traineeship grants "temporary mobility" grants to help young people move from regions without jobs to those where employment is available; "honour loans" have been granted, and we have provided incentives to create small enterprises. All this must be accompanied by activities in the field of schooling, which must be more appropriate to the technological requirements of the next century, and vocational training.

It is now clear that there is no ready-made solution or example which can be transposed from one country to another, for each context has its own rigid requirements which cannot be met by decree or by goodwill alone.

The Italian employers have thus asked for real flexibility in labour relations as one means of creating employment. We must develop the use of all forms of employment, leaving behind the stereotypes and constraints of the past. Temporary work, fixed-term work and part-time work are just a few examples. This is the way to fight unemployment — which is after all the main concern of young people, who are now ever more numerous as they join in the search for a job.

It is also in the interest of young people, and to meet their pressing need to contribute to their countries' development, that our Organization must now find a new standard-setting approach — one which is more focused on the real needs of its constituents and which is conducive to the development of new enterprises. For we have seen that it is enterprise which is the best source of new, productive and freely chosen employment.

Original Arabic: Mr. AOUN (Government delegate, Lebanon) — I have the pleasant duty of taking the floor before this august assembly. This Conference is a major forum in the UN family and indeed is one of the greatest world Parliaments with its tripartite composition. This Conference shoulders the responsibility stipulated in the Preamble to the ILO Constitution, in other words, that universal and lasting world peace can be based only on social justice.

In reading the Report of the Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, which raised the question of promoting the standard-setting activities of the ILO at a time of globalization, we reiterate the importance of the growing role of the ILO in the realization of social justice, the continued development of labour legislation and the complementarity of all the social partners through the continuity of essential ILO activities, such as technical cooperation, in the interests of social and economic progress, the transfer and exchange of technical experiences in training programmes, and the upgrading of employment policy and employment creation in a world where frontiers are disappearing in the area of international trade, employment and science. We nevertheless are opposed to the fact that ILO Conventions and Recommendations may become mechanisms for controlling the markets of developing countries and instruments inflicting harm on their economies to the extent that instead of becoming productive societies, they remain mere consumers.

The noble objectives of the ILO are enshrined in its Constitution which defines its role to defend the freedoms and rights of workers particularly in those regions where such freedoms and rights are flagrantly violated, in countries plagued by social, economic and legislative underdevelopment or in those countries burdened by the yoke of military occupation which destroys their labour capacity, such as in Palestine, the Golan Heights and southern Lebanon under Israeli occupation. Lasting world peace, as mentioned in the Preamble to the ILO Constitution, is a sine qua non for the establishment of social justice which must prevail under the shield of national sovereignty for all peoples. Furthermore, the occupation of territories belonging to others replaces social justice by social coercion and harnesses the components of labour in the service of the occupying power, in addition to plundering natural and human resources, systematic destruction of infrastructure, recession and underdevelopment.

Our workers, peasant farmers, fishermen and employers in the south of Lebanon have endured two types of terrorism for the last 19 years: acts of terrorism carried out by the Israeli military and the deliberate destruction of labour infrastructure, agriculture, fisheries, construction, industry and trade. This violates all international resolutions, and in particular Security Council resolution 425 of 19 March 1978, which called for an unconditional withdrawal of the Israeli occupying forces from Lebanon. Unfortunately that did not take place.

The International Labour Organization, which is one of the major organizations within the United Nations system, has been called upon to lay the foundations for social justice, not just in sovereign countries, but even more urgently, in those countries where social justice and fair working conditions are seriously violated, particularly in Palestine, the Golan Heights and southern Lebanon. From the beginning of time, Lebanon has been the cradle of civilization and activity which spread throughout the world, a forum for freedom, culture and thinking, for the promotion of the humanities, law, science, rights and prosperity, and a symbol of resistance in the name of freedom.

We launch an appeal for everything possible to be done to put a halt to these violations perpetrated by the Israelis against the workers, peasant farmers, employers, and indeed all the social partners who are prevented from exercising their right to work and their right to peace and a decent living when factories are bombed daily by the Israelis and fishermen are prevented from going to sea. We fully support the tripartite system of the Organization and wish to see the tripartite consultation mechanisms strengthened on the basis of the complementarity of the various roles of the three social partners. Hence, the Lebanese Government, in cooperation with the ILO, has taken steps to modify its labour legislation, with the help of ILO experts. The Lebanese Government has transferred a certain number of International Labour Conventions to the legislative authorities for their analysis. Unfortunately, the outbreak of war in Lebanon has prevented the adoption of these Conventions to date. The national labour administration is working ceaselessly with the ILO Regional Office in Beruit to strengthen these structures. This is being done in tandem with reconstruction and development efforts, with a view to regaining lost time and to resume overall development and the promotion of employment.

We all dream of the establishment of world peace founded on social justice, equality and freedom.

Lebanon believes that this forum supports our just cause, our right to free our people and territories from Israeli occupation so that together we may contribute to the progress of mankind so that peace, freedom and social justice may reign.

Original German: Ms. VOSKUHL (Government delegate, Germany) — First of all I would like to say how pleased I am that a woman has been elected to the presidency of this session of the Conference, and to wish her every success in this responsible office.

The Report of the Director-General is, in my Government's view, one of the most important documents which the International Labour Organization has produced over the last few years. It shows that the ILO has understood the signals sent out from Copenhagen and Singapore, and that it is prepared to strike out in a new direction in order to justify the importance that everyone attaches to it.

The basic question is, how can we ensure that the globalization of the economy and trade liberalization do not lead to restrictions on workers' fundamental rights?

The ministers of trade in Singapore, with remarkable unanimity, noted that the ILO is the international organization best equipped to formulate workers' fundamental rights that are universally binding and to ensure their observance.

The Workers' representative of France in the Governing Body, Mr. Marc Blondel, put it perfectly in March this year when he said that if the governments whose representatives identified themselves with the ILO and its standards in Singapore, were to display as much energy in ensuring respect of these standards, then there would be no need for us — in the ILO, in the World Trade Organization or elsewhere — to reflect on the relationship between trade and social standards.

The task entrusted to the ILO in Singapore is as follows: the ILO should present as comprehensive a picture as possible of the observance of workers' fundamental rights worldwide, and wherever the picture has dark corners, should ensure that these disappear.

The Report of the Director-General is rich in suggestions and food for thought on how to fulfil this mission. Some of these ideas have already been discussed, while others are new. A detailed evaluation would not be possible here because of time constraints, and therefore I would just like to briefly sum up my immediate reactions.

First of all, a solemn declaration at the 1998 session of the Conference seems to us an appropriate starting point for an initiative aimed at better ensuring universal recognition and observance of core labour and social standards and improved supervision of the observance of such standards.

Secondly, we support the idea that in cases where the present supervisory machinery does not enable the observance of these core standards to be clearly evaluated, appropriate measures should be taken to remedy this situation.

Thirdly, we firmly support all efforts to improve the quality and relevance — and hence acceptance — of the ILO's standard-setting activity. In this context, the idea that Recommendations should be given a new vitality merits careful consideration.

Fourthly, the suggestion that a report on social progress in the world should regularly be submitted and discussed at the Conference is new. We should discuss this with an open mind and without coming to any hasty conclusions.

Fifthly, we welcome the fact that the ILO has dealt with the initiative to label goods or retail outlets. In Germany we attach a great deal of importance to such initiatives emanating from manufacturers, retailers and consumers. The Report mentions a number of weak points in existing efforts. Whether it is feasible instead to assign an overall social label to States on the basis of a Convention, is something which must be carefully studied, and we would of course participate in such a discussion.

At the WTO Ministerial Conference in Singapore, the Minister of Trade of Malaysia suggested that the teeth of the ILO should be sharpened if it lacked real bite. Many of the suggestions and proposals contained in the Director-General's Report provide an appropriate basis for strengthening the role of the International Labour Organization so that its efforts on behalf of universal observance of workers' fundamental rights are not spent merely on moral appeals.

I hope that this Conference will achieve a broad consensus on the fact that the ideas suggested in the Director-General's Report should be taken up with an open and unprejudiced mind and without delay: the first steps should be taken at the November session of the Governing Body.

Mr. EARSAKUL (Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, Thailand) — Madam President, on behalf of the delegation of the Royal Government of Thailand I would like to congratulate you on your election and wish the Conference all success.

The ILO has earned a well-deserved recognition for its role in standard setting and the promotion of labour standards. Its past success, we feel, rests primarily on the conscientious observance of its prescribed mandate and authority in the discharge of its functions, steering clear of actions whose basis under the ILO constitutional provisions comes under a heavy cloud of doubt and debate. It is from this perspective, as well as that of trade liberalization, that we view the Director-General's Report with some profound concern.

Prominent among our concerns on the Report are not only its approach but also certain proposals which might be open or even prone to misperceptions and fall prey to protectionist tendencies. Thus, contrary to the view published by authoritative sources, the Report appears to suggest a link between trade liberalization and labour standards. We are equally disturbed by the far-reaching proposal for social labelling coupled with an international inspection, with all their uncharted implications. We, furthermore, feel that, as far as the proposal for a declaration on core standards is concerned, extreme care should be taken not to circumvent the relevant ILO Conventions, which require ratification; nor should such a proposal be allowed to fall foul of the well-established rule of international law that States cannot be bound without their specific consent. Given such inherent problems, to name but a few, we submit that the Report be further discussed and considered by the ILO Governing Body taking full account of the concerns voiced here in this forum.

Thailand's democracy, while undergoing a continuing process of reform, has firmly taken roots within our society. We have thus no reservation whatsoever in fully supporting the Director-General's advocacy that ILO member States recognize their responsibilities in respect of fundamental human rights enshrined in the ILO Constitution. At the same time, we must also recognize that maintaining due balance between economic development and social progress is a delicate task. ILO member States have their own realities to face, their priorities to carry out. For us, the delivery of economic benefits to the people is the first priority. Most people have benefited from economic advancement in Thailand as the economy has grown. Social progress has also undoubtedly followed in the path of economic development, but despite all efforts, it cannot be fully realized overnight, lest that delicate balance is jeopardized, endangering the well-being of all. Thailand will continue its efforts to ensure a place and guarantee for the fundamental human rights in our national constitution, now being revised and to adopt and ratify more ILO Conventions.

We reiterate that a promotional approach by the ILO will be more effective in ensuring observance of the ILO's core standards. We refer, in particular, to programmes like those for child labour being implemented by the ILO. Similar programmes for the working poor, the underemployed and the disadvantaged go hand-in-hand. The ILO will need to guard against attempts to use labour standards as a bargaining counter in international trade.

The current agenda covers revision of the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention. In Thailand, such agencies are regulated as they play an active role in overseas employment. Here also lies a key in addressing the problem of migrant workers. While supporting the proposed revision we will request the ILO to organize technical cooperation projects for this area of endeavour.

The two other agenda items of job creation in small enterprises and contract labour are interrelated. Subcontracting by large enterprises to small enterprises using the services of groups of workers on substandard contracts creates social problems. Thailand is fully aware of the inequities suffered by contract workers. However, upgrading the efficiency of small and medium enterprises will need the support of large enterprises. Multinational corporations, in particular, should participate in national efforts to provide technical training to help create self-employment and small enterprises. This is also a role for employers' organizations, since, as rightly stated in the Director-General's Report, social progress is no longer the prerogative of governments.

Finally, as a founding Member of the ILO, we wish to reaffirm our full commitment to the ILO's objectives and would stress the need for meaningful technical cooperation programmes to enable developing countries to attain these objectives.

The PRESIDENT — We shall now resume the discussion on the Reports of the Chairperson of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Original Farsi: Mr. KAMALI (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Islamic Republic of Iran) — Madam President, at the outset I wish to congratulate you on your election to the presidency of this session of the International Labour Conference in which one of the most important issues, namely international standard setting, is being addressed. I will address a collection of important issues on standard setting, an activity which is in line with the general objectives of the Organization, including the setting of universal standards and securing the application of international labour Conventions. We believe that the role of the ILO Director-General in this area is of particular importance.

Economic globalization, the expansion of free trade, particularly in the services, regional integration and other international developments over the past decade have made the active participation of Members inevitable and the ratification of Conventions more pressing. Against this background the constructive role of the ILO in the promotion of working conditions and in securing workers' rights depends on confidence in the commitments of the member States of the Organization.

Inspired by the spirit of international cooperation, I would like to emphasize the following points.

First, the ILO Conventions, consisting of a unified set of labour codes, supplement each other. Therefore, any form of classification of the Conventions will only lead to a reduction in the significance of a large number of them in favour of a few.

Second, the activities of the Organization should focus to a large extent on technical cooperation. Furthermore, consultative services should be utilized to surmount the obstacles to the application of the Conventions through, inter alia, capacity building to promote ratification.

Third, the present supervisory machinery needs to be reviewed. Objectivity, universality and impartiality of supervisory machinery should be ensured to prevent any abuse of the machinery for selective, subjective or political purposes. By taking these steps the relations between the ILO and the member States will be bolstered and there will be incentives for universal accession.

Fourth, expansion of employment opportunities and income generation should remain among the main objectives of the Organization. Furthermore, appropriate policies must be designed with respect to the status of this Organization as a centre of excellence for the enhancement of the working conditions and the safeguarding of the rights of workers worldwide.

Some developed countries, obsessed with the short-term implications of free international trade intend to abuse the social concerns to disguise their protectionist policies. These countries are proposing new issues serving their protectionist policies in order to disrupt free trade in sectors in which they lack comparative advantages. To put it plainly, we do not oppose addressing social labour conditions and the protection of workers' rights. What we are against is the abuse of social concerns for the sake of short-term national interests.

Labour conditions have for many years been on the ILO agenda and undoubtedly will continue to be so. But we believe that the abuse of the mentioned issues to undermine the comparative advantage of the developing countries will be detrimental to the achievement of the goals of the ILO.

Having said that, we should not lose sight of the fact that free trade development and national capacity building in developing countries will provide considerable safeguards for social security as well as better working conditions. By the same token, the political, economic and social conditions, as well as the development status of each country, must be taken into consideration in the course of the application of standards.

In conclusion, I would like to draw the attention of this august assembly to the continued injustices imposed upon the workers and the whole population of Palestine. In the light of the situation the ILO duly needs to address the plight of the Palestinians and assist them towards the realization of their inalienable rights.

Original French: Mr. ZIELINSKI (Minister of Labour and Social Policy, Poland) — May I start by congratulating very warmly the Minister of Labour of Slovakia on her election as Chairperson of this Conference. Slovakia is a very sisterly country towards Poland.

The subjects he submitted in the Director-General's Report form an excellent basis for the discussion of the fundamental problems which arise at present within the ILO's field of competence in these conditions of the liberalization of trade and the globalization of the economy.

The idea of making social policy more universal is just as ancient as the history of this body which is so worthy. We could even say that this idea finds its roots at the very start of Mediterranean culture itself for the conception of common rights for men of various nations come from the ancient ius gentium, of which Gaius, the Roman lawyer, wrote at the time that it was made up of the natural reason between all men.

The standard-setting activity of the ILO has played a major role in changing the regimes of Central and Eastern Europe from the totalitarian system towards democracy. Numerous ILO Conventions ratified by Poland at that time showed the way towards the system which conforms to international standards set up since 1989.

The idea of globalization is today regarded likewise as the guideline of all actions in favour of social progress in our world today. While agreeing with that thesis, I am also convinced that we have to highlight the importance of national rights in the reform process in the social regimes in the member countries. As I see it, this famous sentence by Charles Montesquieu, from The spirit of laws, has lost nothing of its value today. May I quote it? "Every nation governs itself by its own laws, which should be but special cases through which the spirit of humanity reveals itself." Not to see that means admitting the simplification in the achievement of the idea of globalization of the economic systems and the understanding of the universality of social protection in our world today.

In these conditions of competition in the markets, workers' rights can be violated if governments don't guarantee their citizens the respect of common rights of all human beings. We must therefore welcome, with approval and hope, the common declaration of the Ministers adopted at the World Trade Organization in Singapore, which confirms the will to respect the fundamental rights of workers recognized by the international community. I also wish to express my satisfaction that the OECD in its report on Trade, employment and labour standards underlined the crucial importance of several Conventions of the ILO, including these in its "core workers' rights".

The documents mentioned should not stay as a dead letter here among political texts. Thus it is necessary to ensure for ILO standards sufficient effectiveness. That effectiveness of the ILO shows itself undoubtedly in the Conventions which have been ratified by its member countries because their implementation is controlled by the ILO's supervisory machinery. It is with approval therefore that I welcome the proposal to make greater use of Recommendations in the ILO standard-setting activity.

I fully share the idea of reviewing the Conventions and Recommendations already adopted and to proceed with assessing their value today. The fact that most of these standards were not sufficiently supple constituted a weakness in the activity of the ILO up to the present. In the face of ever more rapid development of our civilization and with a view to economic crises which force countries to reduce social services, unfortunately law has to adapt itself to the expectations and possibilities of the social partners whilst still preserving their universal values — human rights.

The standards prepared by the ILO have to be stable and flexible at the same time. This contradiction hides an old dilemma of progress which has never been solved, expressed by Paul Valéry, the poet, in the following aphorism: "what has not been settled is nothing; what is settled is dead". Those words are worth retaining, if you think of the suggestion of Mr. Hansenne, that standards of the ILO should be codified, under a more lasting system.

Last May, the citizens of Poland adopted by referendum the new Constitution of the Polish Republic. In accordance with that basic law, Poland is a legal, democratic country, achieving the principles of social justice. The foundation of its economic regime is constituted by the social market economy based, amongst other things, on dialogue and cooperation among the social partners. Freedom and social rights, as written into the Constitution, must truly reflect the spirit and the letter of international standards.

An important step on the way to adapting our Polish legislation to the standards of the ILO, the Council of Europe and the European Union, will be several new ratifications of ILO Conventions. As I see it, this constitutes a solid basis for follow-up activity aiming to harmonize the Polish legislative system with European Union standards in social policy and the world of work.

It is with great joy and pleasure that I communicate to you today that the President of the Republic of Poland ratified yesterday the European Social Charter. This is a tremendous step in my life.

Original French: Mr. TKAC (Government delegate, Slovakia) — Allow me to congratulate you, Madam President, on your election to the Presidency of the Conference, and to wish you every success in the running of the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference.

The aim of the International Labour Organization is to contribute tirelessly to the cause of social justice, and this through the creation of international labour standards governing the questions of employment, working conditions, collective bargaining, social security, maternity protection, and a number of other issues.

Three years ago, the Government of the Slovak Republic set up its basic programme, considered to be of the utmost importance, in the field of industrial and social relations. It is known as the "Conception for the transformation of the social sphere in Slovakia". It is based on the achievement of economic, social and cultural rights of its citizens, guaranteed by the Constitution of the Slovak Republic, and it is the result of the social consensus amongst the social partners. The conception responds to changes brought about by economic change. In accordance with this conception, the Government of the Slovak Republic is preparing several new laws this year in the field of industrial and social relations, in particular the new Labour Code, the Public Service Law, the Social Insurance Law, and a number of other laws which will have a decisive impact on the attainment of the objectives set out in the programme for the transformation of the social sphere for the years 1997 and 1998.

On the agenda of the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference we have the revision of Convention No. 96 on Fee-Charging Employment Agencies. It is Law No. 387 of the Employment Code, amended by Law No. 70 of this year, which governs the question of placement in the Slovak Republic. The term "placement" means an activity directed towards finding and offering suitable employment to unemployed individuals who are seeking a job, as well as finding and offering suitable wage-earners to the employer. Our law distinguishes between two types of placement. It can either be free of charge or fee charging. Cantonal labour exchanges offer placement services free of charge and without prejudice, whilst respecting the citizen's freedom to choose amongst the jobs offered, as well as respecting the freedom of the employers to choose amongst jobseekers.

Fee-charging placement can be carried out by people or legal entities under conditions laid down by the employment law, provided a licence has been issued by the National Labour Office. The employer or the individual citizen covers the real expenses engendered by the fee-charging service. The amount paid for the placement service shall not exceed the maximum amount set in the scale. Any wage deductions are prohibited, as are deductions of any remuneration due to the wage-earner as a result of work done for a third party having carried out the placement.

The Government representatives of the delegation of Slovakia are in favour of the revision of the ILO Convention on Fee-Charging Employment Agencies because the proposal is close to the legal provisions enforced in the Slovak Republic.

The creation of new jobs on the labour market is the result of an active employment policy. The Slovak Republic is paying close attention to the development of small and medium-sized enterprises. Law No. 100 of the Collection of Laws on State Assistance to Small and Medium-Sized Enterprises was adopted in 1995. The ministry and other central authorities of the state administration of the Republic are adopting measures in favour of the activities of SMEs, in particular in the form of granting funds from the state budget as well as through the establishment of bodies aimed at promoting the activities of such enterprises. The Government delegates of the Slovak Republic are in favour of the draft, which should lead to the adoption of the international labour standard in the form of a Recommendation on general conditions in favour of the creation of employment in small and medium-sized enterprises.

Contract labour is becoming a more and more current problem in industrial relations in a number of countries and regions throughout the world. However, the definition of this type of labour is still not sufficiently clear in order to be adopted at international level. Work done on a contract basis is carried out in accordance with very diverse legal regulations and, in particular, is different from customary employment contracts concluded between the wage-earner and the enterprise.

In the Slovak Republic we have paragraphs 232-239 of the Labour Code which are close to this type of employment relationship. The above provisions provide for contracts for work carried out outside the framework of an employment relationship. We have contracts on the exercise of labour and on the activity of labour.

Regarding the amendment of the Constitution of the ILO and of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the Government group of the Slovak delegation is in favour of strengthening the International Labour Organization's machinery for supervising the fundamental standards of human rights.

Original German: Mr. SAKTOR (Workers' delegate, Slovakia) — Allow me to greet you on behalf of the Confederation of Trade Unions of the Slovak Republic, which groups together 41 trade unions with more than one million members. At the same time I would like to join others in congratulating our Minister, Ms. Olga Keltošová, who will be presiding at this year's session of the Conference. It is a special honour for the whole country for this important office to be borne by a Slovak representative.

The ILO is an excellent and unusual organization, being the only tripartite organization in the world. Through its instruments the ILO endeavours to ensure a balance of forces at the supra-national level. In particular, in connection with the liberalization of international trade, these instruments are an important means of establishing basic principles to give workers the possibility of gaining a fair share of the advantages ensuing from globalization.

As trade unionists and democrats we are firmly convinced that economic progress must go hand in hand with social progress. Our aim is to pursue economic policies accompanied by social security. We are convinced that it is well worth the cost, both at the national and at the international level. Anyone who believes that social dumping and low wages can be used to achieve lasting advantages is mistaken. This can only lead to instability and xenophobia and end in social turmoil. We all share the responsibility and we should shoulder it.

This is why we consider the ILO to be so important and support its efforts to make its instruments more effective and its rules universally applicable. We would be pleased if the Slovak Republic would also adopt the concept of social labelling. Labelling would mean that democracy works in Slovakia, that human rights, including workers' rights, are respected and can be monitored through international inspection.

The Slovak Republic has always advocated tripartism and social partnership. This is true of all Slovak Governments since the change in November 1989. It is true of the Federation of Employers' Unions and of the Confederation of Trade Unions. Substantial progress has been achieved by the Tripartite Forum in the field of social transformation and industrial peace.

Unfortunately, for the first time since 1991, no agreement has been concluded between the three social partners. The last major project which was decided on jointly by the social partners was the reorganization of the labour administration and its replacement by a new tripartite institution under public law — the National Labour Office. I think I can say, in a spirit of full responsibility, that the representatives of employers and workers are prepared to share the responsibility for solving the major problems on the Slovak labour market.

Despite the problems I have mentioned I am pleased to say that from a strictly legislative point of view social dialogue is well regulated. This is why I am optimistic and convinced that these provisions will also be translated into reality. As social partners, we trade unions are prepared to work to this end.

Mr. QUISUMBING (Secretary, Department of Labor and Employment, Philippines) — The Philippine delegation would like to extend our sincere greetings and our warmest congratulations to the President on her election to preside over the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference. We are also grateful to the Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, and his staff for his Report entitled The ILO, standard setting and globalization. We find this Report, including some of the proposals therein, and the conclusions with the courses of action set forth, not only thought-provoking in the light of its origins and consequential reactions, but on the whole also generally pertinent to our need to renew and reconfirm our dedication to the ideals of the ILO, namely social justice and peace. As we enter the third millennium the ILO is once again in the forefront of the struggle to promote the fundamental human rights of workers and universal respect for the dignity of labour amidst the challenges of the deregulation or liberalization of trade and the perils of globalization.

A member State like the Philippines looks to the ILO leadership — the Governing Body, the Office and this Conference — for innovative but effective instruments (proposed Conventions, Recommendations or other standard-setting measures) to advance the cause of labour and enhance the welfare of the workers and their families. While we also recognize the need to discuss even controversial issues such as social labelling in the constructive sense, they should be thrashed out first in the Governing Body. This is necessary before we can look into declarations, measures or mechanisms for enforcement without being hopelessly embroiled in controversies.

In the Philippines we have aligned our Labour Code and other laws, including our national policies, especially the social reform agenda, to meet our commitments, amongst others to the ILO, its Constitution, the Declaration of Philadelphia and the Conventions specifically ratified through our legislature.

Thus far, the administration of President Fidel V. Ramos and the social partners have pushed vigorously for Senate ratification of key ILO Conventions, including those on Safety in Health and Mines (No. 176), the Recruitment and Placement of Seafarers (No. 179) and the Minimum Age for Employment (No. 138). The Philippines has already ratified 26 Conventions, five of which are core Conventions. We are now especially concerned with equality at work, special consideration for working women and the progressive elimination of child labour.

Even as we opened our doors to very substantial foreign investments and saw the migration of Philippine workers overseas, we also pursued measures for stronger protection of labour through domestic laws, bilateral negotiations and international consensus (e.g. UN General Assembly Resolution on Migrant Workers). But above all, we have adhered to the ILO core labour standards, including freedom of association and collective bargaining. We have also provided social security protection as an irreducible condition for social progress. This, we hope, the Director-General will in due time report on favourably.

Nevertheless, we quite realise the difficulties of the ILO, considering our limited resources for safety nets and the numerous perils to employment, trade unionism and workers' welfare caused by industrial restructuring, job flexibilization, company re-engineering, and now trade liberalization and globalization. These hazards must be confronted vigorously and wisely here and now at the ILO.

ILO records show that reports and replies to ILO surveys have declined over the years. To further positive responses, particularly concerning core Conventions, it is now necessary, in our view, to increase technical cooperation in areas where some governments are found wanting and thus direct their efforts towards ratification.

Given the declining rate of ratification, a soul-searching inquiry into ILO standard setting and supervisory machinery is equally in order. The proposal for a wider and topical choice of subjects for standard setting, taking into account the added value that each standard might contribute to existing instruments, may serve as a first step to such soul-searching. A solemn declaration affirming the principles of core labour standards identified in Copenhagen, without infringing on the sovereign rights of Members, could enhance progressive ratification and enforcement.

In closing, industrial peace, economic prosperity and social progress as lodestars of the ILO and its member States do not come cheap and easy. This was true in the past, marked by violent struggle, and will still be true in the very near future as we enter, perhaps slightly bedazzled, the twenty-first century. Our hope is that, without exceeding its mandate, this International Labour Conference will now be able to chart new pathways via well-considered measures to help us in our quest for enforceable labour standards, fully agreed to by all the social partners and acceptable to every member State. We wish you success in this great endeavour.

Mr. JIN (Minister of Labour, Republic of Korea) — I would like to offer my congratulations to Ms. Keltošová on her election. I also wish to express my warm-hearted appreciation to the Director-General and his staff for their arduous efforts in preparing this Conference.

The Report of the Director-General, The ILO, standard setting and globalization, has proposed the new and important directions of the ILO in order to tackle economic and social issues emerging in the era of globalization.

The Republic of Korea shares the perspective that the international community should be more concerned with the social dimension of the liberalization of trade and investment, and that the resulting economic benefits should be fairly distributed among workers throughout the world.

The ILO, however, should make sure that the socio-economic circumstances, traditions, and value systems of each individual country is also considered in working out the Reports on Social Progress of the world. On the issue of social labelling, which is one of the most controversial topics here today, the ILO should ensure that the linkage between trade and labour practices is not used as a protectionist device.

In this era of globalization, human resources are becoming the most valuable asset. I am also sure that human resource development and job creation are, clearly, the ground for the social progress which the ILO is looking for. Therefore, I believe that the role of the ILO should be directed at developing workers' abilities and creativity, and to create more job opportunities. The first step towards this goal might be to establish and strengthen the tripartite cooperative system in each country.

Recently, the Republic of Korea revised its labour laws in an effort to realize those principles. The Presidential Commission on Industrial Relations Reform, established in May 1996, undertook extensive discussions concerned with building new industrial relations for the next century. Korean legislators from both the ruling and opposition parties have reached a consensus to reform the labour laws.

The Republic of Korea's new labour laws, first of all, intend to enhance the workers' freedom of association. They also broaden a range of choices for labour and management, for example, by introducing a flexible work-hour system. A legal framework is provided for joint participation and cooperation between labour and management. And finally, the new labour laws provide labour and management with more effective administrative services.

Under the new labour laws, the Republic of Korea is expected to move one step forward to becoming a socially progressive nation. I do believe that the Republic of Korea's recent labour reforms have realized the principles and spirit of the ILO Constitution and standards.

The Republic of Korea will continue to make its best efforts to further the work of the ILO and to promote the well-being of the world community of nations.

Original Arabic: Mr. EL AMAWY (Minister of Manpower and Immigration, Egypt) — In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate!

I would like to congratulate the President on her election to the presidency of the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference. I wish all success to you and the Vice-Presidents in steering the deliberations of this session.

The ILO, standard setting and globalization is an agenda item designed to seek the most effective means of promoting greater adherence to core labour Conventions and the constitutional principles of the ILO within the mandate of the Organization, based on the existing mechanisms, and without creating new constitutional obligations.

The non-ratification of the core Conventions is not necessarily the result of the lack of political will for their implementation. In the World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen, we agreed on the need to promote full employment, a fundamental priority of our economic and social policies, through the respect for relevant ILO Conventions. The first Ministerial Conference of the World Trade Organization held in Singapore in December 1996 also stressed that the International Labour Organization is the competent body to set and deal with these standards. In the Singapore Declaration the ministers rejected use of labour standards for protectionist purposes, while emphasizing the legality of the comparative advantage of low-wage, intensive-labour developing countries, which must in no way be put into question.

In the present context of the globalization of the economy, the ILO has to maintain its credibility by emphasizing the universal value of the principles contained in the ILO fundamental Conventions. The problem really is how to achieve the best application of these Conventions. Under the terms of the ILO Constitution, it is by ratification only that a member State undertakes to apply a Convention. The basis for any mechanism to supervise the application of international instruments must be the express consent of States, as only ratification creates binding obligations under the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties. For this reason, the proposal made in the Report of the Director-General concerning the adoption of a supervisory mechanism which would be independent of ratification constitutes a serious and unconstitutional precedent, which is unacceptable. The emphasis should be placed on the promotion of the ratification of core Conventions and their application.

Efforts by the ILO to promote core labour standards among its member States should be consistent with its philosophy, as enunciated by the Declaration of Philadelphia, which stated that "the manner of their application must be determined with due regard to the stage of social and economic development reached by each people ...".

The Governing Body had discussed at previous sessions a set of proposals on the expansion of the ILO's supervisory mechanisms, but this was not adopted. The delegation of the Government of Egypt has objections to such proposals, that are not in conformity with the Constitution of the ILO, and therefore with international law. These proposals are aimed at establishing linkage between international labour standards and international trade. It is an issue which is beyond the competence of the Organization, and therefore unacceptable.

It is appropriate to commence with an evaluation of the existing procedures in order to make them better adapted to current conditions. There should be guarantees of objectivity, impartiality and transparency for the initiatives of the International Labour Office.

We reiterate our firm commitment to the principles and objectives set out in the Constitution of the ILO and the Declaration of Philadelphia. We would like to point out that the international community has repeatedly expressed its categoric rejection of any attempt to establish any conditionality or linkage between international trade and international labour standards.

We support the work of the ILO in identifying Conventions that need revising or abrogating. We also support the International Labour Office's efforts to promote the ratification of international labour standards through dialogue with constituents. The delegation of my country welcomes the measures taken recently by the ILO in this regard, especially the Director-General's initiative to address all member States which have not ratified the core Conventions. This initiative has in fact has secured 29 new ratifications since March 1995, bringing the total number of ratifications among the ILO's 174 member States to 815 of a possible 1,218.

The ILO's supervisory machinery has a host of suitable and effective means at its disposal for strengthening adherence to core labour standards, and particularly article 19(5)(e) of the Constitution, which emphasizes the right of each State to ratify or not to ratify the ILO's Conventions, with the obligation to submit a report on its legislation and practice in the areas covered by the Conventions.

We stress the importance of technical cooperation as the most effective and constructive means to promote international labour standards. We call for the development of technical cooperation with member States, to help them to overcome obstacles to ratification or in the application of these international instruments. If the ILO wants to improve its credibility with the outside world, it has to play a role in promoting employment, combating poverty and eliminating marginalization.

The existing ILO supervisory machinery is sufficient. This position is shared by the majority of the government delegations. It would be inappropriate and legally difficult to establish special supervisory machinery for a group of Conventions.

The proposal concerning a declaration to be adopted by the Conference which might help to define the universally acknowledged content of the fundamental rights which should be respected by all Members of the Organization, whether or not they have ratified the corresponding Conventions, and to establish a mechanism to guarantee their promotion has no constitutional basis. We cannot accept imposing obligations on the member States of the ILO other than those emanating from the ratified Conventions.

It might be useful for the Director-General to submit a Report to follow up the social progress in the world and highlight the achievements accomplished, and the efforts made by the ILO in this respect within its mandate.

The social label to be awarded to countries complying with a set of fundamental principles and rights and agreeing to have their practices supervised by an international inspection, provided that all goods produced on its territory be monitored on the spot is nothing but a retroversion of what has already been rejected by the International Labour Conference since 1994. We oppose the introduction of the social clause in the rules of the international trade system, as had been previously opposed by the international community in Singapore. We reject imposing coercive measures to impose and observe the international labour standards, since the linkage of labour standards with trade liberalization implies the use of trade sanctions to impose compliance and adherence to the standards. We also oppose the use of the ILO as a disguised mechanism to impose new protectionist measures under the pretext of promoting the respect of labour standards. The ILO in such a case would become a mechanism of the developed countries, imposing the interests of the multinational enterprises that belong to them, in order to deprive the products of the developing countries (where poverty is prevalent, and which employ intensive labour including children) from having access to the markets of developed countries. This is a protectionist measure for high-cost products.

Turning now to the situation of the workers and employers in the occupied Palestinian territories, this situation is deteriorating under the Israeli occupation of these territories and with the continuing establishment of settlements, the last of which is the settlement of Jabal Abu Ghenaim.

In this respect, we would like to refer to the resolution of the United Nations General Assembly of 15 April 1997, and call upon the ILO to increase the activities being undertaken within the plan of action of the Organization to protect the rights and freedoms of workers and employers in Palestine.

Finally, we stress the necessity of abiding by the Constitution of the Organization. We reject the introduction of any amendments to the Constitution to strengthen the supervisory machinery, and we also call for the non-establishment of linkage between trade liberalization and international labour standards.

Original Spanish: Ms. PIÑEYRUA (Minister of Labour and Social Security, Uruguay) — On behalf of the Government delegation of the Republic of Uruguay and on my own behalf indeed, I would like to congratulate the President on her election to Chair this 85th Session of the International Labour Conference.

I would now like to turn to the central topic of our discussion namely the Director-General's Report, The ILO, standard setting and globalization. Without a doubt, this is a thought-provoking and controversial document that will certainly make waves in the history of the ILO. It summons the political resolve of the member States to undertake very significant changes in their relations with the Organization and these changes are set down in black and white in various proposals.

Firstly, the possibility of the Conference approving a declaration on fundamental principles to be respected by all States, whether or not they have ratified the corresponding international labour Conventions.

Secondly, the adoption by the Conference of a Recommendation on the subject of fundamental rights and the establishment of a follow-up procedure, such as, for example, a periodic report on social progress in the world and subsequent tripartite debate.

Thirdly, there is a proposal for social labelling, that would be given to those countries that act in accordance with certain fundamental principles and rights and agree to be subjected to international inspection.

Finally, there is a proposal for revision of the future of standard-setting activities, with priority given to specificity and effectiveness.

There can be no doubt that economic globalization and liberalization of trade lie behind the concerns and proposals that are flagged in the Report. It is a very delicate topic and any kind of consensus solution will be hard to achieve. It will call for lengthy reflection which may take a good deal of time but that is not a reason to postpone the discussion.

There are two levels of discussion which call for different kinds of consideration. The first is the level of values and policies and the second is the legal and practical side. With regard to the values and policies which the international communities should defend, and which are referred to in the Report, such as the prohibition of child labour, forced labour, the acceptance of freedom of association, collective bargaining and non-discrimination, I might point out that my country, Uruguay, has a long tradition of support and respect for these principles which are part of the core values underlying the ILO. We have ratified international labour Conventions Nos. 29, 87, 98, 100, 105, 111 and 138.

Full compliance with the principles contained in those instruments should be an aspiration shared by all member States. Indeed, it is one way of reaffirming basic human rights.

However, at the legal and operative level certain clear concepts and definitions are still lacking, in particular as regards the practical aspects.

It is quite clear that the temptation to use some of the proposals for protectionist purposes should not be discarded as being merely a negative element. If these are adopted we may run the risk of generating a new source of international problems and discord that may be more serious than the ones that are supposed to be resolved.

We believe that thinking is not sufficiently advanced to establish a clear link between labour standards and trade measures and the way in which the proposed instruments could be used in a balanced manner which protects the rights of all workers, including those which are not directly linked to export activities.

In any case, we should move forward very carefully so as not to transform the ILO, which has a role in preparing and supervising labour standards on a voluntary basis respecting the heterogeneity of the member States, into a system that introduces measures which are coercive in the sphere of trade.

However, we do recognize that there is a problem and it is a source of grave concern. We are ready and open to listen carefully and to continue the discussion of this vast and complex issue which of course is only in its initial stages. If we want to find a consensus solution to such a thorny topic, it is going to be necessary to discard any kind of emergency situation or inflexible deadlines for the adoption of untried measures, and be ready to continue an exchange of views in order to promote international cooperation rather than confrontation.

With these ideas in mind we believe that tripartite discussion of the proposals contained in the Report is vital within each member State and, later, at the regional and subregional levels.

For this first step forward, the Office of course could play a very important role, through technical cooperation, by promoting and supporting national, subregional and regional tripartite seminars. In such seminars, the way in which the supervisory machinery proposed by the ILO is suited to conditions could be studied, the repercussions of the measures on employment, the possibility of practical implementation of the proposal contained in article 19(5)(e) of the ILO Constitution.

Furthermore, we could work on preparing a recommendation on basic rights and once this is approved we could propose a follow-up system taking the shape of the periodic report and tripartite debate.

Let me state that Uruguay fully shares the values that we are striving to protect and it is up to the ILO to promote and monitor such values.

We will not adopt proposals without being absolutely sure that they are perfectly suited to the role to be played by our Organization, and certainly not without due tripartite discussion. We call upon the Director-General to approve the resources necessary for such activities.

Original French: Mr. ATHANASIU (Minister of Labour and Social Protection, Romania) — Madam President, it is a great pleasure for me to extend to you on my own behalf and on behalf of the Romanian delegation our congratulations on your election as President of this session of the International Labour Conference.

In the light of the Report prepared by the Director-General and the agenda of the Conference I shall confine myself to a few general considerations concerning the way in which Romania plays its part as a member State of the International Labour Organization.

At the end of this millennium, now that the liberalization of world trade has become a reality, the International Labour Organization should play an active role in balancing economic expansion and social progress by promoting fundamental social rights, a prerequisite for better working and living conditions for workers and the enhanced well-being of all categories of people. The ILO's activities can be made more effective by reinforcing its standard-setting action, and in this connection I appreciate the proposals set out in the Report of the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Michel Hansenne.

The unofficial codification of international labour standards, the reconsideration of the role given to Recommendations by the ILO Constitution — and I would like to suggest here the model of the council directives of the European Union, adjusted of course to the specific action of the Organization — the strengthening of the supervisory machinery for the application of the Conventions already ratified, including the official recognition of those States observing a set of fundamental rights and principles, the regular submission of reports regarding the Conventions which have not yet been ratified at least the ones considered as fundamental, are possible steps to be made by the Organization and its member States to achieve this considerable objective.

ILO standard-setting action represents an efficient way of strengthening international cooperation in the social sphere, and also of guiding and supporting the action of member States, also as regards the process of implementation of economic and social reforms whose ultimate goal should be a higher standard of living for their own nationals.

According to the Government Programme for the years 1997-2000, the new Romanian Government, appointed after the November 1996 elections, has committed itself to promoting a series of macro-economic policies which aim at reducing or even eliminating the dysfunctions of the national economy as well as speeding up the economic sector structural reform.

In order to reduce the social consequences of the implementation of the economic reform programme, the Government of Romania has adopted a series of social protection measures, namely: an increase in the gross national minimum wage and state child benefits, indexation and wage compensation, pensions, unemployment benefits and other social allowances, as well as the provision of severance payments for the workers laid off as a result of the restructuring or privatization of fully or partially state-funded enterprises.

Romania has ratified to date some 42 international labour Conventions, including the ones considered as fundamental. The Romanian Government has recently submitted to Parliament, with a view to its urgent adoption, the draft law for the ratification of the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) which is fully compatible with the Romanian Constitution and the relevant national legislation.

Romania is committed to ratify as many legal instruments as possible which is why we are now examining several international Conventions such as those on the night work of young persons, paid leave, occupational safety and health, human resources development, labour statistics, labour administration, and minimum standards of social security.

This undertaking is part of Romania's efforts to modernize its national legislative and institutional framework and to bring it into line with the relevant European standards, with a view to supporting the economic and social reforms required for the attainment of a higher standard of living for all the categories of its population.

To sum up, the Romanian Government would once again like to say how firmly committed it is to the standard-setting activities of the ILO, which is testimony to our devotion to the Organization. A sign of this is Mr. Victor Ciorbea at the head of the Romanian Government, a well-known trade union leader and very much liked here at the ILO. He personally supports our standard-setting activities and our efforts to introduce into our own legislation the international standards worked out by the International Labour Organization.

Original Spanish: Mr. MENDEZ DIAZ (Workers' delegate, Guatemala) — On behalf of the workers of Guatemala I would like to congratulate you, Madam President, on having been elected to Chair this great International Labour Conference. We welcome the Report of the Director-General of the International Labour Organization, which of course is not the wave of a magic wand but a series of guidelines and basic steps that all workers in the world must follow to bolster the role and standard-setting activity of the ILO on the eve of the twenty-first century, the era of globalization.

As a kind of contribution by my country, last year a final and definitive peace agreement was signed celebrating the end of the war that has ravaged our country for more than 36 years. The war was sparked by social inequality and the absence of democracy, by the exploitation, hunger, poverty, unemployment and repression that our society was forced to suffer, thus violating our most basic human rights.

The peace agreements lay the foundation for economic development to promote the common good and for participation and consultation, with a view to the full development of the individual, the well-being of families and the socio-economic development of the country, as well as for the strengthening of democratic human rights institutions and the guaranteed right to organize.

Within this framework we workers have demonstrated our political desire to meet this challenge and to cope with the advance of globalization through dialogue and negotiation. We recognize and wish to defend our acquired rights, such as the right of free association, collective bargaining and the right to strike — rights that are enshrined in ILO Conventions Nos. 87 and 98.

We believe that monitoring compliance with ILO standards should be improved and made more effective and more speedy, because unfortunately in my country governors and business circles continue to violate international labour standards such as the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention (No. 87). Furthermore, there is arbitrary and illegal interference by the Ministry of Labour, which is taking away from us the economic and social benefits that have been agreed upon with the employers and with the State in our collective bargaining agreements and abusing its authority, in as much as our Labour Code stipulates that it must register collective agreements.

The Government and the employees with their neo-liberal policies continue to provoke massive layoffs of rural workers and urban workers. In addition to trade union leaders being laid off, some public and private unions have simply disappeared. Eight or ten cases of this have in fact gone to the Committee on Freedom of Association.

On the subject of the Singapore meeting, the ILO should not forget what was agreed. If they are not regulated by labour standards, globalization and free trade will leave millions of workers with their backs to the wall as their acquired rights disappear, particularly workers from poor developing countries such as Guatemala, where the application of neo-liberal thinking discriminates against us a little more every day. It is leading to extreme poverty which sooner or later is going to spark off even greater social problems than the ones we already have. That is why we think that the ILO should reassert its authority and through its standards regulate this economic globalization and free trade; this is both an obligation and a right of the ILO's tripartite machinery.

In closing we would like to endorse the Director-General's Report. It is quite clear, as he says, that the strengthening of the ILO in this time of globalization is not merely the responsibility of the Organization itself. And we would like to appeal to all worker leaders internationally to seek and bring about the unity of the world's working class, so that we can meet the challenges of globalization.

Let me in advance thank all workers throughout the world for their solidarity in assisting Guatemala, as they have in the past, as they do in the present and as they will in the future.

Original Turkish: Mr. MERAL (Workers' delegate, Turkey) To begin my statement, on behalf of all working people of Turkey, I would like to extend to you my best regards.

I congratulate the Director-General on the extremely important report he has submitted to the Conference this year, and would like to state our wholehearted support for his proposals. The workers in my country have endeavoured, during the great struggle that they have waged, to benefit effectively from ILO Conventions. Thus, especially in relation with new developments in technology and in the organizing of production, we are in favour of the adoption of new Conventions and Recommendations concerning new problems that arise in working life. We want a more effective ILO. We also support the campaign launched by the Director-General in May 1995 for the ratification of the core Conventions on fundamental rights. The working people in my country believe that the supervision of the implementation of the basic principles enshrined in the basic texts of the ILO, and in the Conventions, has acquired far more importance today. Therefore we wholeheartedly support initiatives to strengthen the ILO's supervisory machinery. Additionally, we are for the establishment of a mechanism that would enable the ILO to monitor violations of rights under the Conventions on forced labour and discrimination in countries which have not ratified these instruments. On the other hand we also want the establishment of mechanisms that would secure a more effective supervision of the ratified ILO Conventions and their enforcement.

My proposals concerning the ILO are closely related in particular to the problems in my country. The plight of the working people in my country is further deteriorating every single day, and their problems are increasing. The tasks of trade unions in safeguarding the democratic and secular system are becoming still more important. Terrorist activities, actively supported by some of our neighbours and by some other countries, harm the working people and the entire population of the country. Since the European Union did not fulfil its financial obligations to Turkey, the customs union which was created without full membership in the European Union, has led to serious economic and social problems. The concept of the social state of law, enumerated in our Constitution as one of the fundamental characteristics of our republic, is being violated. Inflation, unemployment, poverty, inequality in income distribution, and child labour are increasing rapidly. Subcontracting and clandestine employment are becoming more widespread. Under the guise of privatization, we can see an intention to plunder public property. Our social security system faces great problems due to the faulty practices of the Government. In my country, forestry and agricultural workers are still not covered by the scope of the Labour Act. The provisions of ratified ILO Conventions have not been reflected in national legislation, and are being violated continuously. Convention No. 158 has been ratified, but there is still no job security. Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 have been ratified; however, the 1982 Constitution and the other laws which violate fundamental trade union rights and freedoms in my country are still in force. Workers exercising their right of association are dismissed; workers, public servants and trade unionists taking part in peaceful democratic and legitimate actions, in line with the ratified ILO Conventions, are prosecuted. The right to bargain collectively and the right to strike on behalf of public servants have not yet been acknowledged. The rapid increase in clandestine employment renders even the exercise of the insufficient legislation in force impossible. I would like to state that we regret the transformation of the ILO area office in Turkey into a branch office, totally ignoring the opposition of the representatives of workers and employers, while the basic problems of the working people increase every passing day, and the ratified ILO Conventions are being continuously violated. We expect the ILO to be more active in the defence of the rights of migrant workers and in uniting their families.

In spite of all obstacles, the trade union movement in my country, as the hope and leader of my people, wages a determined struggle to overcome these problems. In addition to that, the great support we have lent to the newly emerging free trade union movements in the Eurasian countries, in all branches of activity and especially in the metalworking branch, is continuing. While recalling that we benefited from the ILO Conventions and the ILO supervisory mechanisms during our struggle, I would especially state our support to initiatives that will further reinforce the role of the ILO in a globalized world.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL-THANI (Minister of Civil Service Affairs and Housing, Qatar) — On behalf of the delegation of Qatar, I should like to congratulate the President on her election to the Chair of this Conference and wish her every success.

The International Labour Organization has done much to promote standard setting in many areas and this is reflected in the legislation of member States. The ratification of international Conventions gives an important indicator of their efficacity — but failure to ratify a Convention does not necessarily imply that its provisions are not respected. Member States do try to ensure that account is taken of standards in their legislation. However, a number of reasons might prevent their ratification: specific conditions prevailing in a member State; specific provisions; follow-up requiring a moral pressure, etc.

As far as our country is concerned, we should like to see many of these standards applied because our Government is based on responsibility, law and justice. We feel bound to try and guarantee optimum working conditions for all our children — and for that we have to provide protection before they enter the labour market which presupposes social security, education and health services. We must strive to attain these in cooperation with the social partners as joint efforts are propitious for production.

We should like to refer to the apprehensions of the developing countries in the face of globalization and the new world order, at a time when poverty, debt and unemployment are on the increase. These countries need standards and initiatives to help them overcome their problems and take up new challenges.

Taking into account the words of the Director-General in his Report on standard setting, we believe that, at this juncture, there should be greater flexibility in the application of standards; we must reduce the pace of adopting new standards which should be more in line with the real needs of societies. Greater assistance should also be provided to developing countries so that they might better affront their problems.

On the subject of international labour standards and human rights, we cannot overlook the suffering of Arab workers in the occupied Arab territories and Palestine inflicted by the occupation of the Israeli authorities, which is harmful to the whole region.

Before concluding, we would like to express our gratitude to the ILO for its support of the Arab countries. We would like to see the programme of technical cooperation to assist Arab countries reinforced and see Arabic used in all the Organization's documents. We are ready to provide our support to any cause that might contribute towards improving the quality of life of all peoples.

Original Spanish: Mr. CASTRO GUERRERO (Government delegate, Colombia) — Madam President, I would like to congratulate you on having been elected to chair this very significant Conference. Colombia, on behalf of the 113 member States of the Non-Aligned Movement and some observer States, including China, presents the following document approved by consensus at the Labour Ministerial Meeting held on 10 June 1997, with reservations from Chile, Jamaica, South Africa and Venezuela. It is a response to the Director-General of the ILO's Report on The ILO, standard setting and globalization.

First we attach great importance to the role of the ILO in standard setting and the promotion of labour standards. We reaffirm our commitment to observe internationally recognized core labour standards.

Second, the ILO must promote labour standards in accordance with its Constitution and as an integral part of social progress of societies.

Third, economic progress is linked to multidimensional aspects of development and is not solely dependent on trade. Economic growth and development must contribute to the improvement of living standards and full observance of labour standards.

Fourth, the Report is a matter of concern as its approach and its arguments are inherently flawed, and it introduces an untenable link between labour standards and trade which we do not accept.

Fifth, the WTO Singapore Ministerial Conference reaffirmed the commitment of governments to the observance of internationally recognized core labour standards and reiterated that the ILO, and not the WTO, was the competent body to set and deal with such standards. The Singapore Conference rejected "the use of labour standards for protectionist purposes" and stipulated that "the comparative advantage of countries, particularly low-wage developing countries, in no way must be put into question".

Sixth, the Ministerial Conference did not give the ILO a new mandate to take a further initiative on trade and labour standards, nor did it have the authority to do so.

Seventh, there is no empirical evidence to support the view that there is a link between trade liberalization and labour standards. The thesis that low wages in developing countries are responsible for loss of jobs and lower wages in the developed countries has been refuted by many authoritative analyses including the ILO's World Employment Report 1996-97 and the IMF's World Economic Outlook 1997.

Eighth, the diversity in the implementation of labour standards basically reflects differences in the levels of economic development. In any case, low labour standards are not the primary source of the comparative advantage of developing countries.

Ninth, seeking to equalize remuneration of workers universally would question the comparative advantage of developing countries. The principle of "equal remuneration for equal work" mentioned in the ILO Constitution, was not meant as a universally applicable standard. It cannot be extended to the global level where the units of comparison are States at different levels of economic development and with varying circumstances.

Tenth, ILO instruments have been voluntarily ratified by States. Any proposal for a declaration on core labour standards should not be legally binding. The most effective means to ensure respect for improved labour standards is the universal ratification of core labour Conventions.

Eleventh, the proposal for an ILO report on social progress flows from flawed premises and linkages. The implication is that the ILO will determine what is the "acceptable" level of comparative advantage and which countries are converting the benefits of liberalization into social progress. The ILO's analytical reports must continue to focus on the overall examination of labour trends, bearing in mind that social progress is inextricably linked to development. Labour standards should be seen as benchmarks in this process.

Twelfth, "social labelling" has been raised from the perspective of consumers in developed countries. Such labelling would legitimize the use of labour standards for protectionism and, by implication, endorse the social clause with the ILO acting as its monitoring body.

Thirteenth, commitments in respect of labour standards constitute obligations freely entered into in the context of ILO Conventions. We cannot, therefore, accept the proposal for "reliable and legally independent" international inspection by the ILO. Any such inspections can only be carried out nationally and are beyond the legal and financial capacities of the ILO.

The way forward — the principal objective of the ILO's work related to labour standards is to secure the dignity and welfare of workers in accordance with the objectives, aims and purposes enshrined in the ILO Constitution and the Philadelphia Declaration. The ILO must pursue labour standards in their own right as an integral part of the social progress of societies, recognizing them as benchmarks in the process of development.

The first step, step one — promote universal ratification of basic and fundamental labour standards. Step two — implementation of basic and fundamental labour standards. Step three — ILO supervisory machinery that has to be objective, impartial and transparent. Step four — international action.

The Director-General's Report requires further consideration by the ILO Governing Body, taking into account the views expressed in this statement.

Original Spanish: Mr. CARO FIGUEROA (Minister of Labour and Social Security, Argentina) — The changes occurring worldwide in employment, the distribution of wealth and forms of work organization have accelerated substantially in the present decade.

The causes of these changes are to be found in the globalization of the economy and the scientific and technological revolution, which — obviously — have both positive and negative effects.

To illustrate this ambivalence, suffice it to point out that, although the number of jobs worldwide increased in the past decade, this was not enough to compensate for the effects of technological progress and to meet the needs of new entrants on the labour market.

In nearly all member States of the ILO unemployment is increasing at an alarming rate, and so far nobody has found a way to reverse the trend, which threatens the peace and social and territorial cohesion of our nations. But although unemployment is the worst problem affecting the world of work today, it is not the only one. The distribution of jobs throughout the world, the quality of jobs and the distribution of the gains derived from increased productivity are problems which are just as important. The growing ease with which production, investment and employment can be relocated has given a central role to labour standards in the competitive strategies of enterprises and nations, which thus have to constantly revise their labour standards to ensure their conformity with the new competitive and technological environment. And that is precisely why some enterprises and certain areas yield to the temptation of defending their positions by impairing the living and working conditions of their citizens, sometimes even disregarding their fundamental social rights.

At the same time, in several countries, unemployment, new forms of work organization and the restriction of trade union freedoms under the guise of certain ideological systems, are also leading to a step backwards in the distribution of incomes. These problems, together with the quality and quantity of jobs, have been of concern to the ILO since its inception. However, the magnitude of the changes occurring throughout the world call for ratification of the ILO's founding values and principles, as well as its instruments and guidelines for action.

Fortunately, after a considerable period of perplexity, the ILO has reacted positively to these new challenges. Thus, the Director-General's Report to the Conference, continuing the line of thought begun in World Employment, was a step in the right direction. Strengthened by tripartism and despite the reticence expressed in other forms, the ILO is making progress towards the concrete implementation of what has come to be called the "social dimension of the liberalization of international trade", centred on the faithful observance of fundamental social rights.

We have been making progress along the same lines in the Americas, as the Declaration of Buenos Aires, signed in 1995 by all the Ministers of Labour of the region shows.

New challenges call for the ILO, as the Director-General rightly says in his Report, both to revise its standard-setting activity and to overhaul its internal organization. We therefore support the adoption of a solemn declaration reaffirming workers' fundamental rights and their observance by all the member States of the ILO, whether or not they have ratified the relevant Conventions. We also support the proposal for a social label. Beyond that initiative, the magnitude of employment and the resulting social fragmentation call for new and greater efforts on a world scale.

Specifically, with a view to boosting employment and promoting a more equitable distribution of productivity gains, the Government of Argentina calls for urgent intervention by the ILO with regard to hours of work and the arrangement of working time. We propose that hours of work be substantially reduced from 2,400 hours per year as provided in the Hours of Work (Industry) Convention, 1919 (No. 1) to 1,500 hours per year as the maximum limit throughout the world with effect from the year 2010. I should like to point out that in the present circumstances a substantial reduction in hours of work can only be adopted on a world scale, since action taken at the national level would be doomed to failure as it would undermine the competitivity of any country adopting it unilaterally. The revision of Convention No. 1 should also provide for a reduction of a maximum legal hours of work throughout the year for each country by 10 per cent in the year 2002 and another 10 per cent in the year 2005. This process of universal reduction of hours of work, coordinated and guaranteed by the ILO, should also provide for broad decentralization of its implementation, so that it should be left to collective labour agreements to make provision for working-time arrangements, hours of rest and the distribution of the costs of reduction.

Finally, Argentina will propose changing the 88th Session of the International Labour Conference to be held in the year 2000 to a summit of Heads of Government and State, who will be responsible for adopting the new Convention on hours of work, which will be incorporated in the list of workers' fundamental rights.

I would like to conclude by paying tribute to Mr. Alfredo Pochat, an official of the Argentine Government, who was recently murdered for fighting corruption.

Original Spanish: Mr. VALDES MESA (Minister of Labour and Social Security, Cuba) — Permit me to offer my sincere congratulations to the President on her well-deserved election.

The Report presented by the Director-General to this session of the Conference was written very carefully and contains numerous proposals on ILO standard-setting activities in a period of globalization. Indeed, it would serve as an excellent basis for a technical meeting in which proposals for radical change in the way this Organization has operated to date could be studied in full detail, with all the attention they deserve.

Of course the ILO has to adapt the way it works to today's world. With every passing day it becomes more necessary for the Organization to renew its effectiveness, but without losing sight of its mission to achieve social justice, and without turning itself into an instrument of neo-liberal globalization which subordinates public concerns to private interests, gives higher priority to transnational interests and advocates dehumanizing theories that marginalize people and undermine the foundations of international understanding.

The present definition of the fundamental rights of workers, as dictated by the present globalization process is restricted to a few Conventions. This tends to limit fundamental rights, and gives short shrift to our Organization's role in defending the acquired rights of workers, some of which are enshrined in other, no less important, Conventions.

Conventions on subjects such as wage protection, social security, employment policy and occupational safety are directly related to the social protection of workers. But nevertheless they are breached or constantly side-stepped as the labour market becomes increasingly flexible and deregulated.

Any declaration or a resolution that does not take account of all of the rights that have been part of the historic demands of the workers as principles to be recognized and respected thus runs the risk of weakening the impact of those international labour standards which do not fall within the limited concept of the fundamental or core Conventions.

The impulse for social progress must begin first and foremost with the basic responsibility of the State for all processes affecting the standard of living of its people. But along with this, there needs to be full participation by all of the social partners and representatives of other sectors of the population in preparing, implementing and monitoring decisions connected with economic and social development.

While we accept interdependence, and are in favour of regional and subregional integration as a means of improving the negotiating position of certain countries vis-à-vis others on a fair and equitable basis, we reject those formulas that involve the unilateral imposition of measures or patterns that show no respect for the sovereign right of peoples to organize the kind of society and government that they want.

Cuba, which for more than 35 years has been wrestling with one of the most colossal difficulties that any country has ever faced, has gained a great deal of experience which shows that it is possible to cope with social problems, even in the face of adversity.

Despite the strengthening of the embargo imposed by the United States and which has been rejected by the international community, the Cuban economy has shown signs of recovery. It has made some significant changes, by offering attractive guarantees for foreign investment, without impinging upon the rights of workers, and without reducing our country's achievements in the fields of education, health and social security.

Some of the initiatives put forward in the Report with a view to making international labour standards more effective can be supported by my delegation.

Greater respect for Recommendations and effective follow-up for these instruments and for the non-ratified Conventions may prove to be a good way forward for the application of their provisions. It may encourage the ratification of such Conventions, thus providing a guarantee for the principle whereby "the obligations of States should not be extended without their consent".

What we cannot support is any punitive link between international trade and labour standards. The introduction of social labelling and on-site inspections would amount to just another form of protectionism.

We share and endorse the basic thrust of the Report, and especially the values that it promotes. My Government will always be in the forefront of any contribution to defending workers' rights.

Original Spanish: Mr. RAMIREZ LEON (Workers' delegate, Venezuela) — Madam President, may I in the name of the Workers' delegation of my country congratulate you on your election to so important a post, together with the other Officers of the Conference of which I have the honour to be a member myself and I am sure that under your leadership we shall achieve the best possible results.

I also wish to congratulate the Director-General for the Report which he has presented to our Conference. It collects together the principal grounds for thought which all those who are linked to the world of work need if we are going to continue daily to defend the interests of the working classes in the quest for social equity.

We applaud the way he approached the subject of globalization. It is done with detail and precision and it is a subject which would seem to run the risk of losing the value of its contents so much has it been discussed. The Director-General's Report recovers its real significance in terms of growth, labour conditions and social progress and establishes the prerequisites for the new operating conditions for international trade which can mean progress for everybody, not only the few getting richer.

It has been shown that if you leave everything to market mechanisms alone it will not generate social justice. On the contrary, if left to run free, they will make inequality grow and employment becomes precarious and poverty multiplies. For workers to enjoy the benefits of international trade, as the Report affirms, an essential precondition is the establishment of universal standards which — without violating any special geographic, economic or cultural particularities which in certain cases might bring competitive advantages in terms of labour and social costs — stop the conditions of work getting degraded and prevent the establishment of perverse forms of exploitation which can be installed as a mechanism for penetration of the market.

Linking the basic rights of workers with international trade seems to us to be a social and moral necessity. But to strengthen the standard-setting character of the ILO cannot be delayed. That is why we welcome the mandate in this direction which the Organization received from the World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen and the World Trade Organization, when both of them recognized the ILO as the natural and necessary instrument for standard setting and overseeing employment and working conditions at the international level.

We agree that it is urgent to issue a new solemn declaration which, like the Declaration of Philadelphia, would be able to reinvigorate the commitment of member States with the fundamentals of the Organization and its standard-setting function.

In Venezuela, in harmony with the basic principles of the ILO, we have taken on indispensable changes in our social and labour legislation, based on social dialogue and tripartism. Agreement between the social partners came before the legislative action. The Congress of the Republic confirmed the agreement reached by the workers, the employers and the government. This agreement will prepare the basis for a new social security system and much fairer and more flexible labour conditions and maintenance of full salary levels.

Today the Congress in Venezuela has confirmed the accord, and it will then pass to the President of the Republic for implementation. We have agreed changes which favour the integration of our country into international trade, maintaining and strengthening the rights of workers and freedom to organize and collective bargaining.

The workers and their trade unions have expressed the wish that the result of this tripartite effort will be the creation of employment, harmonized and sustained economic development and the strengthening of social security as a fundamental achievement. We think that the process we have lived demonstrates that social rights and economic transformations are not antagonistic aspects but, on the contrary, they complement and strengthen each other.

We wish to thank the ILO and especially the Bureau for Workers' Activities for the cooperation we have received in all this process. The tripartite agreement included expressly a request to the ILO to count on its technical cooperation. We trust that this Conference will strengthen the ILO and ratify the transcendency of its standard-setting action for the benefit of workers, employers and of world peace.

Mr. RANA (Employers' delegate, Nepal) — May I also add the congratulations of my Employers' council on the election of the President and my appreciation to the Director-General for the effort put into his Report.

After the advent of liberalization and the popularity of the free market system worldwide, countries like mine have also been forced to be part of this global mind set. It is not important that most of our countries still have not got over the hangover of a "big brother government" wherein all the needs were looked after by the State and due to stringent central planning and strict licensing, consumers did not get what they wanted and enterprises did not have competition. This was of course the era of protectionism and import substitution. Since the State then was guaranteeing the existence and profitability of such enterprises, it was only normal that the labour force working in them felt that their jobs and facilities were guaranteed regardless of their productivity or efficiency.

Now things have changed. The walls of protectionism have been shattered and enterprises and their workforces have suddenly woken up feeling most vulnerable. Our labour force is realizing that now their jobs are not as secure as before. How can an enterprise speak of guaranteeing job security to labour when it itself is not guaranteed its own existence? Furthermore, our international markets have starting mixing social clauses with trade thus aggravating an already tenuous situation.

Madam President I represent an employers' organization from one of the least developed countries. Here globalization and standardization are not perceived as opportunities, but as threats. We come from an economy where central planning and protectionism was the norm. Now we are supposed to swim in the sea of international competition. We also believe in the creation of level playing fields, but to play in such fields players to some extent have to be equal. Our industries which do not have the advantage of economies of scale or competitive exposure are now on the verge of being swamped by cheaper and better imports. Free trade has become the clarion call of today, but what about those enterprises who have to fall by the wayside? Jobs only exist when there are enterprises. Are we not therefore causing job losses in those very countries that are most in need of them? If in the name of globalization our governments are induced to reduce tariffs and custom duties to help the free movement of goods, why can we not, in the name of globalization, permit the free flow of labour and have other governments lower their immigration regulations? If we agree that protectionism has to go, if we agree that we stand aside and let non-competitive companies collapse, we must also agree that those left jobless by our adherence to such a philosophy should have an equal opportunity to find jobs in any country where their comparative advantage is useful. Globalization of trade should also automatically mean the globalization of employment opportunities.

The need of the day is the creation of employment. The only way that employment can be created is by the creation of enterprises. Governments have to make it easier for such enterprises to be registered and to exist with a minimum of bureaucratic interference, national or international. They should also have easy access to markets and financing so that they can attain long-term stability.

Speaking of long-term sustainability, we feel that any effort at social labelling at the present time is going to be detrimental to the sustenance of our economies. It is not possible that a poor country like mine can aspire to the same standards, social and otherwise, as those of the developed countries. Child labour, denial of human rights and a host of social evils are horrendous but they cannot be looked upon in isolation. Such situations are tied to the total economic development level of the country. We all know that the societies of the developing world are mired in problems. In most cases such problems are transitional and tied to the country's development or lack thereof. History tells us that the industrial revolution in the West was the first instance where one could read about child labour, bonded help and disregard for basic human rights. These despicable evils disappeared almost automatically after the countries reached a certain level of economic development. Therefore, it would be unfair and unjust to countries like mine if the ILO were to — through social labelling or the imposition of universal standards — be the cause of hindering the potential growth of our economies. No matter which way one puts it, if social labelling and universal standards are introduced, they will definitely impact on trade and, subsequently, on the health and the numbers of the enterprises. Such an instance would only mean that the social evils we are trying to eradicate will take that much longer to go away. The WTO meeting in Singapore rejected the imposition of the social clause on trade. I do not see why the ILO has now to be its standard-bearer. We wish to strongly submit that trade and labour standards should be kept apart or we will end up hurting the very sectors we wish to help.

One positive role the ILO could play in the future is that of advocacy on behalf of the least developed countries of the world. We know that the pressure for social clauses and universal standards comes mostly from consumers who convince large firms not to import goods from certain countries. What we need the ILO to do is to give the correct message where applicable to importers and consumers that the said countries have intentions and plans to gradually remove social evils within their system. Poor countries like ours do not have the finances or the capability of telling our side of the story to the correct audience. The ILO could help us at least to some extent get equal time.

Before I conclude I would like to go on record to thank the ILO through its capable Bureau of Employment Activities (ACT/EMP) for the tremendous support it has given us in the past. Our economy is in a very transitional stage and the support in terms of resources and programmes has made it easier for us to weather these turbulent times. I would also like to thank the Director-General for continuing the office in Kathmandu which is a great help to us. We are also grateful to the Nikkeren International Cooperation Centre for their help and guidance, as we are to Denmark, Norway and Italy for their generous contributions to ILO programmes in our country.

My employers' organization looks forward to continue working with the ILO towards our ultimate goal which is the betterment of the employers and workers of the world.

Original Spanish: Mr. ALARCON GOMEZ (Workers' delegate, Chile) — In the name of the workers of Chile, permit me to extend our congratulations to the Officers presiding over this 85th Session of the International Labour Conference and our greetings to all the delegates present.

To begin, I would like to express my satisfaction at being able to take part in this event. We consider that the ILO is the sole institution today which is representative and influential in the search for tripartite consensus between governments, employers and workers.

Last year, we had the opportunity to inform you, from this rostrum, of the urgent transformations required in the labour relations system in our country. Unfortunately, since then no progress has been made from the point of view of standards, and still less with regard to the introduction of any real and effective tripartism.

The Government of Chile does indeed listen to the workers through their union leaders, but for the sole purpose of mitigating their demands. In the final analysis, any decisions concerning workers are made unilaterally.

For these reasons, we are especially concerned to note that our country, Chile, has become an example of progress and development for our sister countries. In such circumstances, progress in macroeconomic indexes has absolutely nothing to do with actual progress in labour and social relations. We may mention the false image which is projected of the Chilean social security system. The statistics that my country exhibits to the world do not reflect the reality in Chile, where there is an unfair distribution of income. Indeed, the United Nations Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean issued a report in March 1997, which placed Chile among the worst countries with regard to the distribution of income. Obviously, the facade of a healthy economy is being used to dissimulate serious labour problems in both the public and private sectors.

Over and above these difficulties related to wages, collective bargaining, unionization, privatization of public health services and public education, and the lack of inspection mechanisms for private enterprise, a new problem has recently come to the fore — repression by the police of workers who mobilize or exercise their legitimate right to strike. For example, the ILO's Committee on Freedom of Association now has a complaint before it which was lodged by unions in the public sector, which protested against repressive action taken on 23 October of last year. The Chilean Government, through the Under-Secretary of Labour, has maintained that the workers damaged public and private property and attacked the police. This is distorted and false information. We therefore call on the ILO Committee on Freedom of Association to demand that the Government prove these accusations. We, the workers, can prove that they are untrue, and that the police attacked the headquarters of the fiscal service employees' union, and even the headquarters of the CUT, the Single Central Organization of Chilean Workers.

As for the report of the Chairman of the Governing Body, we think that it corresponds to the amount of work which can be achieved in just 12 months. Still, as the Governing Body includes Chilean representatives of all three groups and has a Chilean Chairman, we must admit that we in the Chilean trade union movement had high expectations this year, especially as regards our country's setting an example of observance of ILO standards and ratifying the basic Conventions. So far, Chile has only ratified three, and has still failed to ratify two of the most important ones for trade unions, the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

With respect to the Report of the Director-General, which is the main subject of discussion, we share the view that the link between trade liberalization and the protection of workers requires respect for the fundamental rights of the latter. This means that there is no justification for certain governments to refuse to ratify at least the seven Conventions on fundamental rights. We also wish to draw attention to the initiative in the Report of the Director-General which calls for a solemn declaration or recommendation of the Conference to establish, once and for all, some real mechanisms with which to monitor and evaluate the efforts made by governments to ensure that the economic progress resulting from trade liberalization also benefits social progress.

In the same way, we believe that there must be a profound change in the commitment to the ILO's fundamental principles. It is beyond comprehension that many of those who take part year after year in this forum can show absolutely no real sign of a willingness to observe the Recommendations, resolutions, Conventions and other texts that it has adopted.

As regards the proposals of the Director-General referring to the global social label with a system of inspection, we believe this is an interesting initiative which can strengthen social guarantees as trade is liberalized, not only through government action, but also by giving consumers and producers some responsibility for its effectiveness.

With regard to the standard-setting activities of the ILO, we fully share the view of the Director-General as expressed in his Report, that there should exist mechanisms to assess the impact of the various instruments which are adopted. These mechanisms must be appropriate, permanent and fair.

Finally, we should like to reiterate how important the ILO is for the trade union movement throughout the world. We are at the disposal of the ILO's various bodies and will do anything in our power to help strengthen and develop them. We thus wish to express our total support for the Report submitted by the Director-General.

Original Spanish: Mr. GONZALEZ-IZQUIERDO (Minister of Labour and Social Development, Peru) — As representative of the constitutional Government of Peru and head of Peru's delegation, allow me to express my greetings to the delegates of the States members attending this 85th International Labour Conference.

Madam President, allow me to congratulate you on your well- merited appointment to chair our meeting.

The Report submitted by the Director-General on The ILO, standard setting and globalization gives us an introduction to profound reflection about the role of the International Labour Organization in a new economic social and technological context, which differs from the early days of the ILO and which is currently setting us new challenges as an Organization and as member States.

We have to point out that the Government of Peru is concerned by certain trends that are supposedly designed to defend labour rights, but which in fact intend to develop and encourage new forms of covert protectionism by establishing tariff-like measures such as, for example, social labelling or the system of on-site inspections and so forth. Furthermore, we believe that we must avoid the notion of sanction existing in the supervisory machinery.

Many of us say that we consider that it is not good to link international trade with more uniform labour standards. One of the different reasons already thrust into the debate in this building is the existence of a large informal sector in which labour standards to not apply and this situation of the informal sector, especially in some parts of the world, is becoming particularly powerful in terms of economic activity. As regards Peru, the phenomenon of globalization has indeed represented a challenge in order to achieve high levels of international competitiveness, so that we can participate in this new economic reality under the best conditions. More specifically, in the labour sphere it has been necessary to redefine the role of the State within the dynamics of the labour market, and this has led to a new legal framework in accordance with the changes that have occurred but respecting the fundamental rights of the workers.

As doubtless has occurred in your countries too, this task has not always been fully understood by some sectors, who have opposed as a matter of principle these reforms, in an attempt to perpetuate a situation that is incompatible with today's world and which is also unfair to those parts of societies that do not enjoy a job in a traditional sense within the formal sector. In this way, the reality and the results obtained demonstrate that we have taken the right path forward and above all we are working in harmony with the international Conventions that my country has ratified.

I should also inform this assembly that the Government of Peru has every intention of endorsing the ILO's work in revising those Conventions that have become obsolete and which do not contribute to achieving the purposes for which they were adopted. This indeed in some way explains the degree to which they have not been complied with and which in some cases has led to unwarranted complaints because reality has overtaken these Conventions which have simply become dated.

In this framework my country's Government is very happy to inform this meeting of what we have achieved as a result of the application of our labour modernization policies. In Peru, as a result of the major transformations that have occurred throughout the world economy and its effects on our country, there is a new conception of labour relations and within this a new notion of the role that the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare should play. We believe the Ministry should set the appropriate legal framework and promote private initiative in generating new jobs. Indeed, in the past year we have consolidated our labour reforms and, to date, we have already put into practice some regulations for their full application. There have also been specific activities such as bolstering the labour inspectorate system, the purpose of which is to prevent conflicts in this particular sphere, is indeed designed to protect labour rights for the benefit of the workers. Furthermore, in keeping with what I have just mentioned, we have given priority to the information work of the Ministry, with the implementation of specific programmes in this area.

On that topic, I would point out that as of September of last year we have launched a programme for better dissemination of labour legislation called PRODLAB, through which workers and employers can carry out telephone and fax consultations on legal matters concerned with labour issues. In this field, we have modernized our direct person-to-person services, an important part of which was the implementation of an automatic system for the payment of social benefits to workers. I should also emphasize the growing importance felt by our users with regard to administrative conciliation, which has been a useful way of ensuring that the social partners can achieve a negotiated settlement of their differences of opinion.

As regards the Peruvian Government's employment policy, particular attention should be paid to the carrying out of information, conciliation and training programmes and support to sustainable economic activities undertaken for women's employment and micro-economic enterprises. Stress should be laid on the fact that technical cooperation and resources have been granted by international organizations, in particular the International Labour Organization.

Equally in order to cut down unemployment generated by the disparity between supply and demand for labour, we have modernized and reinvigorated the national placement system — SINAC. Last year more than 10,000 workers throughout the country were able to gain a new job through the system.

Furthermore, we have launched the young persons' training programme, called PROJOVEN, and this programme is designed to establish the right conditions for young people who are short on resources to improve their opportunities of obtaining a job. We have also started a job consolidation programme for women called PROFECE, which has been running since the end of last year, and its purpose is to improve women's access to the labour market, in particular women who have little training and precious few resources. In the first month and a half of operation of this programme, we have managed to find placements for 1,300 women in jobs such as textiles, crafts, agro-industries, food and other areas; for this year, it is hoped that 10,000 placements for women will be found.

As you can see, my country is making great efforts to respond to the challenges of a globalized world, so that we can draw the benefits of such globalization, and we hope that we can rely on cooperation and solidarity from the international community.

Finally, the Government of Peru is quite convinced that the ILO, with more than 75 years' experience and on the threshold of the twenty-first century, will continue fulfilling its responsibilities and will respond, as it has done heretofore, to the hopes that the member States have vested in it, by promoting employment, assisting with respect of fundamental human rights in the labour sphere and by contributing to establishing the international peace that we all desire so much.

Original Spanish: Mr. TOMASINO HURTADO (Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, El Salvador) — It is a great pleasure for me to be attending this 85th Session of the International Labour Conference, and on behalf of my Government I would like to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne for all that he has achieved as Director-General of the International Labour Organization.

I would also like to take this opportunity to extend a greeting to all those who are attending this meeting, and in particular to our special guests.

Five years ago the Government of El Salvador undertook to fulfil the peace agreements that were signed in Chapultepec in January 1992. This has made it possible to consolidate growth in our country over the last three years under the guidance of Dr. Armando Calderon Sol as President of the Republic. We have achieved the necessary stability to affect investments from abroad, which of course is assisting with our economic progress.

We cannot forget that we are on the threshold of the twenty-first century. The peoples of Hispanic America are reaffirming their links between each other so as to take on the challenge of the new millennium. We all seek prosperity and this depends, to a large extent, on employment, on perfecting labour relations systems, and on genuine social dialogue through tripartism in order to achieve greater understanding that will lead to full enjoyment of the internationally recognized rights of workers.

In that regard, we believe that the public and private sector should jointly meet the training needs in the area of labour, as well as strengthen the advisory and other services aimed at improving productivity and quality that are required for the benefit of micro-enterprises, small and medium-sized enterprises. It is particularly important to promote knowledge of ILO structures and, in particular, an understanding of its standard-setting activities for concerted action between governments and members, and more effective compliance with obligations. Particular stress should be laid on the duties undertaken as a result of the ratification of international labour Conventions and Recommendations, given their paramount importance in the hierarchy of national legislation.

The Ministry that I head has defined its position vis-à-vis the fulfilment of the obligations that emanate from the ILO Constitution. Our Higher Council on Labour conducts vocational training, and legal studies on international labour Conventions that are soon to be put before the legislative authorities in my country. We are preparing technical comments regarding the draft Convention on Contract Labour. We are studying the Home Work Convention, 1996 (No. 177) and Report V "General conditions for promoting the establishment of small and medium-sized enterprises". We support any legal initiatives designed to disseminate greater understanding of the standard-setting activity of the Organization and the content of its Conventions.

The Secretariat of State has been working to eradicate child labour and is coordinating activities with the national secretariat on family affairs that are designed to implement a programme to create the necessary political and social will to counter these problems as quickly as possible. This will also involve government institutions and NGOs, and will adopt strategies to achieve positive results in this sphere. The work will be based on the preparation of mechanisms to strengthen civil society in general and lead to greater community participation in order to better build our democracy and achiever greater reconstruction after the war.

The Government of El Salvador is furthermore committed to guaranteeing a high standard of primary education, as stipulated in the Plan of Action adopted by the Summit of the Americas in cooperation with the private sector and non-governmental organizations and with the support of multinational institutions.

Our Government is preparing short-term programmes with the support of international financial institutions to eradicate illiteracy, raise the level of school attendance, improve staff training, especially of workers, and adult education. These are expected to be more pertinent to the needs of the market and employers, and improve access of the population to the enjoyment of the social and economic development of the country. They are also designed to improve the standard of living, through technical and vocational training offered by INSAFORP.

These programmes will in fact be strengthened and tailored to the vocational training needs of all workers in El Salvador. There will be a need for technical assistance to promote the development of micro-enterprises and small and medium-sized enterprises. We will support the setting up of cooperatives, funds and other alternatives that will themselves provide backing for vocational training programmes, seminars, regular skills training courses and programmes for immediate institutional implementation aimed at improved productivity and efficiency. It is our belief that the social clause should be taken very seriously by member States, as long as it is compatible with the fulfilment of workers' fundamental rights, and as long as it is supervised locally by governments and, internationally, solely by the ILO. We must also ensure that barriers to international trade are not erected to the detriment of progress made in globalization.

I would not like to close without expressing to the ILO, to its staff, and to those who work in the Central American subregion, our deepest thanks for all the assistance we have received in carrying out our tasks. We have been given some very useful responses to the reports that we have submitted during the course of the year, without which our work would have been extremely difficult, and we hope that we will continue to receive such assistance. Let me conclude by referring to the Preamble to the Constitution of the International Labour Organization which states "the failure of any nation to adopt humane conditions of labour is an obstacle in the way of other nations which desire to improve the conditions in their own countries".

Mr. ROP (Minister of Labour, Family and Social Affairs, Slovenia) — Please allow me to take this opportunity to congratulate the secretariat for their excellent organization of the entire Conference.

In its 78-year history, the International Labour Organization has adopted 180 Conventions and 187 Recommendations, through which it has contributed to both the improvement of workers' status and global progress. The real challenge, however, still lies ahead of us.

We are witnessing rapid and diversified changes resulting from globalization. The social partners will have to show deep understanding and considerable patience, both at national levels and in the international arena, in order to reach acceptable compromises and thus preserve the social balance.

The Slovenian Government welcomes the decision to authorize the Conference to abrogate all Conventions which are no longer relevant to contemporary conditions. The adoption of new international labour standards which take the newly emerging situation into consideration has to be our common goal. Moreover, we should also strive to implement these standards in practice.

The Republic of Slovenia has already ratified the core ILO Conventions, as the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105), was ratified by the Slovenian Parliament two weeks ago. Since we place significant emphasis on the application of ratified Conventions in practice, our approach to the ratification of Conventions is selective and based only upon the prior harmonization of national legislation and practice with the provisions of individual Conventions.

The difficulties arising from the restructuring of the economy, fierce international competition and related high unemployment rates have forced Slovenia, along with other countries, to realize that it must carry out essential legislative reforms in the fields of employment, unemployment insurance, labour relations and pension and disability insurance. In this respect we are trying to follow international labour standards, even those which Slovenia has not yet ratified.

Slovenia is striving to establish a macroeconomic framework which will allow for sustainable economic growth and the equal and competitive integration of the Slovenian economy into the European Union. The measures and reforms in preparation in Slovenia must respond to rapid technological, market and political changes around the world. They should accelerate our transition to a market-oriented socio-economic system and assist in the implementation of a developmental paradigm based on the concepts of saving, new investments, human resources, quality, computerization and social security, all of which should enable the quality of life in Slovenia to be improved.

Anticipated economic growth of 4.5 per cent in Slovenia must be achieved, along with at least a minimal increase in the employment rate. Our investments in knowledge as well as in training and retraining of the labour force, in addition to financial investments, will be increasingly decisive for sustainable economic growth. The introduction of the model of European excellence in all parts of the economic and political system requires the implementation of a human resource strategy. In this respect, Slovenia is preparing measures for more efficient investments in research and development and education.

Slovenia is continuing with the policy of providing social security for all its citizens, which is a prerequisite for attaining other economic policy goals and is of special importance in the transition to a market economy. Like other European countries, Slovenia will have to accommodate a high level of protection of social rights and its impact on the competitiveness of the economy. The restructuring of social rights will be oriented towards achieving a more efficient or better targeted social policy. We shall move from programmes providing various passive forms of assistance to the development of programmes for an active social policy, and ensure that there is a suitable correlation between the two. In this respect, we are making an effort to coordinate economic policy measures with social policy objectives.

We are facing the prospect of major changes in the future, not only in the field of labour law and pension reform, but also in the field of employment and social protection. All these areas, which involve a large share of the population, are extremely sensitive and have an effect on the labour market.

Our goals can only be achieved together and within the framework of a tripartite social partnership. The common goals of the social partners, employers, employees and government, are to provide more jobs, reduce the number of the unemployed, enhance job security and guarantee the rights of employees.

Further economic growth and development in Slovenia and greater investment in industry and small and medium-sized enterprises are fundamental requirements for the realization of these goals; only development and investment can provide opportunities to create more jobs and improve job security.

We are aware of the fact that all the social partners play a very important role and share great responsibility in achieving these important goals. Therefore the tasks and measures pertaining to achieving them are defined in our social agreements. Everybody assumes his share of responsibility for their realization.

The results of research and recommendations provided by the International Labour Office, along with the experience of other countries, have proved to be of great help to us in finding solutions and preparing reforms.

Allow me to wish you every success in your work at this session of the Conference.

Original Portuguese: Mr. MAVILA (Minister of Labour, Mozambique) — First of all allow me to present on behalf of the Government of my country, the delegation accompanying me and on my own behalf, our sincere congratulations to the President on her brilliant election to preside over the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference. Our congratulations are also extended to the Vice-Presidents who I believe will provide you with useful collaboration.

In today's world full of challenges and uncertainties for the future of humanity, we are well aware of the valuable contribution the ILO can make to social peace, stability and democracy, and to relations between States, regions and international bodies. On this basis, we are sure that we can count on cooperation to help minimize the imbalances caused by the globalization of capital and financial investment markets, and eliminate the differences between the developed and developing countries and the various regions of the world.

We very much hope for international cooperation to complement national efforts for the implementation of the right to development, which implies the development of national skills, allowing for the effective participation of the least-developed countries in the global economy with mutual advantages for their respective peoples.

The Report of the Director-General entitled The ILO, standard setting and globalization, as well as the main topics for debate in the present session, encourage us to reflect at length on the answers to the pertinent questions put forward on the occasion of the celebration of the 75th anniversary of our Organization in 1994.

We therefore reiterate now the topicality of social justice as the crucial aspect of social development that must be heeded by us all, the governments, employers and workers within the International Labour Organization, in our struggle against injustice and social imbalances. In fact, as we approach the end of the century, as in 1919 the ILO must focus on the crucial aspects of social development as well as on human dignity, by striving to improve the standard of living of workers and their families, wherever they may be.

It is in the harmonization of nations with tripartite values and in ongoing dialogue with other international bodies, that we glimpse the feasible answers to the challenges awaiting us in the twenty-first century.

The set of standards adopted by the ILO and its supervisory mechanisms constitutes an important contribution to and an indispensable source of inspiration for the civil, political, economic and social rights enshrined in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights of 1948.

In the light of several challenges and justified fears regarding the impact of economic globalization, it is important to stress that, and I quote, "poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere". Widespread poverty in most African countries, of which Mozambique is no exception, with high rates of unemployment, a deteriorating standard of living, low salaries, low earnings in medium-sized and small enterprises, particularly in the informal sector and in rural areas, make up a bleak scenario, since it weakens the newly established democracies across the continent, jeopardizes the success of the market economy system, and shrinks the investments indispensable for relaunching the African economies.

The launching of ILO programmes in Africa, as established by the Copenhagen World Summit, aimed at mitigating the negative repercussions of structural adjustment and the heavy burden of foreign debt on employment, human rights, stability and social development, is both commendable and encouraging. The ILO, more than a watchdog in the contemporary labour world, must, through its standard-setting action and supervisory mechanism for the implementation of standards, assert itself as the social conscience of humanity against injustice, human misery, hardship and all the contemporary forms of slavery that one can think of, for the central Conventions and Recommendations are, above all, important tools for the pursuit of the objective of social justice.

Through ILO programmes and complementary actions of cooperation and technical assistance, in active partnership with member States and to the benefit of deprived populations, it has been possible to promote employment, relieve poverty and engage in ongoing social dialogue to promote peace, reconstruction and sustainable development.

In Mozambique, in a peaceful environment and in conjunction with national reconstruction efforts, our Government is pursuing its programme of enterprise restructuring without neglecting its social agenda, which is closely connected to the process of economic development. Therefore, with the support of the ILO and other development partners, we have reached reasonable levels of social reintegration of the demobilized military and other vulnerable groups of the population, such as the displaced and the returnees, as well as retrenched manpower. Legal and institutional measures are being taken in the main areas of the economy and labour, aimed at reactivating and stimulating local initiatives for employment promotion and increased competitiveness in terms of occupational skills so as to better face the challenges of globalization. In the same way, the new Labour Act, the draft of which was prepared with the technical assistance of the competent services of the ILO, will be considered and approved by Parliament this year. I am convinced that such actions, and other similar ones, will contribute to the consolidation of democracy and socio-economic stability so needed in Mozambique.

Before I close, I would like publicly to indicate how highly the Government of my country, the officials and the technical staff of my Ministry, valued the recent visit of the ILO Assistant Director-General, Mr. Elias Mabere, to our country and how much we value the useful technical assistance we receive in the region.

I would like to wish all those present major success in the deliberations of the 85th Session of International Labour Conference.

Original Arabic: Mr. OULD SIDI (Minister of the Civil Service, Labour, Youth and Sports, Mauritania) — On behalf of the Islamic Republic of Mauritania, and on my own behalf, I am honoured to congratulate the President and the Officers of the Conference on their election to preside over the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference. I wish them every success in their work.

I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, on his Report dealing with the standard-setting activities of the ILO against the background of globalization. We in Mauritania feel that the improvement of the situation of workers through the revision of current standards and the ratification of the core Conventions of the Organization will, no doubt, guarantee greater participation in this era of economic globalization. This was the main theme of the consultations involving Heads of State and Government at the Copenhagen Summit held in 1995.

Our country has introduced a number of measures to develop and improve legislation relating to workers in all spheres, aimed primarily at improving their standard of living.

Following the recommendations of our President Maaouiya Ould Sidi Ahmed Taya, our Government has made this concern the main focus of its national policy, despite the difficult economic situation we are in at the moment. The law relating to freedom of association has led to the enrichment of social dialogue and the creation of a number of trade unions and trade union federations which carry out their activities in full freedom and safety.

The Government has also enacted a number of laws relating to public servants. These laws will guarantee the necessary transparency and will enable public officials to benefit from training. The Government will shortly ratify a bill which was prepared in cooperation with your distinguished Organization. Parliament should ratify it during the course of the year. Our country has ratified the majority of the Organization's core Conventions. We are currently preparing the ratification of the remaining Conventions.

There is a long road ahead of us; the battle is a hard one. However, we intend to win it. We must use the entire potential available to us, use all of our capacities and capabilities in order to attain these objectives. Humanity and its future depend on this.

In this connection I would like to mention my country's concerns with regard to the situation of Arab workers in Palestine and the occupied territories. We severely condemn Israel's policy of occupation in the occupied territories.

To conclude, I would like to express the wish for all countries throughout the world to show greater solidarity in our struggle against underdevelopment, in order to achieve justice and open new horizons, both for our generation and for future generations.

Ms. STEFÁNSDÓTTIR (Employers' delegate, Iceland) — First of all I would like to congratulate the Officers on their election.

The issue of the ILO's standard setting in a rapidly changing world, which the Director-General deals with in his Report, is of vital interest for the future of the ILO. On behalf of the Confederation of Icelandic Employers I welcome his open and creative discussion on standard setting and the analysis of its present crisis of low ratification rates and a lack of consensus, and its possibilities for the future.

In our opinion, it is most important to maintain a relative consensus on the standard-setting activity among the three parties which are the players in the ILO's tripartite system. Otherwise this unique system will fail. Our task is to make the ILO better and more result-oriented. The present lack of balance is, to a great extent, due to working methods and governments which, as the Director-General rightly points out, vote with the workers for the content and adoption of Conventions, without any intention to ratify the resulting instrument.

I also agree that there is a clear need for a more targeted choice of subjects for proposed instruments. The decisive factor must be the added value of an international instrument, and only this, not the immediate need to place a new subject on the agenda of the Conference every year. A total of around 150 Conventions subject to ratification is not convincing.

Another serious problem is the content of the Conventions. They have tended to be too detailed, far-reaching and inflexible to be able to reflect the wide scope of culture and economic reality in the member States.

The proposal by the Director-General to resort to the use of Recommendations instead of Conventions by restoring their autonomous nature is therefore very positive. The Recommendations would serve as guidelines for legislation and administrative praxis. At the same time, the Director-General envisages a follow-up praxis, much in the same way as for ratified Conventions. In this respect I would like to point out that an extended use of reports can easily be an administrative burden for small nations like Iceland.

The Director-General's Report also deals with the question of fundamental rights, based on certain existing Conventions, that should be guaranteed for all workers. In my opinion this can only be done on a voluntary basis. I take the liberty of doubting that a new interpretation of the Constitution, at this stage, will be considered legally binding by all member States.

I am also doubtful about the idea of a special supervisory mechanism applicable to fundamental rights.

The same applies to the possibility of instituting a social label. Such a procedure seems to be open for use in a protectionist manner.

In conclusion, I would like to stress that all ILO standards concerning relations between workers and employers, including those focusing on fundamental rights, must be in line with contemporary thinking and consistent with economic reality, and therefore open for revision. Unconditional protection of the existing system will only hamper development and social progress.

Original German: Ms. ARO (Minister of Social Affairs, Estonia) — On behalf of the Government of Estonia I would like to congratulate the International Labour Organization and thank it for the work it has done in recent years. I am very pleased to congratulate the Director-General for his very interesting Report.

Since it regained its independence in 1991 and rejoined the Organization in 1992, the Republic of Estonia has chosen the way of a free market economy and democracy. As proof of recognition of workers' fundamental rights the Estonian Parliament in 1993-97 ratified the basic Conventions on freedom of association, the right to organize and bargain collectively, the prohibition of forced labour and equal remuneration for male and female workers. The Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), has been prepared for ratification and I am convinced that Parliament will adopt a decision to that effect this year. The ongoing process of elaborating new labour legislation is a prerequisite for ratification of the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138). Therefore, I hope that in the near future Estonia will have ratified all seven core Conventions.

I would like to support the proposal of the Director-General, Mr. Hansenne, to improve supervision of the implementation of the core standards, a process highlighted in its importance in the present world by the context of trade liberalization and globalization of the economy. However, liberalization should not be separated from social development. Therefore, free trade and the increasingly international labour market certainly presume the implementation of the basic labour standards by all countries. Technological progress and the relocation of production make it necessary to improve working conditions, to implement new measures for ensuring occupational safety and health and to promote the creation of new jobs. The harmonization of member States' national legislation with ILO labour standards is one of the prerequisites for the improvement of working conditions and job creation.

The Report of the Director-General promises that the activities of the ILO in the field of new labour standards and the revision of old ones will become even more flexible and purposeful than it has been in the past. International labour standards should allow for implementation in different situations but should also provide for general requirements to ensure a sustainable working life. The best way to strengthen the supervisory system might be the adoption of a declaration enacting a general agreement as an explanation of different possibilities of improving the existing supervisory system. The adoption of the declaration by the Conference would also be the fastest way to make the supervisory system more effective, while the enforcement of the amendment of the ILO Constitution requires a certain number of ratifications by member States.

As the practice of recent years has shown, only a limited number of countries have ratified Conventions adopted by the Conference in the 1990s. Estonia would like to take the initiative with respect to the ratification process by ratifying the Safety and Health in Mines Convention, 1995 (No. 176). Preparations for submission of this Convention to Parliament for decision are well under way.

Development processes in the economy and structural changes have brought with them new requirements for workers' skills and qualifications, as well as the need to create new jobs. These changes are influencing all countries, enterprises and workers. The task for every government is to ensure that jobs are available to its citizens by using various instruments such as the establishment of a future-oriented infrastructure and active labour market policies and the creation of favourable conditions for investment.

A number of foreign investors have invested in Estonia partly because of our tax policies and our successes. The Estonian labour force has been cheaper than that in the industrialized European countries. This enabled us to avoid mass unemployment.

In a small country like Estonia the development of small and medium-sized enterprises has tremendous importance in employment growth, reducing social inequality and poverty. Therefore, we value highly the ILO's initiative to draft Recommendations on the general conditions to stimulate job creation in small and medium-sized enterprises. To that end the Estonian Government wishes to express its appreciation of the ILO's understanding with regard to the problems that are of great importance for all of us.

I look forward to future cooperation with all of you in solving these difficult problems.

Mr. MOUSHOUTTAS (Minister of Labour and Social Insurance, Cyprus) — Standard setting and the International Labour Organization are almost synonymous. Their cardinal aim is to ensure that the fruits of development are equitably shared by all. For this reason I wish to pay tribute to the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Hansenne, for focusing his Report on standard setting and for drawing our attention to the urgent need for renewing this important aspect of the work of the ILO in the context of a globalized economy.

Bearing in mind the time limitations, I will confine myself to very few comments.

With regard to the first issue, adherence to labour standards in the context of a globalized economy, I would like to state from the outset that my Government shares fully the view that trade liberalization and social progress must go hand in hand. Moreover it welcomes the outcome of the World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen with regard to the need to freely promote respect of internationally recognized core labour standards, which was reconfirmed later by the Ministerial Conference of the World Trade Organization in Singapore.

With the recent ratification of the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138), Cyprus is now bound by all the Conventions which guarantee fundamental rights. Ratification, and more importantly application, of these core Conventions by all the ILO constituents is definitely a lofty goal to which we should aim.

It seems to me, however, that this goal can only be attained if the non-ratifiers of these Conventions come to recognize that progress and social justice constitute sound investment for stability, which is an essential prerequisite for the long-term competitiveness of the economy.

The view taken that the partners in the open world market should "play the game of social progress" fairly is correct. The question of how this can best be achieved requires further elaboration and discussion. The decision, therefore, to sound out all the ILO constituents by placing this Report for open debate at the Conference was an excellent one.

My Government is keenly interested in hearing the views of other member States with different socioeconomic backgrounds and at different stages of economic development. In principle we are in agreement with the proposal for the adoption of a declaration accompanied by a follow-up procedure. In seeking, however, a guarantee of greater universality for fundamental rights, care should be taken not to undermine other rights or to neutralize the comparative advantage of countries which, though not having ratified the so called-core Conventions, are genuinely striving towards this end.

Turning to the issue of future standard setting, we endorse fully the diagnosis that there is a pressing need for strengthening the relevance and efficiency of future ILO standards through a more judicious choice of subjects, the introduction of an overall evaluation procedure and a more systematic use of the range of tools available under the ILO Constitution. For it is only through enhancing the credibility of the standard-setting activity that the view that the latter is an obstacle to economic efficiency and development can be dispelled.

Before concluding, I would like to reiterate that the welfare of the people should always be our first priority. The Government of the Republic of Cyprus has consistently assumed that liberalization and globalization are conducive to economic development, provided that their social aspect is not neglected. It is our firm belief that social equity is not simply compatible with growing prosperity, but is indeed a prerequisite for it. Cyprus has tested and verified this close relationship between social and economic development.

Let us hope that this Conference will prove instrumental in strengthening solidarity among ILO constituents and enhancing the realization that it is our collective responsibility to safeguard standard setting and to support the efforts of the ILO to ensure its qualitative advance in the context of a globalized economy.

Mr. RIMAL (Workers' delegate, Nepal) — It is my honour and a privilege to convey my own greetings and congratulations of the General Federation of Nepalese Trade Unions to the President on her unanimous election as President of this 85th Session of the International Labour Conference. May I also congratulate the Director-General and his team for the Report entitled The ILO, standard setting and globalization.

In association with the various social partners, the Office of the ILO Senior Adviser in Kathmandu has prepared country objectives for Nepal. It has set up four objectives: promotion of employment, poverty alleviation, improvement of industrial relations, elimination of child labour and improvement of working conditions and occupational safety and health at workplaces. We endorse the objectives. In this connection we would like to mention the Workshop on Employment Strategy for Nepal, held on 23 January 1997 in cooperation with ILO ACTRAV. As suggested by the workshop, our view is that policies of structural adjustment, trade liberalization, privatization and attempts to attract foreign capital investment have so far failed to generate substantial improvements in the Nepalese economy or the labour market. Macroeconomic stability remains threatened, export performance has deteriorated and public investment remains inadequate. In addition, underemployment and poverty continue to increase.

It is worthwhile to mention that the world leaders who attended the Copenhagen World Summit for Social Development had committed themselves to creating high-quality jobs in order to improve the quality of life. This entails the implementation of international labour standards, the promotion of tripartism and the elimination of all forms of labour exploitation. However, on the threshold of the twenty-first century there is still a residue of the medieval slavery system in Nepal! It is a shame to have to spell this out, but the bitter reality can be observed in five districts of Western Terai. It is called the Kamaiya system. I am referring to those agricultural workers who are under debt bondage from generation to generation and who do not get any wages for their hard labour. Moreover, the women and children from the Kamaiya families are extremely exploited in an inhuman manner. Some of the women from Kamaiya families are forced to be a Worgani, which is synonymous to a sex slave.

This is a major infringement of human rights and an intolerable characteristic of the Nepalese labour market. Our trade union movement demands legislation be introduced to prohibit this practice immediately. To ensure that the Kamaiya system is completely terminated, a strong political will among the parties is essential. It may be necessary for the Government to consider paying debts incurred by bonded labourers and providing them with access to land and training to facilitate their integration into the normal labour market. It is also extremely necessary to determine their wages thereafter. We also call on the Government to ratify ILO Convention No. 29 concerning forced labour and No. 105 on the abolition of forced labour.

In this regard, we believe the effort made by His Majesty's Government of Nepal is very far behind the targeted objectives. For example, we do not know what problem has prevented our Government from ratifying ILO Conventions Nos. 29 and 105. We feel the reason lies in the lack of serious commitment to this line of thinking. We would like to signal our reservations on reports sent back by the Government on the ratification of Conventions Nos. 29 and 105. We would like to express our disagreement on the so-called skill training programme, the only initiative of the Government in the name of the liberation of Kamaiyas.

Child labour is another intolerable labour practice in my country. Two years ago, from this very rostrum, I declared the position of the Nepalese trade union movement. There is a distinction between the traditional employment of children as unpaid family workers in agriculture and some other cottage industries and the more recent expansion of child labour in the manufacturing of carpets, the hotel and service sectors. Clearly, exploited forms of child labour must be the primary focus of attention. We acknowledge the contribution made by the ILO IPEC programme and also efforts to intensify the elimination of child labour. However, child labour cannot be eliminated in the real sense, as we believe that unless production methods in our agricultural sector do not change, new jobs will not be created for those underemployed and unemployed adults whose children are being forced to work.

At the moment, in tackling the problem of child labour, we recommend there should be no new recruitment of child labourers. Where children are removed from their work, a scheme should be established to ensure incomes are maintained or training is provided to adults in their families, to open up their employment prospects. Children removed from their work should have vocational training opportunities. This comprehensive effort requires considerable resources; resources that a developing country like Nepal does not have. The international community therefore will have to continue its cooperation to help Nepal address the child labour problem. In this connection, we ask that His Majesty's Government of Nepal ratify Convention No. 138, and we look forward to the ratification of some of the other Conventions, including Conventions Nos. 87, 141, 110 and 157.

The entire working population of the globe is suffering under the globalization process. The "gifts" of globalization to the working community are contract labour, hire and fire employment, casualization of work and "no-work-no-pay", labour mobilization, etc. We have encountered many more instances of casualization of work, including the "bogus contract" system of the Pacific region. At a time when capital is demanding and justifying the policy of hire and fire employment, it is a legitimate right of labour to demand and bargain for job security. Thus, it is time to discuss and prepare a new ILO instrument on contract labour. We would like to express the support of my Confederation to the proposed Convention and Recommendation on contract labour. We would like to request the distinguished delegates to extend their support to ratify this Convention.

Original Spanish: Mr. AYALES ESNA (Minister of Labour and Social Security, Costa Rica) — I take this opportunity to greet and congratulate the President of this session of the Conference on her well deserved appointment. I wish to use this universal forum to share with you the following thoughts.

The globalization of the economy is confronting us with a situation which, like the mythological god Janus, has two faces, one shining and bright — the face of progress and well-being, the other dark and ugly — the face of poverty and exploitation.

While a football or basketball player earns millions of dollars for allowing an item of sporting equipment to carry his name, the people who make these articles, sometimes children who have not concluded the first cycle of education, earn a few cents an hour and have to live on less than two dollars a day.

The globalization of the economy, the opening up of trade and the freedom of markets in general is not being conducted in accordance with the criteria of solidarity or compassion. So far only a small group in our society and in the international community has benefited from the changes which have taken place in recent times. Unless we face up effectively to the inequalities which are being generated by the globalization of the economy, inequalities which continue to widen the gap between rich and poor, we will be endangering world peace and nobody will be able to guarantee the sustainability of these changes.

We must guarantee to our peoples, and to workers in particular, that the benefits of development are shared fairly. The worst thing that could happen is that the globalization of the economy could be associated with the inequalities or the precariousness which is appearing in our societies.

The effective protection of our workers must not only include the ratification of the core ILO Conventions and their effective application by all the countries of the world, but also the fair verification of their implementation. If economic globalization has caused the borders of national States to fall, making the frame of reference not national economies, but world markets, labour relations influenced by this international environment must be regulated by international labour law, whose fundamental basis should be the Conventions adopted by the ILO. There would be no sense or legal logic to think of an independent national law when labour relations are influenced more than ever before by external factors. How are we going to guarantee the full implementation of the generally accepted principle of equal pay for work of equal value when the price of goods is not only imposed from outside but also varies in accordance with the various labour standards observed in our countries? As long as we do not make progress towards achieving greater homogeneity of labour legislation in our countries, the inequalities will grow and there will be fertile ground for the exploitation of our workers, and thus poverty will become more widespread, with the risk that this entails for world peace.

We do not think it is possible to achieve a uniform level of social protection in all our countries, since this could prevent some from achieving levels of development that could become the basis of subsequent social development. However, that does not mean that we sanction social dumping in any way. We support the proposal of ratifying not only the ILO core Conventions, but also a set of standards which would enable our peoples to live and work with dignity.

We agree with seeking to achieve greater flexibility in labour legislation, with a view to guaranteeing the greater independence of the social partners, so that they can determine by means of negotiation the conditions of work in labour relations, in order to make our economies more competitive.

However, this cannot be interpreted as neglect of protection, or abandonment of the fundamental rights of workers. We do not agree with the social clause in free trade agreements either, nor with the codes of good conduct in production, not because we do not endorse the principles on which they are apparently based, but because they may become barriers to our production imposed by the importing countries. Nor do we agree with the verification of the implementation of minimum labour standards being carried out by private persons or institutions, because their findings may be influenced by discriminatory or protectionist criteria.

As the ILO has given proof of its reliability to all constituents, it is in this jurisdiction that we wish to seek to advance the protection of workers' rights. The application of fair standards will make possible the equitable distribution of the fruits of economic progress, which in turn will guarantee world peace and the sustainability of the multilateral system and the globalized economy.

Original Arabic: Mr. BEYDOUN (Employers' delegate, Lebanon) — I have read with great interest the Report of the Director-General of the ILO on The ILO, standard setting and globalization. It is exceptional in the way it takes up the question and in the in-depth nature of its analysis.

I would therefore like to express my congratulations to the Director-General and I fully endorse several principles and achievements, in particular the attachment to the role of the ILO and the importance of the respect of instruments and positive dialogue between the social partners, as well as the attention given to the need to protect sustained employment with any global or other social economic context. However, I would like to make some comments.

We support the respect of international labour standards, but we cannot accept that this subject is used by the multinationals as a new means of oppression against the developing countries, as was the case with the preparation of the procedures regulating the WTO, given that the possibilities for exploitation by some multinationals are far more evident than any form of exploitation existing in the developing countries.

Secondly, we are also against the political use of labour standards against small States and against any interpretation of these standards which serves the interests of certain actors in the international political game against others. These standards are above all instruments for social protection, employment and production. In this respect, we invite everyone to work towards this goal and to support this undertaking.

Thirdly, we hope once again to put the emphasis on tripartite dialogue. We would like this dialogue to be the guarantor of a profound and ongoing understanding, in particular through practical measures which the Director-General emphasizes, in order to ensure respect of the fundamental principles mentioned in the core international Conventions.

Fourthly, we are also in favour of specifying the role of the ILO. However, the Organization cannot become a policeman nor a means of division. That is why we advocate the adoption of measures based on dialogue and understanding between workers under the supervision of governments.

Fifthly, we also confirm our commitment to the principle of revising certain texts and the substance of some international labour Conventions. Such a revision seems to be necessary in the light of the anticipated evolution in the social and economic spheres throughout the world.

As a developing country, we feel that the ILO and the other United Nations organizations and agencies serve as a haven for the poor countries and a guarantor of the respect of human rights. That is why once again we call upon all friendly States to assist Lebanon so that we can remain a beacon of democracy and morality in the Middle East and throughout the world.

Israel continues to undermine the will for peace and to violate vast tracts of Arab territories, including in my country and in West Bekaa, despite United Nations' resolutions and international Conventions. Israel continues each day to attack thousands of workers and to do harm to enterprises. These aggressive Israeli practices should be condemned by your Organization, your States and by the international conscience. Efforts should be made to put an end to the aggression and bring about the withdrawal of the occupying forces, in accordance with resolution 425 of the United Nations, in order to protect peace.

In the name of justice and freedom, the citizens of Lebanon appeal to you for your assistance.

Original Thai: Mr. KUNANANTAKUL (Employers' delegate, Thailand) — I am honoured to present on this occasion my delegation, and to express our views at this important juncture in the world's economic development.

Thailand and, in fact, Asian countries are often mentioned as a centre of economic growth for the world as a whole. There is some truth in this view. But we shall be among the first to acknowledge that many problems in our Asian countries, many structural and infrastructural weaknesses, will have to be addressed.

In other words, with all our strengths and weaknesses we know we are part of a global community, and we do not feel inclined to divide the world according to so-called Asian values versus so-called Western values. At present we find that discussion sterile and want to move beyond it, in international bodies like the ILO, but also in organizations like OECD, UNCTAD and WTO, seeking communality of purpose.

On our part, as employers, we wish to engage in a meaningful relationship with workers and their unions.

I am happy to mention that in organizing seminars and training programmes, we have had full support from public and private sources, including from the ILO itself.

We applaud the Director-General and the Governing Body of the ILO for the new-found ambition and modesty. While ambition is shown in a few new proposals, modesty is clear in the readiness to review old labour standards.

In the past, labour standards have been sometimes set out in a haphazard way, proceeding through accretion, without sufficient care for costs, ratification, proper follow-up, and without due concern for consistency.

This review of standards will not be easy. If a moment ago I rejected an all too easy East-West dividing line, I still claim that attention must be paid to differences in the cultural and social make-up of the ILO's member countries. Therefore legitimate differences may exist on the question of what belongs to the ILO's "core labour standard".

Finally, let me compliment you, Mr. Director-General, for your combination of ambition and modesty, and express the hope that our 1997 International Labour Conference may benefit the whole world community.

Original Portuguese: Mr. PITRA NETO (Minister of Public Administration, Employment and Social Security, Angola) — Allow me on behalf of the Government of the Republic of Angola, the delegation and on my own behalf to congratulate the President and deputies on their election. We believe that under their direction this Conference will achieve the desired results. I would also like to extend our thanks to the Director-General and his staff for the way in which they have sought to promote the principles and objectives of the International Labour Organization in a context of exceptional economic conditions and complex social challenges, in order to preserve values and to promote changes, for the benefit of all persons and to facilitate the enjoyment of their rights and individual and collective freedoms and to assume more strictly their economic and social obligations and responsibilities.

After having followed a long and difficult path, the Republic of Angola is now starting to rebuild, step by step, and in a spirit of serenity, flexibility and wisdom. We are trying to lay the foundation of a solid and lasting peace in a new context of more beneficial and fraternal political cohabitation and create a framework for economic activity which will bring prosperity to all Angolans.

In fact, after the completion of the main political tasks provided for in the protocol of Lusaka, in particular the integration of the members of UNITA into the national parliament, the formation and installation of a government of unity and national reconciliation, as well as the recognition of the political status of the UNITA leader, state institutions must effectively create the basic conditions for public peace and order. All this must be done so that national rehabilitation and reconstruction programmes may be implemented in an atmosphere of trust, compromise and responsibility in order to achieve socio-economic growth, and increased employment for millions of Angolans who were demobilized and physically handicapped as well and the displaced young persons and refugees who no longer have hope or confidence in the future of Angola.

The Republic of Angola shares with other ILO member States the same concern for the status of the world's economy at the end of this millennium.

The imprescriptibility of economic structural reforms and the imperatives of globalization and regionalization are inevitable and force our political powers and legal systems to adopt new ways of thinking and a new world vision. We must stand up to the new challenges and face our new problems by devising creative solutions, which cannot be effective if we neglect human values, our present civilization, our people, their rights and achievements and their dreams and if we do not give due consideration to the demands of competition and full economic involvement.

Social stability and economic order are central values of our time and they are indispensable for economic growth and social development.

In the specific case of my country the required effort is enormous, but we also need urgent external support for the implementation of programmes in the area of vocational training, for more than 85 per cent of the active labour force; in the area of reconstruction and repair of over 65 per cent of the basic infrastructure destroyed during more than 30 years of war; in the area of employment of more than 30 per cent of the economically active population in order to encourage the creation of small, medium and micro enterprises; and in the area of social welfare and occupational safety and health.

This is how a country such as Angola must prepare itself, on the one hand, to face up to the challenges of globalization of economy and trade. On the other hand, we must be prepared to confront the challenges and urgent task of reconstructing and relaunching the economic, social and cultural life of the country.

In the case of Angola this is a critical challenge of highest priority, and we must improve our human resources and institutional capacities.

In conclusion, I would like to express best wishes for the success of our Organization and the hope that employment, economic growth and social justice will become lasting concerns for every member State that wishes to defend the dignity of labour, the upliftment of all citizens and social well-being.

Original French: Mr. ZAJAC (Employers' delegate, Poland) — Allow me, on behalf of the employers of Poland, to express our warmest congratulations to the President on her election to chair this session of the Conference. It is my signal honour and privilege to address you on behalf of the Confederation of Polish Employers, and to comment on the report presented by the Director-General.

The present session of the Conference gives us an opportunity to state our position on issues of fundamental and universal concern relating to safeguards and respect for international labour Conventions.

I would like to explain the main functions of the Confederation of Polish Employers which I have the honour to represent at this forum.

In accordance with its by-laws, the goals of the Confederation are, inter alia, to represent the social and economic interests and to protect the interests of employers with regard to their intangible assets, as well as to support employers in the negotiation of collective agreements affecting several enterprises.

The Labour Code contains provisions on the negotiation of collective agreements for one or more enterprises. The right to negotiate the crucial issues relating to labour and workers is therefore guaranteed, through domestic legislation, for employers and trade unions representing workers.

The main objectives are the long-term development of enterprises in a context of industrial peace and the elimination of unfair competition. It is for these two reasons that sectoral structures are of prime importance in employers' organizations. These structures are, however, not often present in the operations of the Confederation of Polish Employers, whereas they are prevalent in most of the European Union, OECD countries and in many ILO member States.

The example of the activities of the Confederation of Polish Employers that I have just given demonstrates the employers' participation in the process of protecting public interest at the sectoral and national levels. These activities are to be carried out in a specific period of time and it is thanks to stability and legislation in force that we intent to achieve these goals.

In this regard, I would like to refer to the Report of the Director-General which very succinctly presents the ILO activities. The Confederation of Polish Employers greatly appreciates the Report of the Director-General at the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference.

The Confederation endorses the promotion of the ratification of the core Conventions. It is also of the opinion that we have to take up, in the form of a declaration, the issue of the rules of transparency declared in the Constitution and in the Declaration of Philadelphia.

We believe that the means to achieving this objective should be in keeping with the spirit and letter of the Constitution. The procedures must be objective and should not take the form of the imposition of economic sanctions. We believe that these procedures must be sufficiently forceful to assert and strengthen the role of the ILO in protecting workers adequately in order to avoid intervention and claims by other organizations and governments.

And we feel that compliance should be ensured by a supervisory mechanism within the framework of a voluntary international structure, such as the International Labour Convention. We also believe that the idea of setting up a commission for the freedom of association, which was previously rejected by governments and employers, should be taken into consideration.

Referring to the second part of the Report, "more targeted standards for a greater impact", we think some of these proposals correspond to the concerns of the Confederation of Polish Employers. In general, we feel that the proposed adoption of standards for a new policy could provide certain legal measures and, above all, a new context of thinking for all concerned. Polish employers also fully support close supervision of the observance of the Convention.

Original Arabic: Mr. ALZOGHBY (Workers' delegate, Lebanon) — I have the honour to address you from this rostrum, and this is a great honour, especially as this is the first time that I have done this since I was elected to the head of the General Confederation of Lebanese Workers only a few weeks ago.

I come here with two messages. The first is from the General Confederation of Lebanese Workers that I lead. This Confederation undertakes to respect the noble principles underlying this Organization, namely the principles of freedom, justice, democracy, and dialogue. We trust in these principles and we fully adhere to them. So the second message that I have for you is a message from the workers of Lebanon and the Lebanese people. It is a message of suffering, and of rights and obligations.

You know how much Lebanon has suffered, especially its workers, owing to the destructive war which ravaged Lebanon for 17 years. You know that Lebanon has paid a heavy cost for that war in terms of human and material damage. But now the weapons have been silenced, the war has ended and the web of life is being re-established among all groups in Lebanon. Lebanon is recovering its security and stability and has begun a process of reconstruction. In Lebanon we still suffer from a feeling of insecurity, and this, as you know, is due to the Israeli occupation of the southern part of Lebanon and in the Bekaa valley, in violation of Security Council resolution 425 calling on Israel to withdraw immediately and unconditionally from those territories of Lebanon. You are conscious of the suffering of a peaceful people under occupation, and of what aggression against a small State means. You certainly understand the sufferings of a country whose territory is constantly being attacked brutally by forces which bomb civilians and burn their houses and their crops. The brutal attack against Cana last year bears clear witness to the brutality of the occupying force and to the suffering of our people. Lebanon and its people have a right, through your Organization, to social justice and freedom. We have the right to shout loud and clear for you to help us to deal with this occupation, which is undermining our sovereignty, and the interests of our workers.

This occupation is harming the sovereignty and the daily life of our people, not to mention the achievements in Lebanon with regard to politics, security, reconstruction and development. This is an occupation against the will of international community and against all the noblest principles. It is seriously affecting our political stability, our security and our economy, and our national unity, which has never been as strong as it is today.

Lebanon and the Lebanese people have the right to demand respect for their life, their sovereignty and their moral and national personality. Lebanon has suffered enough from other people's wars on our land, and its people have suffered greatly. I also ask you to help us to live in peace and security and to help us achieve peace, peace based on justice, dignity, equality, and the principles defined by the Madrid Conference and the United Nations resolutions.

We, in cooperation with the Syrian Arab Republic, have always tried to achieve a just and honourable peace, and this is why Israel must stop getting in the way of the peoples of Lebanon and the Syrian Arab Republic. Israel must move towards peace itself, without beating about the bush. We are here because democracy is still our choice, because we are fighting to apply all the international labour standards, because we subscribe to the democratic principles of this Organization.

I would like to refer to the Director-General's Report on The ILO, standard setting and globalization. We think that the ideas and directions found there are a useful basis to establish the consolidation of ILO machinery, and to ensure the respect of workers' fundamental rights, an indispensable precondition for social progress, without which the workers could not be certain to obtain their fair share of the fruits of economic progress generated by the liberalization of trade.

However, we would like this Organization to be more dynamic and to show a greater capacity to help us in the fight of the workers to achieve welfare and the freedom of all workers by applying programmes and projects designed to strengthen trade union capacities to enhance human dignity, in view of how much Lebanon has suffered, especially its workers.

Original Spanish: Mr. NEGRON TEJADA (Workers' delegate, Dominican Republic) — In the name of the workers of the Dominican Republic, I wish to congratulate you on your election as President of this important session of the Conference. We also congratulate the Director-General on his excellent presentation of his Report to this Conference, which deals with such a fundamental topic for our times, that is the standard-setting activities of the ILO in the era of globalization, for this makes it possible for this world forum to take up the crucial question of the relations between globalization, international trade, and labour relations.

The Dominican Republic is a small country located in the so-called Caribbean Basin on the American continent. However, we have found that the fact of not being a big country really is a disadvantage against the background of new economic conditions and changes in trade, because our political and productive structures are not only affected much more strongly by all these processes of change, but also because the terms imposed by international bodies, such as the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank, are reducing the power of our State to decide domestic economic questions, and are carrying us forward more quickly in accordance with the concept of the so-called "global village" towards integration in an international market, which is completely subordinate to the world's major political and economic power centres.

The changes which are being produced in the Dominican Republic are really striking. In just a few years, less than two decades, we have undergone a radical transformation in the way of producing, exchanging and consuming goods. Up to the mid-1980s, our economy was based on the sugar industry, a manufacturing sector mainly directed towards import substitution, a large agricultural sector, and several traditional service industries which supported this productive structure.

With the impact suffered by this structure as a result of the policies imposed by the International Monetary Fund, and in the way in which we are dealing with the design of a new productive base for the Dominican Republic, we are converting ourselves into a service economy, with new emerging sectors such as export processing zones, tourism, trade and telecommunications, which are becoming the main focuses of the Dominican economy, displacing the role which was earlier played by the sugar, manufacturing and farm sectors of the country. Perhaps the best way of explaining this position of the workers in the Dominican Republic is that it is an explanation which has to do with our experience in the export processing zones. We are referring to a production area which had been developed over the past 28 years and at present embraces more than 470 enterprises and 170,000 workers, mostly young women who are holding a job for the first time.

During all this time, our trade unions have fought to obtain recognition of the workers' right to organize freely and to negotiate conditions of work. But we must inform this great international Conference that after almost three decades of trade union activity, and remember we are talking about 470 enterprises, the result has been the organization of 90 trade unions, many of which do not function because the employers subject them to special pressures, or simply prevent their leaders from carrying out their trade union activities. So far, only eight collective agreements have been signed.

We have presented this report to this Conference on the situation in the export processing zones to underline an even more striking fact. In the case of the tourism, trade and telecommunication sectors, which as we said are at present, and increasingly, together with the export processing zones, the strong points of the Dominican economy, the situation is worse with regard to wage protection, social security and employment, and in the organization of trade unions.

The other side of the coin is the situation of the traditional structure of the Dominican economy, especially the sugar sector and the manufacturing industry, which have to restructure themselves to increase their efficiency and productivity in order to participate with some prospect of success in the competitive market of our day. They are producing and proposing changes which threaten the systems of work and the acquired rights of workers.

To all this we have the case of thousands of small and medium-sized enterprises, the sector which generates most jobs in an economy like ours, many of which have gone bankrupt or simply closed down because of the impossibility of competing with imported goods of much higher quality at lower prices.

The result of all this is an increase in unemployment and in the precariousness and informal nature of work, which leads to higher levels of poverty and social marginalization, as well as to higher levels of concentration of wealth.

It would be unjust if we did not recognize some positive elements since the last session of the ILO Conference, which are rare points of light, which are lost against the background of the terrible situation of workers in the Dominican Republic. Here we would stress the debate on changes in the social security system, with a view to preparing a proposal with the support of the trade unions, the employers and the Government. The creation of a national employment commission, which is at present preparing its conclusions, the commission on reform and modernization of the State, and a greater readiness of the country's new authorities, which took power eight months ago, to meet with representatives of workers and listen to and discuss our requests — all this strengthens tripartism and that is precisely the spirit of the ILO.

This is the picture of the development of the Dominican economy and its impact on labour relations. We are sure that the results of this Conference will open up new possibilities for us to fight to find solutions to these problems. It is important to construct the new world announced with the advent of the new century on the basis of societies of the hungry, the needy and the marginalized. If we are going to take a leap forward towards higher levels of civilization, it is necessary that development must be comprehensive, incorporating the sectors which have thus far been excluded, and the decision-making process must be participatory, including everyone. In short, the need is to democratize globalization.

Seventh sitting

Thursday, 12 June 1997, 10 a.m.

President: Ms. Keltošová

ADDRESS BY MR. JAMES T. WOLFENSOHN, PRESIDENT OF THE WORLD BANK

The PRESIDENT — It a great pleasure for me to open this sitting by welcoming Mr. James Wolfensohn, who is the first President of the World Bank to address the International Labour Conference.

The globalization of the world economy and the challenges it poses not only to governments, employers and workers, but to society as a whole, necessitate a new look at the activities and functioning of both the World Bank and the International Labour Organization. We consider ourselves lucky that at this crucial moment in history the leadership of the World Bank is in the hands of the person who shows in both word and deed his moral and social commitment to putting the human being in the centre of development and to engaging in the creation of a better world for everybody.

Mr. President, since you took office in June of 1995 you have visited about 50 countries because you believe that the work of the World Bank cannot be carried out from an ivory tower but only in close cooperation with those whom it is to serve. The contacts you made during those trips further deepened your awareness of the need to ensure that economic development goes hand in hand with social development, and above all with social justice.

We understand that you want the Bank to become less preoccupied with the number of loans it approves and more concerned with how much its projects help improve conditions in those countries which are its customers. To achieve this goal you do not hesitate to send your top managers on training courses, including experiences in the field where instead of hotels they have to live in the poorest areas with local NGOs. To do this it takes an exceptional person who has a vision and dares to translate this vision into reality. We are therefore looking forward to your address with great expectation.

And now, President Wolfensohn, it gives me great pleasure to invite you to come to the rostrum and address the Conference.

Mr. WOLFENSOHN (President of the World Bank) — Madam President, distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen. For a poor banker from Washington this is an overwhelming experience. I am full of admiration and praise for you. You have so organized your conditions of labour that you can come to Geneva every June for three weeks, something that I have failed to do in the Bank. I am therefore anxious to learn from you, Madam President, and from the Organization, so that I can improve our conditions.

We labour away in Washington most of the time, those of us in management, but we do — very much as you said — have the opportunity to get into the field and to look at what the common conditions are that are facing us in this world today. We recognize that last year here in your meetings you determined that the ILO should strengthen its ongoing dialogue with the Bretton Woods institutions — as you said, "with a view to promoting a better mutual understanding of the interrelationship between economic, social and employment policies". You went on to talk about the social partners' raising of quality and quantity of employment, adequate compensatory programmes and social safety nets. And you further addressed the issue of the implementation of the fundamental labour standards which you are addressing here at this meeting, and enhanced technical cooperation.

Let me say to you it is with great pleasure, and with gratitude to Michel Hansenne and all our colleagues in the ILO, that in this last year we have fulfilled your request. The relationships which have been going on for years between the Bank and the ILO have indeed been deepened and strengthened, and we have the opportunity to work together, have mutual visits with each other, both here and in Washington. We have established some work programmes, including joint studies on reform of vocational education and training systems, on the labour-market impact of export processing zones, and joint workshops for trade unionists on labour and development issues; and we look forward to closer cooperation in the future.

So I would say that we are engaged in this joint endeavour, not only because of your admonition that we should do so but because of the recognition also on our part that the problems that we are facing and the opportunities that we are facing cannot and should not be faced alone.

As you know, the Bank is a different institution from your institution. We are differently composed. We have 180 shareholders and we were established some 50 years ago, initially to meet the needs of a post-Second World War world in terms of reconstruction. We mutated from that and took on increasing challenges of development — challenges of development that have increased in their size and in their diversity— and our institution as well has increased in its size and its diversity. The Bank now has a balance sheet of 150 billion dollars. We lend about 15 billion dollars a year. We have another instrument called the International Development Association (IDA), which deals with the poor countries, countries that have a per capita income of less than 2.50 dollars per day. We have an institution which deals with the private sector, the International Finance Corporation

(IFC), because of the importance that we recognize the private sector to have. Then there is yet another institution which insures risk, MIGA, the Multilateral Investment Guarantee Agency.

So we have grown in diversity and size because of the needs. Our world is a world of 4.7 billion people, out of 5.6 billion people on our globe. It is a world of 3 billion people that live with under 2 dollars per day, and 1 billion 300 million people that live with under 1 dollar a day. It is a world where there are inequities in which 56 per cent of the people of the world have 5 per cent of the income. It is a world in which there are great differences between countries, the rich and the poor, and great inequities within countries between rich and poor, and those inequities are increasing.

The Bank is not alone in its function as a multilateral financial development institution. Since our founding we have been joined by other institutions, by regional development banks, by bilateral institutions, by an extended United Nations system, by the European Union, by the WTO, by this Organization. So it is that we find that at the official level the Bank is no longer alone, alone with our partner the Monetary Fund, but is part of an axis of international organizations which must work together — must work together because the needs are great.

We in the Bank are focusing our direct and specific attention on poverty alleviation within a sustainable environment. Now our contribution is not dominant; it is important but it is not dominant. In financial terms all of us together in the international field transfer something of the order of 40-45 billion dollars per year. That is a significant amount of money in absolute terms, but in comparison with the needs it is small. The developing world requires 200 billion dollars a year for infrastructure alone, before we talk of social needs and other needs of governmental expenditure.

Another change has occurred of dramatic proportions and that, as you delegates know, is the role of employers, or investors, or the private sector as we call it, which in our world has taken a wholly different position from that of seven years ago. Seven years ago the private sector was half the size of that first official sector. Today, it is $240 billion, five times the size of the official sector. This is a change not just of quantitative proportions; it is an enormous qualitative change. We have a new, enormous player in the field of development. But again there is inequality, inequality based on the decisions of investors to go to those places which are welcoming and where they can make good investments. The result is that 75 per cent of that $240 billion goes to 12 countries, 140 countries get less than 5 per cent, and sub-Saharan Africa gets around 1 per cent.

We have to deal with the issue of the interface between the private sector and development, how it is we can attract the private sector, on what terms that private sector can be attracted. So the Bank is now trying to forge, and has been trying to forge, the sort of partnership which you have embedded in your own structure, bringing together with governments the private sector as well as labour.

That leads me to our third partner, which is civil society. The world that you are in and that we are in, our common world, has changed. It has changed from a world where the majority of the world was not living in a market system. Fifteen years ago we had a billion people living in a market system; today we have 5 billion people living in a market system. Fifteen years ago one person in four was living under some form of democratic government; today two-thirds of the countries are under some form of democratic government. With a market system and with the developments that have been taking place, we have a situation today where we have a burgeoning of civil society. In that civil society proud and of long standing and great importance, is the trade union movement, organized labour, along with non-governmental organizations which have proliferated enormously.

This is an interface that the Bank must have and which, again, you have already in your institution. It is an embedded link which the Bank must have, not only with employers or the private sector, as we call them, but also with civil society including labour. So we have found ourselves now in a situation where, as we face the world, we have the same partnerships that you have.

We also have a fourth partner, which is of course the partnership with governments. Because we are very conscious of the fact that the projects and the ideas that we have are only relevant within the context of government policy. Our clients are the governments. It is through governments that we operate. We are not an independent entity. The projects of the World Bank are not World Bank projects. They are projects of Equatorial Guinea, of Gambia, of Georgia, of Ghana, of Brazil. They are their projects, they are not our projects. So we have the additional task of working with governments to try and develop and assist them in their development of the necessary skills and competencies and experience with which they can deal with the issues that face them. So we are part of a new partnership.

Let me say immediately, Madam President, that my reason in coming here was to demonstrate to you the importance that we at the Bank place on the relationship with the ILO and, through it, with its participants, with the governments, with the private sector, with the labour union movement. That is not said casually, and it is not said because I am here; it is said because it is a reality. It is a reality that we need to face in a world of 4.7 billion poor people, who within another 30 years will be 8 billion people. It is also an economic reality. This world is a world that represents 17 per cent of the world's gross product; and in another 30 years it will reach something like 30 per cent of the world's gross product.

The developing world in which the Bank deals is the fastest-growing sector of society growing at 6 per cent plus a year, double the OECD rate. It is a world which in purely economic terms we have to include in one world. In fact, the notion that we have two worlds is a foolish notion. We have one world. We describe it in terms of developed and developing but they are inextricably linked, and proudly linked, in economics, in environment, in health, in migration, in crime, in drugs, in food, in war. There is no way of absenting yourself from that world. What we are seeking to do in the Bank, as you are seeking to do, is to try and recognize that the rights of people around the world are dear wherever they are, and that the issue of equity and social justice is an issue that we face wherever we are.

In our work in the Bank we extend to many areas in which you here, in the ILO, are involved, but we work somewhat differently. We start from an economic and development point of view, that is our mandate. When it comes to something like labour standards we cannot make decisions as an institution of the Bank without the approval and support of our governments. Those of you who represent governments here can appear in another guise on my Board. It is not such a large gathering, but I sit with a Board that meets twice a week and represents 180 countries; and I have 24 resident directors.

Those of you who are employers here will understand that that is not an easy life, and those of you who are representatives of governments will understand that that is the way it works. I am an employee, I am an employee of this government body and my policies are their policies. What I can do, of course, is to try and push it a little bit this way and a little bit that way. And we act also as individuals.

One thing which we have come to in recent years is an absolute recognition that, unless you have sound social policies, you cannot have sound economic policies. That is crystal clear. Unless you have a solid base with the people, unless you are concerned with the rights of the individual, unless you are concerned with elements of social responsibility and social justice, you cannot have peace and you cannot have safe investing. That is a very straightforward conclusion, and it guides us and it guides the work of the Bank. And in that sense we coalesce and complement very significantly many of the things with which you are dealing in your Organization on a day-to-day basis.

I was just jotting down last night as I was thinking, in terms of this gathering, of the sort of things that we are involved with. It is not a comprehensive list, but I just wrote down the role of the State — how we deal with issues of capacity building. Here I am happy to say that in the last year, under the leadership of our African governors, we have come up with a plan on capacity building which we are happy to support. But it is not our plan; it is an African plan, as indeed it should be. And a highly remarkable document it is.

I was thinking, too, of our work in health, our work in health that does not deal just with health requirements — important as they are as a social benefit in the workplace — but with the fundamental issues of 800,000 people dying each year from malaria, of 2 million people dying each year from tuberculosis, of some woman dying every minute from something related to pregnancy, of trying to get away from onchocerciasis, or river blindness, which we are jointly eliminating in Africa, of Guinea worm, of a variety of essential health issues; all this before we even get to the question of equity and distribution of health care services throughout a country in which we are deeply involved — issues of family health, issues of taking health out into the field to try, in poor countries, to give people the right to a healthy life, to try and save 500 million people from mental retardation because of food problems.

Then there is the issue of education, which is absolutely fundamental to the whole centre of the development experience — something which is well understood by your Organization. We have 130 million children who are not in school, 70 per cent of them girls; and if we get them to school we cannot keep them at school. We have issues ranging across the world where we are trying to create programmes and curricula which can, in fact, add benefit to the kids that are in school and allow their parents to feel that they should be in school — where they have parents, that is, because we have to deal with tens of millions of street kids that have no family structure.

Then we move up the education scale to the secondary systems, and to the system of education in trades and work for the workless. These are areas in which we are involved; we are spending US$2.5 billion a year just on education, throughout the world.

Then there are the systems of justice — trying to see that development occurs within the framework of the culture of the countries in which we are operating. We are not a bank that wants to try and impose some centralized system of culture or development. We have to respect the cultures, in which we are operating. We need to support and nurture the cultures, and we need to learn from the cultures. There is no way that we can teach family values to African villagers, there is no way that we can seek to impose culture on countries in the Far East that have existed for millennia, nor should we try. We need to act within the context of the culture and history of the countries in which we are operating. We need the sensitivity to build from within, to build within the framework of something that exists.

We have to deal with financial systems which are vulnerable throughout the developing world and without which we cannot function and cannot have development, nor investment, nor safe employment; because, if the financial systems go, there is no way that any set of conditions is going to allow for continuous employment with a basic set of rights.

We are looking at privatization, we are looking at corruption, we are looking at environment because we share the globe on which we are working. We are looking at infrastructure, we are looking at debt — the problems of debt overhang which apply to many of the countries represented in this room. And we are working in post-conflict situation in Gaza, in Bosnia, in Africa, in the Lakes district. We are looking at problems of water, we are looking at issues of women's rights which are affected. We are looking at the issues of children.

I give you that catalogue because you should understand that the Bank is really involved in so many of the dimensions that you here in the ILO are engaged in, but we are involved in a peripheral way to many of the central thrusts that you have. But if we fail, you fail. Unless we can create the conditions in countries on which labour can build and employers can build, your debate is meaningless. So we need to work together in the way in which we approach this tremendous problem of development.

That is the sort of institution we are. It is an institution that is concerned about the individual, that is concerned to give a better life to people throughout the world, that is concerned to protect fundamental human rights; and, most importantly, it is an institution that hopes for peace and security for our children.

We are not, as many of you here think, a financial institution that is simply concerned with structural adjustment and getting its money back. I do not wake up every morning and order my colleagues to see how it is we can make the world less well off. We do not try and develop programmes which adversely affect any sector of society. Our objective is the same as yours; it is to bring a better life.

I also want you to know that we are not dogmatic. If I have learned anything in two years, it is that all of us face a very, very difficult and complex problem. I do not think, with all respect, that any of you have the total answer to development, any more than I have. What it is is a process that we need to go along with, a process of adjustment, a process in which we need to interface with each other.

We do not have a Washington-based consensus, and we are not trying to influence the internal politics of the countries in which we are operating. I say we are not because we are not allowed to — even if we wanted to, our Board would not permit it. But also it is not proper. What we are expected to do is to give the benefit of our experience and to work with countries in the development programmes that they are seeking to establish in their own countries.

Together we need to face the future of a world which is getting bigger, where poverty is increasing and where the environment is deteriorating; and we need to do it together.

I believe there are many elements in what you are doing that complement and coalesce with what we are doing. We respect the expertise of the ILO, we build on it and we have worked together with you. I have to say to you in all candour that in the past I do not think that the relationships have been deep enough or sufficient to face the sort of challenges that we are facing.

I am very proud that in this last year we have taken a step forward and, indeed, I look forward to a strengthening and deepening of the relationships that we have between us. We have to set priorities, we have to set achievable targets, and we have to set ourselves a framework in which we can judge our effectiveness. We have to get away from theoretical exercises, from mutual expressions of goodwill, to targets, to re-evaluation, to focusing on projects on which we can work together and report back on the basis of our experience. Our experience will undoubtedly be in some cases great, and in some cases less than great. And we should expect both because we should have the courage to move forward, to experiment and to take on issues which none of us have faced before.

I have concluded my two years with a great sense of humanity. What I have learned in my visits to 55 countries is that people are not very different. They may be different in terms of their economic circumstances and their history, but fundamentally they care about a set of human values which is built around family, which does not want charity, which wants opportunity and which wants fairness and justice. Whether you are in a village or in a slum, when you talk to parents they want their kids to have a better life. When you talk to them, they are not asking for a handout. What they are asking for is a chance; and when they see that people in government or in the private sector are benefiting at their expense they get mad.

People can sustain poverty if they have got some hope. What they cannot do is sustain poverty with inequity, when they see others getting rich and them not advancing. Those are things which I have observed as common values, not as a distinguished economist, not as an anthropologist which I am not, but as someone who has just been around and seen. And all of you understand it and all of you can relate to it.

Our task in the Bank, and your task in the ILO, is to ensure that we give these individuals a chance, that we give them a chance for freedom, that we give them a chance of economic opportunity and that we give them a sense of justice and a sense that the social environment in which they are operating is fair.

In that sense we are absolutely linked, the aims of the ILO and those of the Bank. The way in which we work is different but the complementarity is clear. Madam President, I look forward very much to working with you, with the staff and with all the delegates in the months and years ahead. [Speech as delivered]

The PRESIDENT — I believe that I can speak on behalf of all the delegates present at this session of the Conference when I extend a word of thanks to you, Mr. Wolfensohn, for the most challenging message that you have just delivered.

Not so long ago, it was rare to hear a representative of a financial institution stressing the need for social development. Yet you want to ensure that certain fundamental values, including social justice, do not wither away as a result of the economic rationale of globalization.

As you know, the promotion of social justice has remained since 1919 the first and foremost mandate of our Organization. After your encouraging words, we are confident that the World Bank is now an important partner in promoting this mandate. We are convinced that cooperation between the World Bank and the ILO will be beneficial to all of our constituents. Once more, thank you very much Mr. Wolfensohn.

(The Conference adjourned at 10.30 a.m.)

Eighth sitting

Thursday, 12 June 1997, 10.30 a.m.

President: Mr. Ramírez León

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT (Mr. RAMIREZ LEON) — We shall now resume the discussion on the reports of the Chairperson of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Mr. KOBAYASHI (Vice-Minister of Labour, Japan) — First, on behalf of the Government of Japan, I would like to offer the, President my most sincere congratulations on her election to the presidency of the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference. I am convinced that under her leadership, with her extensive knowledge and wide experience, this extremely important session of the Conference will be a very fruitful one.

At the World Summit for Social Development held in March 1995 a great step was taken in the field of international labour standards, and at the WTO Ministerial Conference held in Singapore in December in 1996 it was confirmed that, after identifying the ILO as the competent organization for establishing and managing the core labour standards, positive support should be rendered to the ILO's commitment to the promotion of labour standards.

It is very opportune to discuss the issue of the promotion of international labour standards at this session of the Conference, in which delegates of Governments, Workers and Employers from member States gather, and I wish to pay my respects to the Director-General for the Report, in which various useful proposals have been made on this issue.

We must now make the ILO's efforts advance towards the promotion of international labour standards. I wish to express our opinion that, whatever difficulties there may be, the representatives of Governments, Workers and Employers of the member States should pool their wisdom in the spirit of dialogue and cooperation and explore measures for the harmonious solution of problems. Japan will participate actively in such discussions.

In doing so we should remember that the situation of each member State is different, reflecting different stages of economic development, and that for this reason effective assistance from the ILO will be sought to meet the various needs of the member States regarding the issue of labour standards.

I consider that for progress to be made it is necessary to show in clear and plain terms the objective which we should achieve in the promotion of fundamental international labour standards. I hope that discussions pertaining to this will be deepened in future.

At present, discussions on the issue of "strengthening the supervisory system" are under way at the Governing Body, but no consensus has been attained among the member States.

A periodical report on the social progress in the world by the Director-General and some proposals including tripartite consultations on the basis of that report have been made in his Report to the Conference this year. I hope that further constructive discussions will be made and that a consensus will soon be reached.

In any case, we need to make a realistic choice of concrete means to promote international labour standards. I consider that not only the setting up and the supervision of standards, but also a comprehensive approach, including technical cooperation, are important to ensure that the standards function effectively, particularly in developing countries. For instance, further efforts should be concentrated on the strengthening of institutional and administrative foundations through the diffusion of the knowledge and experience required and the training of specialists.

Japan is determined to make every positive effort for progress in this field and the formation of consensus by member States for this purpose.

The ILO is currently under severe financial constraints. Under these circumstances the ILO is expected to make efforts to utilize effectively its limited financial and human resources for the achievement of its objectives and reform its services and organization to meet new needs appropriately. I firmly believe that if the ILO can successfully cope with this challenge and achieve its own reform, it will be able to maintain and enhance its honorable position in the twenty-first century.

Before closing my remarks, I would like to express the hope that fruitful discussions will take place in this Session based on the Director-General's Report. I also wish to affirm that my country will make further efforts toward the fulfilment of the important tasks and sound development of the ILO.

Mr. LWIN (Minister for Labour, Myanmar) — It is indeed a privilege for me to have an opportunity once again to address this august assembly.

On behalf of the Myanmar delegation and on my own, I have the honour and pleasure of congratulating the President on her unanimous election to the presidency of the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference. It is truly an expression of our implicit confidence in her ability to steer the deliberations of the Conference to a successful and fruitful conclusion.

I also wish to congratulate the Director-General for his excellent choice of the theme for his Report to the Conference. As usual the Report is lucid and it is extremely interesting. It contains valuable observations on matters of great importance. The realistic approach the Director-General has taken to address the problems is an achievement worthy of high praise.

Allow me to commend the ILO for its wisdom in selecting the items to be placed on the agenda of this Conference. We feel that the crucial item is the proposed amendment of article 19 of the ILO Constitution. As many of the existing ILO Conventions and Recommendations were formulated several decades ago, we feel that some of these instruments can no longer meet our present-day requirements. We believe that it is necessary to review these outdated international instruments closely in order that they may be consequently amended.

In this regard, we sincerely feel that this august body should direct its intention and efforts to the needs of the member States, especially those of the developing countries, and to reformulating these outdated instruments while bearing in mind the diverse political, economic, social and cultural backgrounds of member States.

It is a fact that Myanmar has lived up to the stipulations of the ILO Conventions which she has ratified. My delegation deeply regrets that the Governing Body of ILO has decided to form a Commission of Inquiry on Myanmar for non-observance of a ratified Convention. This decision was but the result of a politically motivated complaint made by some Workers' delegates at the 83rd Session of the International Labour Conference, despite the fact that we persistently provide the ILO with complete information reflecting the actual situation of Myanmar.

Last year I made a statement from this rostrum apprising this forum of the political, economic and social endeavours of my Government for the emergence of a peaceful, modern and developed nation. During its tenure, the State Law and Order Restoration Council has made unprecedented achievements in reconsolidating national unity that is putting an end to the armed struggles of some national races which have dragged on for several decades since Myanmar's independence from colonial rule.

Many of the delegates here are aware of the numerous mass media reports about my country. Most of these reports are either specious or fabricated stories emanating from anti-Government circles and expatriate groups who are bent on tarnishing the image of my Government.

It is an undeniable fact that the relentless efforts of my Government have resulted in peace and stability. At the same time significant progress has also been achieved at different stages of the national convention held with the aim of drafting a new enduring state Constitution. This Constitution will ensure national solidarity, non-disintegration of the Union and perpetuation of national sovereignty and will pave the way for the emergence of a peaceful, modern and developed nation.

In conclusion, I would like to stress that our urgent mission is the emergence of a new enduring state Constitution which will secure a truly democratic multiparty political system.

I wish this Conference every success in its deliberations.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL SHO'ALA (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Bahrain) — In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I would like to offer the President my warmest congratulations for the confidence expressed by the Conference in electing her as President of the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference. I would like to highlight her proven competence and wish her every success in her work.

I share the position adopted by my colleagues, the delegates of the developing countries, who reject the proposals of the Director-General calling for the adoption by the Conference of a general statement on the basis of which the provisions of certain labour Conventions will be applied to member countries even if they have not yet ratified them.

I also support the developing countries in their objection to the proposal according to which an international commercial label is to be placed on products made in countries which observe a group of principles and fundamental rights and which agree to be subjected to international inspection. This would mean that products from the countries which do not yet have that label would be excluded from the privileges of trade liberalization.

In Bahrain we first of all seek to support and adopt policies aimed at attaining a certain degree of balance between social progress and the economic progress resulting from globalization and trade liberalization. We also try to apply measures designed to transform economic improvements gained through trade liberalization into a more favourable social reality from which the ordinary citizen might derive some benefit. We absolutely object to the establishment of any link between international labour standards and global trade agreements and also reject the idea that the Organization should be used as a means to serve the interests of the developed countries at the expense of the developing countries.

Furthermore, these two proposals that we reject could deprive developing countries of their comparative advantages, which assure them of a measure of equality and equity as regards competitiveness, vis-à-vis the tremendous economic development and technological progress of the developed countries. Moreover, if developing countries are prevented from linking their level of social protection to their level of development, they will be prevented from participating in the benefits of globalization and from any future social development.

The developing countries cannot agree to give up part of their sovereignty to the ILO to serve the interests of the developed countries. We must all respect the fundamental principles of the sovereignty of these States and the Constitution of the ILO which grants each State the right to ratify or not ratify international labour Conventions.

The Constitution of the ILO and the Declaration of Philadelphia are perfectly clear. We do not need another declaration to make their objectives more explicit. Instead of doubling up on efforts to explain issues which do not require explanation, the ILO should respect the principle of the gradual application of international labour standards, according to the circumstances and possibilities of each country, look into the possibility of partial ratification of international labour Conventions and carry out the necessary studies to determine whether present mechanisms to supervise the application of international labour standards have proved successful.

Having expressed our opinion on proposals made in the Report of the Director-General, I would like to give you an idea of the policy applied by the Government of Bahrain to achieve a balance between economic and social progress. We would like to lay a solid foundation for a free economy based on market forces and one which ensures social protection for jobseekers, women, young persons, the elderly and the handicapped.

We would also like to stress that economic restructuring policies should include social objectives to make them acceptable to the people, while providing lasting economic development.

Bahrain ensures that in its budget sizeable amounts are allocated to education, health, housing and programmes to benefit young persons. We strive constantly to strengthen the principle of cooperation and consultation with employers' and workers' organizations in order to serve the common interests of the three social partners.

In addition, we occasionally revise our labour legislation to adapt it to international standards, and we seek to increase cooperation between the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs, the ILO and UNDP.

We would like to express our great appreciation for the help and assistance we have received from these two organizations. We must also stress that progress has been made this year, within the framework of this cooperation, in the form of technical and financial assistance received by Bahrain to set up a new information system on the labour market, to launch a support programme for individual initiatives and to encourage the establishment of small enterprises through the Microstart project.

We would very much like to thank the Director-General, the Assistant Director-General responsible for ILO activities in the Arab States, and the UNDP Resident Representative in Bahrain.

I would like to appeal to the Director-General and to all the Members of this Organization to increase and intensify their efforts to implement the Conference resolutions concerning the protection of Arab workers in Palestine and the Syrian Golan and to condemn the policy of Israeli settlement.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL-TAYER (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, United Arab Emirates) — It is a great pleasure for me, on my own behalf and on behalf of the delegation of the United Arab Emirates, to congratulate the President on her brilliant election to steer the deliberations of this session of the International Labour Conference and wish her every success. We would also like to congratulate the Vice-Presidents on their election.

It is a great pleasure for me to express my thanks and appreciation to Mr. Michel Hansenne, the Director-General of the International Labour Organization, and his staff for their untiring efforts to promote this Organization and for their painstaking work in preparing this Conference and the many reports on the various agenda items. We would also like to thank the Governing Body for the activities they have undertaken in the course of the last year.

The Director-General has devoted his Report to the Conference this year to the Organization's standard-setting activities and globalization. There is no doubt that the drafting of international labour standards, as well as their follow up, ratification and enforcement, constitute the raison d'être of this Organization. The Ministerial Conference of the World Trade Organization (WTO), held in Singapore at the end of last year, confirmed the fact that the International Labour Organization is the body competent in the area of standard setting. We believe that that positive statement from the WTO is an invitation to the ILO to make greater efforts to promote the adoption and ratification of standards — and indeed to monitor their application internationally. This will call for particular consideration of each member State and its specific social and economic systems.

We believe that the present supervisory system to monitor the application of standards and the existing Constitution of the Organization do not call for any fresh measures or new machinery. The system is objective and non-discriminatory; indeed it has gained enormous credibility through the member States.

The United Arab Emirates has, ever since it acceded to the Organization, endeavoured to fulfil all its obligations with respect to international labour standards. In fact, my country has ratified seven international labour Conventions, four of which are core ones. I believe it is very important that my country should continue to do everything it can to cooperate with the International Labour Organization in every sphere that concerns its activities and programmes.

There are many crucial questions on the agenda of this Conference and I am quite sure that the Conference itself, and the technical committees, will pay them every attention. We wish to refer briefly to certain aspects.

First, as regards the report on the situation of the workers in the occupied Arab territories and in Palestine, this Conference, which represents the world's conscience, should denounce and condemn Israeli practices in occupied Arab territories which are only an impediment to peace in the region. We appeal to the International Labour Organization to continue to provide technical assistance to the Palestinian Authority and to ensure that the mission to the occupied territories continues to be sent for as long as occupation continues.

Second, it is a great pleasure for me to support the budget of the Organization for 1998-99 to reinforce the implementation of the active partnership policy and to continue decentralization of the Organization's activities in the field. Specific attention should also be given to administrative and technical training and the translation of documents into Arabic.

Original French: Ms. CISSE (Workers' delegate, Burkina Faso) — First of all, I congratulate the President, on her brilliant election to this high post at such an important Conference, and this not only in honour of your country, but more importantly in the honour of all the women who identify with you. Unfortunately, women are underrepresented at this Conference, in spite of the secretariat's insistence on including women in national delegations. It would be good if the published statistics on the percentage female participation at the Conference were to show their participation at all levels.

To return to the Director-General's Report, we find it extremely pertinent for workers and all their organizations, be they from the North or the South. Standard setting by the ILO and the specific problematics of employment are strongly compromised by the phenomenon of globalization which is imposing itself throughout the world, and which no country can escape.

My country, Burkina Faso, is unfortunately among the poorest countries in the world and is in the group of 48 developing countries which only represent 0.4 per cent of world trade. Most of the population of this group of countries have misery, poverty and unemployment as their everyday reality; and, according to the experts' reports, there is no improvement of this situation in sight. This social oppression of the populations and workers of these countries is the consequence of world economic oppression. This world economy tends to make of each man, woman and child, an object that has a price on the market. This is not without consequence on the application of and respect for ILO Conventions.

This is why economic restructuring policies in our countries calls more and more for the revision of labour codes and certain labour legislation, for the sole purpose of attracting foreign investors.

For us, the ILO is our only way out and, by virtue of this, has an important role to play in the supervision, respect and implementation of labour standards. In order to fulfil this role, the ILO should continue and intensify its work in favour of the promotion of the seven key Conventions.

May I also emphasize that although there is no specific agenda item on women for this session, we are convinced that the subjects which figure there affect women very considerably, since they are becoming more and more numerous in the labour market and the world economy, whether in the rural, modern informal sectors. They are the first victims of globalization. New work technologies should bear in mind this new situation and should give new value to their professional qualifications within the framework of the modernization of the economy. The jobs in which women work are precarious jobs, badly paid and without adequate social protection or guarantee.

The policy of employment creation which we have in mind, should not bear on atypical forms of employment nor on the anarchic development of export processing zones. The experience of EPZs has shown the extent to which poor working conditions and low pay for both male and female workers are well below the norms enshrined in ILO Conventions.

Before I end I am happy about the visit of the President of the World Bank for the first time to an ILO Conference. I hope that what he said this morning will be translated into action and practices, particularly among the Bretton Woods institutions because, if the objectives of that Bank are not contrary to the objectives of the ILO, why have the structural adjustment programmes in our countries always caused misery, poverty, new unemployment and so on? Let us hope that together — in consultation, mutual respect and solidarity — we will be able to change the course of events positively by social equality and social justice.

Mr. CALAMATTA (Workers' adviser, Malta) — Allow me in the first place to congratulate the President on her election to preside over this 85th Session of the International Labour Conference and to thank the ILO Director-General for his interesting Report on international trade and labour rights, in which he faces us with the challenge of devising measures to ensure that social progress and humane conditions proceed apace with trade liberalization in the globalizing world economy.

To our satisfaction, this is in line with the long-standing demand of the international trade union movement for the inclusion of a social clause in international trade agreements with the aim of eradicating, amongst others, child and slave labour wherever these exist.

One of the items on the agenda of this Conference is the start of discussions for the adoption by the ILO of international labour standards on contract labour. This is of special interest for us because contract labour is a problem which my union, the General Workers' Union, and the other unions in Malta, the Confederation of Trade Unions, have been facing for years in Malta.

The Conditions of Employment (Regulation) Act gives employers the facility to engage workers on fixed-term work contracts in certain circumstances, for example to fill abnormal work orders in the manufacturing industry or to cope with seasonal fluctuations, as in the tourist sector.

These contracts are generally for periods varying from one to three months. But unfortunately certain employers are abusing this facility. There are many instances of workers having their fixed-term work contract renewed regularly year after year, meaning that these employers require the services of these workers permanently and not for specified periods.

Therefore, my union is demanding that where a fixed-term contract is renewed on a regular basis time after time without a break, it should after a year be automatically considered as a contract for an indefinite period.

This is only one of our demands for changes in the Conditions of Employment (Regulation) Act in Malta. This important legislation was enacted in 1952 and needs to be generally overhauled because in many aspects it is outdated and does not respond well to today's labour environment.

The previous government has, since 1993, promised us a new Conditions of Employment (Regulation) Act. But unfortunately nothing materialized. Therefore, I appeal to the new Labour Government, which has been in office since October last year, to take up this task in earnest and carry it out in full consultation with the social partners.

Another important item of legislation which needs to be amended is the Industrial Relations Act of 1976. These changes have now been under discussion by the social partners within the tripartite Malta Council for Economic Development since 1991, and this has taken such a long time because of proposals by the employers to outlaw sympathy strikes and curtail the legal immunity enjoyed by trade unions in respect of damages arising from industrial action.

Today I am pleased to say that the employers are no longer insisting on these proposals and so an agreement on the other matters under discussion now seems to be very near.

One of the last bones of contention still on our hands is the fact that the Industrial Relations Act imposes compulsory arbitration at the request of one of the parties involved in an industrial dispute. We are not happy with this situation, but at the same time we are prepared to give it a try of, say, another two years under two conditions, namely:

(a) the strengthening of the conciliation machinery provided by the Labour Department, the situation now being one where we go into a conciliation meeting with one problem and come out with two problems; and

(b) the provision of safeguards to prevent the Industrial Tribunal from being used as a strike-breaker, because we have had many instances in which an employer does not show good will at the negotiating table and then when faced with industrial action refers the dispute for arbitration by an Industrial Tribunal simply in order to break that industrial action, because it is customary for the Tribunal to call for the withdrawal of all action before the start of the hearing.

Another point I wish to raise about the Industrial Relations Act in Malta is that 21 years after the enactment of this legislation two of its provisions have not yet been brought into effect. These are the right of government employees to refer industrial disputes for arbitration by an Industrial Tribunal and the setting up of a Joint Negotiating Council for the public service.

When presenting this year's national budget in Parliament last January, the Government indicated its willingness to put into effect these two provisions of the Industrial Relations Act following consultation with the unions. We hope that these consultations will start soon and that there will be no further undue delay.

We have put a lot of faith in the new Labour Government in Malta and we feel assured that our aspirations and those of our members will be met satisfactorily.

Mr. ATASAYAR (Employers' delegate, Turkey) — I have great pleasure in extending to you all personally and on behalf of the delegation of Turkish Employers, my best wishes for a very successful session. I would also like to take this occasion to congratulate the President on being elected for this session of the International Labour Conference.

I have taken the floor to explain some of our views regarding the globalization process, its implications for working life and the ILO's role in promoting social progress in such a setting.

First of all, I would like to express our satisfaction at the Director-General's topical choice for this Conference, which is extremely relevant to the present circumstances and thus of paramount importance. It is not pure accident or coincidence that the ILO was selected as the main body to observe and coordinate work on these matters following the Copenhagen World Summit for Social Development and the Singapore World Trade Organization Ministerial Conference.

Today, as the developing countries try to get integrated with the world economy by taking advantage of the opportunities created by globalization, it is sad to see that they are accused by industrial countries of social dumping. Furthermore, we do not agree with the efforts to restrain world trade through such artificial arrangements as a "social clause". As the Director-General correctly points out in his Report, "Today, nobody can claim that developing countries are not entitled to the advantages they derive from their wages and levels of social protection which are comparatively lower".

In our opinion, globalization creates millions of new jobs and promotes growth and trade all over the world. We should refrain from imposing various constraints upon countries' ability to have a fair share in this process, in the form of new regulations. As Turkish Employers, we believe that the existing ILO Constitution and Conventions are sufficient to protect the social rights. We are convinced that the efficiency with which the ILO exercises its power to enforce these rights can be increased by taking into consideration the following two points.

First, since trade liberalization and the protection of social rights are closely linked to each other, the ILO should refrain from creating an image that its decisions are close to the policies of the developed countries. In other words, the ILO should be very careful about not giving rise to claims that it is taking sides with developed countries in the competition between these countries and the developing ones. Economic costs of social arrangements are usually higher than expected.

Second, the ILO should try not to get involved in market sharing struggles and discussions among countries. Today, there is a an obvious north-south struggle among countries, which is essentially based on market sharing. The ILO should do its best to avoid any regulations that would result in the protection of the existing market shares of developed countries by bringing about additional social changes that lead to cost increases in developing ones. Such an image might undermine the ILO's authority and decrease its efficiency.

On the other hand, the ILO should bear in mind the following points when exercising its powers:

(1) ILO activities regarding the improvement of working standards should primarily aim at combating unemployment and creating new jobs. It is important that the new social changes which are to be imposed on developing countries do not create additional unemployment.

(2) Conventions and Recommendations should only express general principles, leaving room for national regulations without plunging into details, and should refrain from bringing about rigid arrangements and interventions that impede economic growth and employment. This will facilitate the ratification and implementation of these standards by member countries and meet the need for more flexibility in working life, which is felt by developing market economies.

(3) The existing Conventions and Recommendations should be revised on a permanent basis. Highly rigid ILO Conventions impose constraints on market economies and thus create problems for implementation. Therefore, the ILO supervision mechanism should also be revised in the light of new requirements.

For globalization to bring benefits to everyone, we are compelled more than ever to strike adequate balances between economic growth and social progress. In the final analysis, social protection and wage levels depend on the strength of the economy. This challenging task can only be tackled through dialogue and cooperation at the national as well as international level. We believe that in this respect, the ILO stands in a unique position not only in terms of securing better compliance with its Conventions and Recommendations, but also in creating a permanent mechanism to observe progress and to devise reform. As Turkish employers, we shall continue to support ILO activities aimed at creating a wealthier and happier world.

Mr. ZAINAL (Workers' delegate, Malaysia) — Mr. Vice-President, may I, on behalf of the workers of Malaysia, express my hearty congratulations to you and to the President of this Conference who have been elected to preside over this 85th Session of the International Labour Conference.

In keeping with the fundamental objectives of the ILO, as enshrined in the ILO Constitution as well as in the Declaration of Philadelphia of 1944, it is laudable that the ILO has gone "back to basics" by choosing the theme "Standard-setting Functions of the ILO" for this year's Conference. The theme of standard-setting functions certainly augers well for this year's Conference. As one of the major items for discussion, it is a permanently pressing issue of contract labour.

The World Trade Organization Declaration, duly adopted on 13 December 1996 in Singapore by the economic and trade Ministers of participating countries, has actually strengthened the position of the ILO, although the Director-General did not attend. This is evident from the final text of the WTO Declaration. I quote, "We renew our commitment to the observance of internationally recognized labour standards. The International Labour Organization is the competent body to set and deal with these standards, and we reaffirm our support for its work in promoting them. We believe that economic growth and development fostered by increased trade and further trade liberalization contribute to the promotion of these standards."

The unique and authoritative position of the ILO in the realm of labour has been further strengthened and underscored by many of the Ministers who attended the WTO Ministerial Meeting, notably with regard to the ILO's competence to set and deal with labour standards.

We sincerely hope that all ILO member countries that are signatories to the WTO Declaration will respect their own decision and take the necessary steps to immediately ratify the core labour standards of the ILO and also implement them without any let or hindrance from vested interests.

We are very pleased to inform this august house that the Malaysian Government, through the Minister of Resources, has already implemented the spirit and objectives of the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100), and the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138). The Employment Act, the Children's Act, and the Young Persons (Employment) Act, have helped to ensure equal remuneration for male and female workers, and to streamline and supervise the employment of young persons, respectively. Any hesitation or indifference on the part of the ILO member countries to implement the ILO core Conventions will not only set the clock backwards, but will also impact heavily upon the very future of workers worldwide.

The WTO Declaration has actually brought to focus the larger dimensions of concern on the need to ensure social economic justice through poverty eradication, employment growth and wealth- creation programmes. The end of the Cold War should in all fairness spell the decisive end of exploitation, deprivation and suppression of human rights. The globalization of trade should also bring about appropriate synergies of all-round growth, equity and peace from the social standpoint, not generate misery and misfortune, for workers and their families, perpetrated by rough military regimes and dictators enjoying the indirect support of certain socially irresponsible business enterprises.

The burning issue of child labour, which the International Programme for the Elimination of Child Labour (IPEC) is actively looking into, is one such instance. According to the IPEC report entitled Children in the Shadows there were around 110 million child workers worldwide at the end of 1993. We think this figure would have increased to more than 200 million today. Employers offer "blood money" to poor parents willing to sacrifice their children's future for a paltry sum, and the children are bonded to slavery throughout their growing-up years. Despite wide public knowledge on the evils of child labour, it is rather unfortunate that certain vested interests have deliberately misinterpreted IPEC's noble intention as attempts to undermine the extended family system of collaborative labour in developing economies, although IPEC has actually widened and greatly improved its functional scope by including newly developing countries in Asia as beneficiary nations.

Contract labour, which has been discussed in depth this year, is yet another case of the "Heads, I win, tails you lose" situation wherein the big and the mighty bully the small and weak to succumb to their unfair and unilateral demands. We are confident that with the WTO Declaration, which has actually given the ILO more authorization, would enable the ILO to bring about more practical changes and development to the lives of workers in Third World countries.

As the keeper of the international social labour conscience, the ILO should continue appealing to developed and affluent member countries to ratify more Conventions, and urge them to also extend technical cooperation and resource assistance to less developed countries so that these countries will be able to upgrade the living standards of their workers.

Mr. ALEMAYEHU (Workers' delegate, Ethiopia) — First of all, I would like to express my deep and heartfelt satisfaction for being given this opportunity to speak to this august body on behalf of Ethiopian workers.

After a new and democratic law was promulgated in 1993, the Ethiopian workers were reorganized in nine national industrial federations and all these federations established their confederation at a higher level. Unfortunately, it did not take long for the leadership of the Confederation of Ethiopian Trade Unions (CETU) to bring the confederation into crisis by disregarding its rules and regulations. A series of endeavours made by the ILO and other friendly labour union movements to resolve the crisis did not meet with any success. This was solely due to the rigid position of the then president of the confederation and a handful of his collaborators who were acting out of political motives which they were pursuing underground. This led to the decertification of CETU and the closure of its offices in accordance with the labour legislation in force.

Further repeated efforts were made to bring about reconciliation among the leadership of the confederation, but all was in vain. Finally, eight of the national industrial federations among the nine that constituted CETU decided and agreed to reorganize the union, and to that end, established a coordinating committee on 3 January 1997.

The coordinating committee, in accordance with the mandate entrusted to it by the industrial unions, carried out its tasks and convened the eighth general congress, that was held from 20-24 April 1997 in Addis Ababa.

The congress discussed the report of the coordinating committee and adopted it. It also adopted the revised draft constitution of the confederation. In accordance with the new constitution, 75 general council members, 3 audit committee members and 14 executive committee members were freely and democratically elected.

The congress finalized its deliberations by passing resolutions and decisions containing six declarations.

Meanwhile, the appeal made by the former CETU president to the federal labour high court as regards the cancellation of the confederation's certificate was rejected by the court in its session of 24 April 1997. The steps taken by the Minister of Labour and Social Affairs were determined to be within the law.

Our confederation has now, more than ever before, the strongest support from its entire membership after totally resolving the differences within the leadership of the confederation.

In closing, the Confederation of Ethiopian Trade Unions would like to call on all national, regional, international trade union organizations and their members to stand by its side in its activities to protect the rights and the benefits of Ethiopian workers.

Mr. JOHN (Workers' delegate, Trinidad and Tobago) — May I join with all those before me who have congratulated our President on her election. I think it is a step in our struggle for gender equality and this has opened the doors for quite a number of our colleagues who have been here with us and struggling with us to aspire to higher offices.

Like many other developing countries, Trinidad and Tobago has experienced its fair share of the effects of globalization. Recent governments have found it expedient to take loans from the International Monetary Fund and the Inter-American Development Bank (IDB) and usually we have found that one of the conditions of these loans has been that of privatization. I wish to report, however, a recent experience of our country in dealing with a threat of contracting out and some of the successes we think we have had.

Our Government took a loan from the Inter-American Development Bank to undertake a much needed major overhaul of the road infrastructure. One of the conditions of the loan was that roads maintenance should be contracted out. The effect would have been a loss of over 3,000 road workers' jobs. In a country where unemployment is running officially at about 15.3 per cent, the prospects of those being put out of work finding other employment would have been bleak. In fact the private consultants who were working on the programme described the potential effects, particularly in Tobago, as traumatic. Our union made some important progress when we convinced both our Government and the IDB to look at alternatives to contracting out.

The starting point for us was that we refused to accept what is often referred to as the new paradigm. All too often, we were being told by employers and governments that we were faced with new situations in which we had to accept the weakened and more vulnerable position of working people and their trade unions as a permanent feature of the post-cold war world.

We rejected this conclusion and saw contracting out, and all its variations, as no more than the latest attempt to extract more from the labour of workers. In the history of our small country we have experienced slavery from Africa, indentured labour from India and China and now contracting out from the IDB. It was important for us as the trade union to get the correct perspective on what was happening.

The second point is that we took a great deal of time in analysing the proposals concerning contracting out. We took advantage of new technology and reproduced on a computer the financial model used by those arguing for contracting out. We knew we did not like what was being proposed but new technology enabled us to seriously examine the process that was taking place. We discovered, for example, that the costs allocated to labour under contracting out were calculated on the basis that workers would not get any annual leave, sick leave or other benefits. More importantly, it enabled us to test out alternative models in developing our counterproposals.

Our trade union approach to analysing the effects of contracting out was fundamentally different from that of the government officials we were dealing with. We found that they were taking an accountant's approach of just looking at the "bottom line". In other words, what was important for them was to cut labour costs, and the prospect of lower wages and poorer conditions of employment produced by contracting out fulfilled that objective for them.

Our approach was to take a much broader look at the financial consequences and with the new technology available to us to try and cost this out.

What this meant was that we:

- calculated the loss in government revenue (that is income tax and value added tax) caused by dismissing so many workers;
- tried to assess the further loss in government revenue caused by difficulties in collecting taxes from small companies and self-employed workers;
- off-set against the so-called "savings" of contracting out the costs of severance pay;
- raised the need to cost increased accidents at work;
- additionally — and this was a view that we expressed with some vigour — we tried to assess the costs of the social impact of contracting out. By that we mean the financial costs to the community of increased unemployment in terms of increased crime, drug abuse, poor health, domestic violence, the breakdown of the family unit and all those other well-documented effects of poverty.

To the embarrassment of some we were negotiating with, we were able to identify how much had been allocated to the profit of the contractors and put this into our equation too. It is interesting that those who can be so vehement about the need to cut workers wages can get so sensitive about the question of profits.

The important point is that after taking this broader approach, we are able to show that, in this particular case, it would actually be cheaper to keep road maintenance with direct labour than contract it out.

The third part of our strategy was to accept that there was a potential for change in the way in which our members were working. I would emphasize that this did not mean giving the employers a free hand and we would certainly not elevate this to the status of a principle. All we were saying is that in our particular case we saw the need for a change in work practices. While this may not always be possible we found that by accepting some change was necessary we were able to control and influence that nature of those changes that did take place. What we did, however, was to take the position that the benefits of any increase in productivity should be shared with our members — the people that were actually producing that extra work. This was important to us as is the question of "effort bargain" — that is what we have to do for what we get paid — into the collective bargaining arena.

Currently, we are negotiating the introduction of an incentive bonus scheme that would increase productivity, boost the earnings of our members, keep the work with direct labour and at the same time reduce overall costs and see the improvement in the roads infrastructure that both the unions and the Government want.

Mr. SHILOWA (Workers' adviser, South Africa) — Allow me to congratulate the President on her election as well as salute the Director-General, who has put together a Report which takes account of the debate about the challenges faced by the ILO together with specific measures likely to guarantee that the standard-setting action of the ILO becomes more relevant in the ensuing period.

At the Social Summit held in Copenhagen, Heads of Government agreed to promote core Conventions of the ILO. They went on to list those as the ones pertaining to freedom of association, collective bargaining, the prohibition of forced and child labour, equality of treatment and non-discrimination and the minimum age of employment. The challenge facing the ILO is how best to take this forward. It is with this in mind that we welcome the Report of the Director-General.

In particular, we welcome the fact that he calls on those who are the main proponents of globalization to state their equal commitment to the respect of worker rights. This will enhance a positive perception of globalization among workers. Failure to do so reinforces a perception that globalization equals denial of worker rights.

The call for political will by governments, not only with regard to ratification, but also to pass legislation suited to their own domestic conditions within the framework of the Convention, is important. Otherwise ratification will simply be a way of gaining acceptance by the ILO without any meaningful gains for workers.

I listened today with interest to the input of Mr. Wolfensohn. I am among those who are very sceptical of the role of the IMF and the World Bank, particularly in Africa. However, I concur with him on the fact that if sound economic policies are going to succeed, we need social policies, respect for individual rights and social justice. What appears to be statistics to him, in so far as inequality in wealth and incomes is concerned, are a reality for many workers. I hope that governments and employers will incorporate his views in their proposals. I know that he may have expressed these views today because he is addressing an ILO meeting, but I think we should also hold him to his own words. While it may be true that he does not force governments to adopt specific positions, what he does say is this: "if you want to succeed you have no alternative but to follow my advice". His advice is usually the same for every country. It is a case of one prescription for every patient. In the end he would say that the operation was successful, unfortunately the patient is dead.

Those who are opposed to social justice have called for the rejection of the Report because they argue that it will reinforce rigidities. I fail to see how a call for targeted standard setting, greater recourse to recommendations and an overall evaluation mechanism can reinforce rigidities. The same countries that oppose the Director-General's Report are the ones who in Singapore were saying that the ILO is the mechanism to deal with the same issues of core standards. Yet they would want to remove any teeth it may have. It is time for us to question their precise motive. They seem more willing to satisfy the demands of unelected institutions without any due regard to the electorate. This we reject. I also know that some of them do not even hold elections in their own countries.

The past two years have seen a new tactic by employers who either threaten to walk out of deliberations, or simply refuse to participate. This we condemn, particularly on the part of employers who in their own countries have repeatedly called for dialogue as the only way to resolve differences.

I am sure that our Minister will outline steps that South Africa is taking on the same issues as those raised by the Director-General. I want to place it on record that while there may exist differences in approach on certain issues, there is overwhelming support from us for the overall strategic approach that he is taking, whose aim is to foster social justice, economic development and job creation. As a country, we even have an agreement on how to approach the vexing question of a social dimension to trade.

In conclusion, let me state the following: the battle cry of those who want to demonize the trade union movement as a destructive economic force and remove any role for the State in enacting legislation which protects workers, particularly the vulnerable and the unorganized, is the following — "we need greater labour market flexibility". This coded attempt to turn the clock back and remove basic rights and protection of workers (in the name of "flexibility") will precisely lead to the exploitation of workers, lead to no respect for workers' rights, including those laid down in ILO Conventions, as well as entrench the notion that global competitiveness can only be achieved through the use of child labour and the suppression of workers' rights. This type of "flexibility", which I would call licence to exploit, will lead not to dynamism, innovation and the unleashing of the productive potential, but to stagnation and the destruction of human and natural resources.

The concept of flexibility/rigidity needs to be closely scrutinized to ensure that it is not achieving the opposite of what is intended. Employers tend to confuse government intervention and regulation with rigidities, and deregulation with flexibility. For South African workers, the reality is that effective targeted intervention is needed to overcome many of the inherited rigidities.

Whatever its good intentions may have been, labour market flexibility has become discredited amongst workers. I therefore want to call on governments and employers to accept the basic thrust of the Director-General's Report. Where they have reservations this, I believe, can be accommodated. We have to rise to the challenge of the twenty-first century by combining economic development and stakeholder rights.

Mr. IACONA (Employers' delegate, Ethiopia) — I am greatly honoured to have this opportunity to participate in the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference in my capacity as the first president of the Federation of Employers of Ethiopia which was just reinstated a week ago. The Federation of Employers of Ethiopia was re-established on 26 May 1997 in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia.

After nationalizing private firms and enterprises, the military regime (Derg) dissolved the Federation in 1978 under the pretext that since everything belonged to the masses, it would be only the workers who run and control the enterprises. The Federation was branded as "the exploiter of the working class and the creation of the capitalist system through legal instruments which was daily enforced and hence was to be abolished straightaway".

It was a mockery that the work of the Federation was then thrown at the Ethiopian Chamber of Commerce to mollify the ILO by merely filling the Employers' seat during conferences of a tripartite nature. Although the Chamber of Commerce was entrusted with the responsibility of representing employers, in the absence of the Federation, the supreme irony was that the Chamber had never discussed issues pertaining to industrial relations or employers' problems affecting their activity or well-being.

Among other things, the military regime violated ILO Conventions which Ethiopia had ratified. In this connection, the following may be mentioned: it legalized only one central trade union; civil servants were not allowed to organize themselves into associations; strike procedures were long and cumbersome; international affiliation for trade unions had to be approved by the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs; it dissolved the Employers' Federation: it detained scores of trade union leaders.

With the demise of Marxism-Leninism and with the emergence of a free democratic system, we proudly proclaimed the re-establishment of our Federation, the Federation of Employers of Ethiopia. We have now become members of employers of the world to share the benefits of international solidarity and cooperation. Our Federation strives to promote social progress, inter alia, by creating new jobs and, thus, economic and social development in close cooperation with the social partners.

Our new Federation strongly supports efforts that are being made by employers all over the world aimed at achieving full employment, raising living standards and promoting cooperation between employers and workers in order to improve productivity and working conditions.

Employers and workers uphold the high ideal of the Convention on the right to organize and collective bargaining and the two social partners are protected against mutual interference.

Bearing in mind the crucial role workers play in the development of any economic activity, it should be recognized that employers are the bedrocks of any economy. It is an undeniable fact that employers create jobs with their determination and money, minimize unemployment and generate government revenue.

Within the spirt of tripartism the social partners, government, employers and workers, need one another. Therefore, they should pool their resources and work hard for social progress and the economic development of their country.

The Government should not suppress employers as it did in the past, but should encourage and support them in their efforts towards maximizing productivity and profitability.

Our Federation always tries to create a conducive atmosphere, especially in its relation with trade unions. We vehemently oppose violent and empty rhetoric. Instead, we encourage discussions to settle disputes amicably through dialogue.

I wish to reiterate, on behalf of the Federation of Employers of Ethiopia, that the continuous support and assistance of the Bureau for Employers' Activities and the International Organization of Employers will give us greater strength and vitality in strengthening healthy tripartite consultations.

Mr. VARELA (Employers' delegate, Philippines) — We wish to extend our sincerest congratulations to the President on her election as President of this 85th Session of the International Labour Conference.

By an auspicious chain of developments, competence over issues arising from fundamental human rights of workers in the context of globalization and trade liberalization has been claimed and finally acknowledged in the forum where it rightfully belongs — the International Labour Organization.

These developments represent the culmination of the escalating issue arising from the link between international labour standards and international trade since the ILO was founded in 1919, which has become even more pressing today.

Underlying this issue was the crucial question, given the voluntary acceptance of obligations arising from its standards, of the extent to which the ILO can effectively secure from its constituency a commitment to social progress against the countervailing and adverse effects of intensifying globalization and international competition.

The debate has recently been carried further by the intrusion of the "social clause", or the guarantees that a number of advocates wish to incorporate in international trade agreements on the premise that the liberalization of markets must be accompanied by the elimination of flagrant forms of workers' exploitation.

Many countries, of course, especially the developing economies, see this advocacy as a disguised justification for new forms of protectionism.

It is gratifying that the ILO has not been swayed by partisan considerations to steer clear of this debate, and instead through the Director-General recognized that its mandate, as contained in the Declaration of Philadelphia, involved the responsibility of the ILO to examine and consider all international economic and financial policies and measures in the light of the fundamental objective of social justice, and in that light to include in its decisions and recommendations any provisions which it considers appropriate.

Understandably, the momentum of economic and trade liberalization on a global scale is widely perceived as beneficial to the world community. The free flow of goods, services and capital within the context of economic interdependence is generally considered a universal blessing. It is the common vision of the WTO, APEC, the European Union, NAFTA, and AFTA.

However, the apprehensions of developing countries and weaker economies cannot be dismissed lightly. The new global economic order is a playing field for both the strong and the weak. While economic interdependence is ideal, competition is much too disturbingly real to ignore. Simply stated, the playing field is not level for those hampered by structural inefficiencies and resource deficiencies. This is a complex issue that is a grave concern in the developing world.

Of immediate relevance to the ILO is the full impact of the globalization of the economy on workers in disadvantaged countries. As the Director-General of the ILO pointed out in his Report to the Conference, in spite of the material benefits brought about by trade liberalization for many workers worldwide, still there is no assurance that the blessings of globalization have the widest reach possible.

The social dimension of trade liberalization or the social tensions linked to globalization cannot be overemphasized for the simple reason that the highly competitive global playing field has certain inequalities. To say that competition alone is the name of the game is to be infatuated with the globalization process itself, a pitfall against which the Director-General warns us.

Both from a philosophical perspective and based on pragmatic considerations, to say that globalization is an end in itself, or that competition alone matters, is not acceptable. Human history is replete with tragic cases of class struggle, of many battles fought and lost because of a fundamental neglect of or insensitivity to the urgency of the issue of social justice. Human beings are much too precious to be sacrificed on the altar of unrestrained competition.

Because of its strong Christian tradition, the Philippines puts a high value on social justice. The Philippine Constitution mandates that the promotion of social justice in all phases of national development is a fundamental state policy. There are supplementary legislative measures that reinforce the commitment to social justice as well.

The ends of social justice and the objectives of globalization of the economy are not mutually exclusive. As the Director-General stressed in his Report, "the liberalization of trade and social progress must go hand in hand". Globalization, to be truly meaningful for all, must lead to the people's social upliftment.

Specifically, workers in any country, even those whose work is not export-related, must share in the fruits of trade liberalization. This is a most timely universal concern which is articulated by the Director-General of the ILO and addressed to state policy-makers and actors in the global economic playing field.

These developments have dispelled for good the apprehensions of a good number of constituents, in particular the Employers' group, of the issues of competency and the application of the basic human rights of workers spilling over into and fouling up purely economic and trade issues arising from globalization.

Trade liberalization need not be harsh and inequitable. Globalization can have a human face. This is a challenge worth accepting, and an opportunity worth pursuing. Let us move on.

Original Arabic: Mr. ABDOON (Workers' delegate, Sudan) — In the Name of Allah, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I would like to greet you on behalf of the Sudanese workers and it gives me pleasure to announce that the elections of the Sudanese trade union movement were conducted in a free, impartial atmosphere, in accordance with the regulations of the General Trade Union Confederation.

These elections were held in February 1997 and our Congress was attended by 27 delegations from Africa, Asia and Europe. The Organization of African Trade Union Unity and the International Federation of Arab Trade Unions took part in its work. More than 1 million Sudanese workers participated in elections, which began in October 1996 and concluded in February 1997. During these elections 1,844 subsidiary bodies and 380 trade unions, as well as 13,000 trade unionists and a large number of representatives were elected.

It also gives me pleasure to inform you that the Khartoum Peace Agreement was recently concluded between the Government of Sudan and the majority of the warring factions in southern Sudan. This Agreement has confirmed general freedoms, trade union freedoms, as well as freedom of the press, the independence of the judiciary, and the state of law.

As a result citizens in southern Sudan will have the right to self-determination after a general referendum in four years. The intervening period will be used for the rebuilding and reconstruction of southern Sudan which was ravaged by the civil war which began in 1955, with all the havoc wreaked and the loss of lives, as well as the resources squandered.

Sudan is rich in natural resources. After these four years the people of southern Sudan will be able to choose between a unified Sudan or an independent south. We have supported the conclusion of the Khartoum Peace Agreement because it satisfies the ambitions of the Sudanese people for peace and development.

We have studied the Report of the Director-General presented to this session, dealing with the ILO, standard setting and globalization and it gives us pleasure to congratulate the Director-General and his staff for the efforts they have made in presenting this Report in good faith and honesty and which proposes a programme for a new international world order.

Explicitly this Report is positive, but implicitly, it serves other purposes, such as preventing the developing countries from participating in competition for not achieving the objective of social justice. The lack of confidence by people in the developing countries in the new world order is increasing, and those countries believe that the era of supervision is once again being revived. All this has made the trade unions in these countries have doubts about something which seems very clear: namely the commitment to respect international labour standards within the framework of international trade. This hesitation is due to the lack of confidence in international organizations, including recently the ILO. This world order would like to transform the ILO, and to make it fully serve its interests. Insistence on linking international labour standards to the globalization of trade is a very difficult task to achieve. One of the problems facing us is the inability of countries to pay their debt. In most countries minimum wage clauses are not respected because of the meagre resources available, or lack of sufficient infrastructure. The liberalization of trade can only harm the developing countries which do not respect standards, and the social clause could lead to serious problems in the developing countries.

The social clause which we want is that the rich countries should help the poor countries to reform their infrastructure so that they can increase their productivity without the need to obey the orders of the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund and the other international financial institutions which have destructuring effects on our economies. That is why there is a lack of trust between the Third World and the industrialized countries.

International organizations are in fact ruled by the major powers. Measures have been taken against Iraq, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and Sudan and what is taking place in other developing countries is causing loss of life and property and a disregard of the national order.

The ILO should ensure the respect of international standards, in accordance with its Constitution. Economic growth and development could contribute to improving standards of living.

In conclusion, the appendix to the Report of the Director-General on the situation of the Arab workers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories, the result of a mission sent by the Director-General, reveals the violation of rights in these territories; the great error of Israel in building the tunnel under the Al-Aqsa Mosque and the increase in the number of new settlements. There is also a roadworks programme to interconnect these settlements with Israel and Jerusalem through bypass roads.

This can only be detrimental to the situation of the workers in the occupied territories especially as regards employment and income. Israel is trying to Judaise the territories and displace the Palestinian populations in absolute disrespect of international decisions. Housing is being built at Jabal Abu Ghenaim and the appendix shows to what extent Palestinian workers are subjugated. They are employed as slaves; have to work long hours, sometimes more than ten hours a day. Many other things should have been mentioned in this appendix.

Events in Palestine need to be monitored and we are all aware of the suffering of these people, who need the support of the international community so that they can free their land now under Israeli occupation and make Jerusalem finally their capital.

Original Spanish: Mr. MARTINEZ SAAVEDRA (Workers' delegate, Nicaragua) — I would like to take this opportunity to extend to the President my congratulations on her election to chair this 85th Session of the International Labour Conference.

Our country, Nicaragua, governed under various political regimes that came into power through various methods, now hopes that the new government will provide workers, and the people in general, with the necessary peace and stability which springs from the social justice which reigns in a democratic State.

Let me point out that, although only a short time has passed since the new government took over, serious problems have emerged along the way, and these problems could trigger unwelcome difficulties. The trade union movement has therefore decided to pursue goals that are conciliatory and of benefit to the entire population.

The most representative trade union organizations in the country are trying to set up a channel of communication that will make it possible for us to address the most acute problems in the country. However, the former traditional powers have taken it upon themselves to boycott all the endeavours that the trade union movement has been making in its attempt to tackle the major problems in the country.

The Director-General's Report recommends the conduct to be followed by governments in applying Conventions and standards. However, against the relentless onward march of structural change in the world, and in our country in particular, we wish to urge our Government to make sure that such practices have a human face, in order to curb our worsening social crisis. Using civilized and easily understandable means, we have put to the present Government the fact that it is absolutely necessary to make the changes required to alleviate the burdens afflicting our people today, that the Government should deal with the very liberal labour policies which create hardships for workers in free-trade zones and in-bond assembly plants.

The social security scheme and pensions for the elderly have had disastrous results and externally imposed policies could render the people defenceless and at the mercy of varying degrees of political interference.

Finally, we would like to call upon governments, employers and fellow workers throughout the world to support the efforts being made in Nicaragua to bring about comprehensive development in the country, taking account of social justice, peace and democracy, and rejecting any violent methods that might be used to gain power or destroy the fragile democratic structure that the working class, in particular, has managed to build in our country at great sacrifice.

Original Arabic: Mr. ALSAYGH (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Iraq) — On behalf of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! It is my pleasure in the name of the delegation of the Republic of Iraq to greet you most respectfully and to bring you greetings from the people of Iraq and Mesopotamia and their wishes for the success of your Conference.

It is also my pleasure to congratulate the Minister of Labour and Social Affairs of Slovakia for her election to the chairmanship of the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference. I would also like to congratulate the Director-General of the ILO for including The ILO, standard setting and globalization as the subject in his Report, which was indeed most judicious for the stage we are in, characterized by a big publicity campaign for globalization which manifests itself through the consolidation of trade exchanges and of economic blocs.

We note that the Report of the Director-General aims to promote the role of the Organization so that it should be adapted to and work hand in hand with the system of globalization, so as to give international labour standards a more universal nature by choosing better subjects for new standards and emphasizing the need for countries to ratify the Conventions on workers' fundamental rights concerning freedom of association, collective bargaining, the prohibition of forced labour, equality of remuneration, non-discrimination and minimum age for employment. Undoubtedly, these various initiatives seek to improve the role of the ILO so that it can achieve its objectives and thus give workers a chance to demand the improvement of their living conditions and to obtain the trade union rights and freedoms to which they are entitled.

But the Report did not very explicitly examine the negative effects of the system of globalization which is becoming an even greater force in our present difficult international context and the rapid economic changes, the profits of which go to the countries in the North at the expense of those in the South; and political and economic pressure on the developing countries harms their interests.

Such dangers and risks necessitate that the ILO should work to establish a balance between the interests of developing countries and the system of globalization, so as to guarantee the achievement of social progress in developing countries in the same way as in the countries who run the system of globalization. We believe that the adoption by the ILO of new international standards of a more universal nature, the establishment of improved standards and the insistence upon the ratification of Conventions on the fundamental rights of workers, as indicated in the Director-General's Report, could certainly fortify the role of this Organization.

My country, Iraq, is living in very difficult circumstances today because of the embargo which has been imposed on us for the past seven years. That embargo has led to the death of hundreds of thousands of children, old people and women because of lack of food and medicines and other vital elements. This embargo also brought about the closure of thousands of workshops and laboratories because of lack of raw materials and parts necessary for them to function, thus exposing thousands of workers to unemployment and seriously lowering their own and their families living standards.

Given that Iraq has respected all its engagements under UN Security Council resolutions, the Security Council must now, in turn, respect its engagements towards Iraq, particularly as the memorandum of agreement does not even correspond to the essential needs of Iraqi citizens.

As a result, we call upon this august ILO Conference to examine the effects of embargoes for the peoples concerned and the results and effects thereof on social and economic development so that the functioning of various workshops, laboratories and factories that are at present closed could be restarted and ensure work opportunities for the workers according to ILO standards.

The agenda of our Conference contains a large number of subjects of general character and which aim to promote employment and the workers' cause and to ensure social protection for workers in different areas and the measures to be taken regarding migrant labour from a number of countries, so as to provide a legal instrument to ensure protection for those workers and improve their living standards and earning power, and allowing them to benefit from the fundamental labour Conventions, in order to obtain their rights.

As to the item dealing with general circumstances for the creation of employment for small and medium-sized enterprises, we support the adoption of a legal document in the form of a Recommendation so as to consolidate those small and medium-sized enterprises so that they could create employment, reduce unemployment, and increase their contribution in the areas of production and the national economy.

The violation of trade union rights and freedoms of the working Arabs in Palestine and other Arab territories occupied by the Zionist authorities is indeed a violation of international charters and customs as well as of the objectives of our Organization. Therefore the international community is invited to oppose such practices firmly. My country's delegation calls upon this Conference to have the embargo on the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya lifted and to ensure non-intervention in Sudan's internal affairs.

To conclude, I would like to congratulate the new Members of our body and I am convinced that these countries, with their tripartite Constitutions, will bring an effective contribution to the work of the Organization and to its advance to progress and development. I wish our Conference the success that it deserves in achieving positive results towards the attainment of the ILO's aims and principles.

Ninth sitting

Thursday, 12 June 1997, 3 p.m.

The PRESIDENT — We will proceed with the discussion of the reports of the Chairperson of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Mr. ACHMAD (Workers' delegate, Indonesia) — Firstly I would like to avail myself of this opportunity to congratulate the President on her election to preside over this session of the Conference. I am confident that she will successfully guide us through all the forthcoming sessions to lead our work towards a very productive and satisfactory outcome.

The All-Indonesian Workers Union sincerely appreciates the Report prepared by the Director-General, for the fair manner with which it highlights the globalization-related issues facing workers all over the world. We believe that this Conference will adopt Conventions or Recommendations which will be conducive to creating "political goodwill" on the part of governments, and that it will help improve labour laws and national programmes, thus enabling us to find a solution to some of the social and economic problems which have emerged as a result of trade liberalization and globalization.

I would also like to express the Indonesian workers' appreciation for the agenda prepared for this session, as it properly reflects the workers' main concerns which should be addressed by this Conference, namely issues such as the revision of the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention, 1949 (No. 96); general conditions with a view to stimulating job creation in small and medium-sized enterprises; and the question of contract labour.

These issues are of serious concern to trade unions throughout the world and have recently become the most discussed topic among the workers. The Federation of Indonesian Workers Union has been striving for an improvement of these situations, particularly as regards the issue of workers under contract.

We also consider that it would be wise to insert a new paragraph in article 19 of the ILO Constitution, which would enable the ILO to abrogate a Convention that fails to make useful contributions to attaining the Organization's objectives.

Secondly, I would like to share the Indonesian workers' experience and position on these issues.

The All-Indonesian Workers Union is in favour of the idea of revising the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 96), to cope with current tendencies under which, from a business point of view, workers are considered as a commodity. However, employment agencies, either public or private, have the responsibility to help solve the problem of unemployment, particularly in all the developing countries. Private employment agencies, in cooperation with and under the control of the Indonesian Government, have proved vital in helping organize outbound workers seeking employment in the Middle East, Malaysia, Taiwan, China, the Republic of Korea and other countries. Nevertheless, we regret that the services they provide to workers who seek employment overseas still involve very high fees.

In this regard, the All-Indonesian Workers Union would like to propose that Convention No. 96 be modernized, as it has proved to be somewhat outdated. The revised Convention should focus on the protective role that "migrant-receiving countries" should play in providing for the basic rights of migrant workers in accordance with the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98). The All-Indonesian Workers Union, in so far as job creation in small and medium-sized enterprises is concerned, is of the view that this International Labour Conference should adopt the necessary Recommendations to incite countries to take adequate measures to stimulate job creation in small and medium-sized enterprises.

The Recommendations should contain provisions to secure the growth and development of small and medium-sized companies, such as access to credit, foreign exchange, imported inputs, effective service infrastructures such as consultation and research, marketing assistance, managerial and vocational skills, advice regarding technology, support for innovation and taxation.

As regards contract labour, the All-Indonesian Workers Union proposes that the International Labour Conference adopt standards on contract labour which should take the form of a Convention to be supplemented by a Recommendation. Again, we share the common concern of workers' unions throughout the world on the situation of contractual workers who should be provided with adequate health protection and income, as well as maternity protection for women workers. But most important, the basic rights of contractual workers to join trade unions should be not denied to them. We deplore the fact that there is a strong tendency in the contractual system where employers prevent workers from joining unions.

The All-Indonesian Workers Union will support the measures taken to increase the efficiency of ILO operations. We believe that inserting a new paragraph to this effect is one way of achieving this goal. Furthermore, we do not have any objections to the proposals made to amend the Constitution.

In conclusion, I hope that our Conference this year will adopt the Recommendations that will be put forward to effectively deal with the problems listed in our agenda.

Original French: Mr. POISSON (Government delegate, Canada) — Madam Chairperson, may I congratulate you on your election as President of this Conference. It is impossible for the new Canadian Minister for Labour, Mr. Laurence MacAuley, who was designated only yesterday, to be present in Geneva. It is therefore an honour for me to convey to you the message of Canada at this International Labour Conference.

I am pleased to participate in a discussion on a topic of such importance to the Government of Canada and this for several reasons.

First, Canada is a founding Member of the ILO and highly committed to its objectives, ideals and values.

Second, globalization is bringing enormous changes to our lives. One of these changes involves the growing economic integration of States. Our economic interdependence has revealed a greater need for protection of social and labour standards, particularly through multilateral initiatives.

Third, the international spotlight is on the ILO to respond to the expectations raised by the World Summit for Social Development and the WTO Singapore Ministerial Conference, symbolically representing the synergy between social and economic progress. Both fora have recognized the responsibility of the ILO to set and deal with core labour standards.

It is in this context that I would like to talk about Canadian ideals and values. Canada is a trading nation. Its well-being and prosperity depend on an open, rules-based and multilateral trading system.

Economic growth is vital to us all — it is a means of improving living standards of the workers, the nature and the quality of jobs, and the conditions and benefits available to them. But this does not automatically translate into equitable distribution of benefits. Thus, Canada is strongly committed to a rules-based international system for promoting and protecting these basic workers' rights and values. Core labour standards provide a set of tools for all countries, independent of their level of development, and we support the ILO in this work.

The Canadian Government attaches great importance to the rights of children throughout the world and supports initiatives towards the elimination of all forms of child exploitation. Canada will actively contribute to the development of an international ILO standard on child labour.

Thus, the Canadian Government welcomes the Director-General's Report as a reaffirmation of the basic principles and values of the ILO Constitution, to which we are committed. The Director-General courageously outlines the challenge before us as Members in reaffirming our commitment to basic workers' rights, while exploring within an existing constitutional base the means to strengthen the universal application of these rights. The Report squarely faces the need to review and accelerate the adaptation of the International Labour Code to ensure its relevance to an uncertain and changing world economy. It provides us with a comprehensive overview and a rich menu of ways to extend universality of core labour standards and principles through improved monitoring, promotion and implementation of these rights and principles. (The speaker continues in English.) Our challenge is to carefully and constructively review that menu and decide on the way forward.

First, Canada strongly supports the proposal that the ILO make a definitive statement to the international community on the principles of core labour standards in the form of a declaration which would not require any constitutional changes.

Second, to ensure that the declaration is effective, a constructive monitoring, reporting and promotional procedure should be associated with it. The aim of the declaration is to extend universality of application of the core principles — thus a supporting procedure should provide the basis for identifying obstacles to implementation, as well as to highlight cases of persistent non-compliance.

We would suggest that the Director-General present a draft declaration and proposals for monitoring at the November Governing Body.

Canada urges the Director-General to move forward immediately on two other proposals contained in the Report: to introduce effective evaluation procedures to assess standards against their intended objectives; and to propose measures for the enhanced use of and monitoring of independent Recommendations. Indeed, Recommendations can be a powerful instrument for influencing national policy.

Finally, I would like to make a few brief comments on other proposals contained in the Report, namely reporting on social progress and the social labelling initiative. Canada suggests that these proposals need to be carefully analysed and considered. The ILO should therefore continue its deliberations on these issues, and, when the results of these analyses are clearer, the Director-General might proceed with more concrete proposals.

This is a rich and reflective Report. It is critical that the ILO move forward to confirm its role as the lead multilateral organization responsible for a rules-based system for social progress, in a world going through a number of political, economic and social changes. We hope Members will seize the opportunity, increase the universality of core labour rights and principles, and improve the impact of standard setting.

By moving forward on this Report at this Conference, the ILO clearly meets the expectations of the international community.

Ms. NJIE (Government delegate, Gambia) — On behalf of the Government of the Gambia and myself, I take this opportunity to congratulate the President on her election as the President of this 85th Session of the International Labour Conference. I am happy to stand before you today representing a democratic Government of the Gambia, which has just gone through peaceful transition into civil rule through general elections.

In September 1996 the ILO Regional Office in Dakar, in cooperation with EMANO, the North-West Africa Multidisciplinary Advisory Team, conducted a two-day tripartite workshop on the ILO's international fundamental Conventions. The objective of the workshop was to assist the Gambia in the process of ratification of the seven fundamental Conventions. The Government of the Gambia appreciated this timely technical assistance and found the exercise very fruitful. I can assure you that at the moment the Government of the Gambia is in the process of ratifying these fundamental Conventions through democratic means.

The Gambia regards its membership in the ILO as an important way of participating in the world of social issues and economic development endeavours. The Gambia has always observed international labour standards, since the colonial era. These are entrenched in our national laws.

The Gambia, being a poor country in terms of GDP, is in dire need of assistance in the following areas: human resources development (including a literacy campaign) and enterprise development; occupational health and safety; and informal sector studies, with a view to ascertaining its full potential for job creation.

I would now like to read to you the the report on the period ending May 1997 made under article 19 of the ILO Constitution by the Government of the Gambia on the Labour Administration Convention, (No. 150) and Recommendation (No. 158) of 1978.

It is to be noted that the entire labour legislation has been reviewed as a consequence of the Labour Act 1990 and the Industrial Injuries Compensation Act, which were enacted in 1990. This report will focus on five key areas, namely:

Labour inspection: this is an ongoing activity which encompasses both wages inspection and labour inspection within industries.

Constraints: there is an acute shortage of transport and trained personnel that would make the operation more functional. Indeed, ARLAC, the African Regional Labour Administration Centre, has provided some training assistance. However we are in dire need of more such assistance for our labour officers.

Employment services: already a new set of forms for registration has been put in place. Other data bank forms have been designed for the jobseekers and employers respectively. As the procedures are yet to be computerized, the technical assistance provided under ILO project GAM/87/015 needs to be continued.

Data collection: There have been difficulties in gathering statistical information due to material shortages, and a lack of collation of occupational accidents and diseases. We need technical assistance to overcome these difficulties.

Staffing: The Labour Department suffered high staff turnover in the past. Efforts are, however, being made to rectify the situation.

Tripartism: There are five joint industrial councils which meet regularly to discuss labour and related issues. Furthermore, there is the Labour Advisory Board which advises the Government on labour legislation.

For the above reasons, ADMITRA, the Labour Administration Branch, has been approached to upgrade the Department of Labour in the Gambia.

May I seize this opportunity to convey the felicitation of the Gambian Government, people and that of the Head of State and President of the Republic of the Gambia, Rtd. Col. Yahya A.J.J. Jammeh, to all delegates at this august gathering. The Government of the Republic of the Gambia is diligently pursuing policies aimed at transforming the Gambia into a financial centre, tourist paradise, a trading, export-oriented agricultural and manufacturing nation with potentials suitable for local and foreign investments.

Before I conclude, the people and Government of the Gambia look towards the ILO and other bodies for cooperation, especially at this time.

Finally, I thank you for the opportunity given me to speak, and the distinguished delegates for their patience and attention.

Mr. ITO (Workers' delegate, Japan) — On behalf of the Japanese Trade Union Confederation RENGO, I would like to express my opinions on the Report of the Director-General, The ILO, standard setting and globalization. RENGO welcomes and supports Part 1 as well as Part 2 of the Report, which deal with the orientations that the ILO should take in the face of globalization and in preparation for the twenty-first century.

This Conference has been discussing for more than two years the promotion of ratifications of core labour standards of the ILO and the strengthening of the supervisory machinery. The Report of the Director-General is proposed on the basis of these discussions. I appreciate very much the fact that this Report responds sincerely to the declaration of the WTO Ministerial Meeting in Singapore, which admitted that "the ILO is the most competent organization for standard setting on fundamental labour rights and promotion of these rights", and that this Report proposes concrete measures to strengthen the ILO action for the years to come before the arrival of the twenty-first century. I should insist also that the respect of core human and labour standards is not the exclusive task of the ILO. This task is so important that all the international organizations, including notably the WTO, the IMF and the World Bank, should participate in the efforts of the ILO.

The Director-General pointed out in his Report that the discussion on the liberalization of trade and the protection of workers' rights was conducted at the beginning, focusing on the reciprocal criticism of social dumping and protectionism; and then the discussion has become more constructive on the basis of understanding the relative advantages of low labour conditions in developing countries. On the other hand, if persistent efforts are made, for many countries at different levels of economic development and historical background, these fundamental human as well as workers' rights can be implemented. In other words, in order to accept the comparative advantage of poor working conditions of countries in global competition, it is necessary that all the countries participating in the global economy should respect the core labour standards concerning freedom of association, the abolition of child labour, forced labour and discrimination.

I constantly insisted in the Working Party on the Social Dimensions of the Liberalization of International Trade that it is most important not to question the comparative advantage of developing countries, but to create a system in all countries that respects fundamental human and workers' rights, and realizes the fair distribution of wealth gained through participation in the global economy. The existence of such a distribution system will lead to the abolition of child labour, will stop the widening gap between poor and rich, and will ensure the respect of humanity.

The ILO report World employment 1996-97 pointed out that in countries where rapid economic growth was taking place, a widening gap between poor and rich was appearing, and child labour was on the increase. These tendencies demonstrate that some developing countries deny the necessity of establishing a fair system of distribution, disregard fundamental workers' rights, and deny the positive as well as necessary relations between the development of world trade and the respect of human and trade union rights.

In the face of such a reality, the reinforcement of the ILO supervisory machinery is an urgent and important need for all the workers of the world. The Japanese Trade Union Confederation considers that it is necessary to establish a new supervisory machinery on core labour standards, through which the ILO should be able to supervise the application of these standards even if they are not ratified by a particular country. In order to create this new machinery, the Governing Body of the ILO should discuss the concrete measures at the coming session of the Governing Body this November. I strongly hope that the Director-General proposes concrete measures and at the same time Government, Employer and Worker members should participate in a constructive way.

The ILO faces an important choice for the twenty-first century. I sincerely hope that the tripartite constituents of the ILO will decide upon concrete measures, in line with the spirit of this Report, in the Governing Body of November this year.

Original Arabic: Mr. NEFFATI (Minister of Social Affairs, Tunisia) — In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! First and foremost I should like to present the President of the Conference and the honourable members of the Office with my sincere congratulations and I wish them every success. I should also like to present greetings to the participating delegations, and that so many of them have come to this Conference shows their attachment to the ILO, this glorious Organization, which has in fact never ceased working for social justice and global development.

The International Labour Organization, via its standard-setting activities, has always been in the forefront in developing the framework of labour relations and improving working conditions worldwide. This is becoming more and more essential today in the context of the globalization of the economy and the liberalization of international trade, especially in view of the fact that economic development should not be to the detriment of social development.

For Tunisia international labour standards are very important. We have ratified 56 international Conventions including those relating to basic human rights. My country has always worked towards the harmonization of its national legislation with international labour standards and effectively applying the principles they contain. This is on the basis of the conviction of our President, Mr. Zine El-Abidine Ben Ali, concerning the complementarity between the social dimension and the economic dimension of development, and the need to implement human rights in their global approach.

In the past few years there have been major developments in our labour and social security legislation, as well as a considerable strengthening of policies on social dialogue and on collective bargaining in the framework of the conciliation between the interests of social partners.

One can see that in the course of 1996, and in the first months of this year, a new round of bargaining was launched and this has led to the revision of all the sectoral collective agreements and the signing of new sectoral agreements. These negotiations have not only covered the private sector, but also included the civil service and public service enterprises. The negotiations in the various sectors concerned both staff regulations and wages, and have in fact led to improvements in working conditions and labour standards.

Despite the present difficult economic situation worldwide, thanks to our policy of dialogue and collaboration between the social partners, Tunisia has been able to adopt a new programme to increase salaries over a three-year period. Thus wages in the public and private sector will in fact have been increased over nine consecutive years, allowing an improvement in the workers' purchasing power. The wage increases have also been beneficial to workers who are not covered by collective agreements or particular status agreements, or those workers who are paid the minimum wage.

While we are interested in the standard-setting activities of the ILO, which we indeed support, we nevertheless feel that this work should take account of the needs and interests of developing countries. Tunisia has given top priority to job creation. It has taken an initiative since the political change of 7 November 1987 to launch a number of sectoral and legislative reforms in the field of employment and training policy, in order to guarantee that they are well matched, and to make sure that they can be used efficiently in the interests of the economy and of development.

Further, since job creation depends above all on investment, and when you consider the important role of SMEs in this field, the State has encouraged the creation of these enterprises by establishing a specific chapter on this in the Single Code on Investment. We have also adopted a number of incentives and encouragements for investors and entrepreneurs in such firms.

Aiming to provide support mechanisms for small-scale projects, last month the President of the Republic decided on the creation of a special bank which will be financing these projects and helping the young business promoters, especially those who have qualifications in different specialities, but who do not have the means of self financing, nor bank guarantees to finance these projects.

The social dimension of development is one of Tunisia's key priorities on the threshold of this new era where we feel that a man is the cornerstone of the success of our national programme to bring Tunisia up to scratch in terms of international competition and to put Tunisia into the industrialized country bracket at the start of the twenty-first century.

The proposal of the Director-General to draw up a regular report on social progress around the world is an incentive to consolidate social policy and we feel that the International Labour Organization has a dominant role to play in monitoring the social impact of the globalization of the economy and guiding the expected effects of trade liberalization towards social progress, as well as assisting member States in this field.

We therefore appreciate the valuable efforts of the ILO and of its Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, to reinforce fundamental human rights and freedoms, and to consolidate the path of the various countries towards social progress. I would also like on this occasion to pay homage to the ILO for the efforts undertaken concerning the situation of the workers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories. Their situation has, in fact, become worse recently due to the blockage of the peace process. We would like to call again upon the international community to do more to ensure peace and security in this region. We would also like to see a reinforcement of the technical cooperation programme offered by the ILO to the social partners in Palestine, given the great need for this cooperation.

In conclusion, I would like to express the support of Tunisia for the ILO's efforts to achieve the noble objectives for which it was created, hoping that it will redouble its efforts to ensure that we can adapt better to the changing world economic environment and to develop cooperation and partnership mechanisms, on the basis of the solidarity between peoples, so we can achieve a new world based on peace and stability, and aspiring towards progress and prosperity.

Mr. SUKARTIN (Employers' adviser, Indonesia) — First of all, on behalf of the Employers' Association of Indonesia, I would like to take the privilege of extending the most cordial congratulations to Your Excellency Madam Olga Keltošová, Minister of Labour, Social Affairs and Family of Slovakia, on your election as President of this 85th Session of the International Labour Conference, as well as to the three Vice-Presidents respectively. May I further express my conviction that under your wise guidance and able leadership, Madam President, we are sure this Conference will be a success.

Indonesia is the fourth most populous country in the world. In 1997 its population reached the 200 million mark, spreading throughout the country from Sabang (North of Sumatra) to Irian Jaya, totalling not less than 5,193,250 sq. km, comprising not less than 15,000 islands.

The year 1997 is Indonesia's second year of the Sixth Five-Year Plan, which is part of the second 25-year long-term development plan, having been successfully accomplished in the various areas. Establishment of the infrastructure, development of advanced and modern industries, shifting from dependency on oil and gas to non oil and gas exports, have tremendously increased employment. The annual growth of jobseekers, which is not less than 2.4 million, represents a tremendous national challenge.

The growth in economic development brought an increase in the per capita income from US$300 in the First Five-Year Plan to US$1,100 at the end of the Fifth Five-Year Plan. At the end of the current Sixth Five-Year Plan the per capita income is expected to be US$1,500 with an average economic growth rate of 7.6 per cent. The per capita income at the end of the Eighth Five-Year Plan is anticipated to be around US$3,000.

These successes have been achieved with the help of the strategy of national economic development based on the following development trilogy.

Firstly, sound and dynamic national stability. Secondly, sufficiently high economic growth. Thirdly, a more equitable distribution of development gains, which has led to the welfare of the entire population.

To adjust to today's era of globalization, several measures have been taken, i.e. deregulation, debureaucratization, reformation of the administration, etc. National development is not only constricted in the area of industry but also in human resources in broad aspects like training, education and lifestyle as well. Among the improvements which are to be mentioned in the area of manpower affairs, are the minimum wage system, the social security system, the restructuring of the All Indonesian Workers Union into the Federation of All Indonesian Trade Unions with 13 sectoral workers' unions in alignment with ILO guidelines.

The Employers' Association of Indonesia is convinced that this positive trend will further develop in the near future and that, based on the development trilogy, economic growth is not expected to be less than 7.6 per cent per annum.

The Employers' Association of Indonesia supports the orientations concerning the renewal of standard-setting activity, which we feel should truly be a major focus of the ILO's action and reflection during the coming biennium. We also strongly support the fight against child labour since this has been adopted as a national programme in conformity with the national goal to achieve a compulsory nine-year basic education programme by the year 2003.

As regards the promotion of labour standards, we believe that it should have been discussed within a development perspective.

Finally, I am pleased to mention the technical cooperation which has benefited both the ILO and the IOE. We would also like to thank NIKKEIREN, JIL and other sponsoring organizations for their respective contributions to the development of human resources in Indonesia through the Employers' Association of Indonesia network. We sincerely hope that this cooperation will be continued in the years to come.

Original Russian: Mr. BILOBLOTSKY (Minister of Labour, Ukraine) — Allow me first of all, to extend my sincere congratulations to the President on her election to this high office and to wish her full success in directing the work of the Conference.

I take particular pleasure in extending these congratulations bearing in mind the high level of cooperation between our countries, Ukraine and Slovakia, as well as between our respective ministries.

We believe the ILO Director-General's Report to this session presents a profound analysis of the standard-setting work which is clearly one of the most important areas of the ILO's activity.

The Report proposes for discussion some interesting views and conclusions, and it contains a number of new and innovative approaches to the future development of the Organization's standard-setting activity. Although not all member States take the same view of these ideas, the material offers a useful basis for discussion as we consider all aspects of the possible consequences which a mechanism for monitoring observance by all member States of the fundamental human rights would entail.

Globalization, the liberalization of world trade and other challenges of our times, are all important factors in the socio-economic development of the world on the eve of the new millennium. They confront — and will continue to confront — the ILO with new and difficult tasks in responding correctly to the challenges of development in the world economy. We believe that standard setting for the social aspects of globalization (which are aspects that can and must be regulated), as well as the development of cooperation with the World Trade Organization, should be regarded as an important area of the ILO's work.

As you know, Ukraine has ratified six of the seven fundamental Conventions in the field of human rights, and is conscientiously carrying out the obligations it has undertaken. We are also giving serious attention to the question of ratifying the last of these instruments, Convention No. 105 on the abolition of forced labour.

The Supreme Soviet of Ukraine is now considering a new labour code, as well as other standard-setting labour acts. Once these have been adopted, using the expertise of the ILO, we intend to set about ratifying Convention No. 105.

The year since the last General Conference has been a difficult one for Ukraine. Although we have managed to bring down inflation, to stabilize our national currency, and to some extent to slow the rate of decline of our output, the economy is still showing signs of crisis.

At the same time some of the most painful tasks of economic liberalization have now been carried out.

As the President of Ukraine, Mr. Kuchma, stressed in his statement before the Supreme Soviet on 21 March this year, "We have now crossed the Rubicon, and there is no turning back. The only question now is how effectively and how quickly we can move forward, and how united we are in our new plans and actions".

The Government of Ukraine is making a serious effort so that in 1997-98 a real breakthrough towards a genuine deepening in the social orientation of our economic reforms can take place; so that arrears in wages, pensions and other social benefits can be paid off, and so that can be a real improvement in the system of social protection.

In this connection, I would like particularly to stress that the sheer size and the specific nature of the problems facing transitional economies, including Ukraine's, required broad international support for the reform effort to make the process irreversible and to speed the integration of these countries into the world economy.

We are grateful to the International Labour Office for assisting in the social reform process in Ukraine. We are happy to note that this year we have reached agreements in principle with the Office on new technical assistance projects for Ukraine.

We are also looking forward to the elaboration of other joint projects with the ILO on social and labour questions of importance to our country, and particularly for the occupational and social rehabilitation of the population which suffered from the Chernobyl disaster. We believe that in order effectively to carry out national social development programmes which are implemented with the assistance of international financial institutions, it would be advisable to submit these programmes for prior assessment by the ILO.

In conclusion, I should like to say a few words about the ILO's proposed programme and budget for the next biennium. In our opinion this document is reasonably well-balanced. There is no question that Ukraine, like many other countries, has every interest in keeping the ILO's overall expenditure low in the long term.

However, we are convinced that these cutbacks must not lead to any winding down in technical cooperation programmes, including those being carried out in countries with transitional economies.

I would like to note in passing that notwithstanding the difficult economic situation in our country, the Government of Ukraine is taking all possible measures to reduce the amounts it owes to the ILO budget. In 1996-97 we transferred to the Organization's accounts over US$5.3 million.

As we support the ILO's activities, we shall continue our efforts to resolve this problem in the future.

Mr. PARK (Workers' delegate, Republic of Korea) — Allow me to congratulate the President wholeheartedly on her unanimous election as President of the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference. I would also like to show appreciation to the Director-General for his Report suggesting a more universal approach to the establishment of the social dimension of international trade liberalization and to the promotion of international labour standards.

In June last year in Brussels, just after the 84th Session of the International Labour Conference, many of the world's union delegates continued their work by participating in the 16th World Congress of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU). During their deliberations they identified the global market as trade unionism's greatest challenge. International trade liberalization has given rise to high expectations for global development, which is expected to address the problems of low economic growth, high unemployment and poverty. However, globalization is proceeding in a certain direction. Governments are shifting power decisively in favour of capital, whereas union power, which plays the core role for social progress, is diminishing to a great extent.

It is argued that flexibility has to be introduced into the labour market so as to resolve the persistence of mass unemployment and to maintain the competitive edge in international markets. Especially relating to international competition, many seem to think that improving the level of social progress is connected with losing international competitiveness in the global market. In so far as this way of thinking is spreading and state policy adopts such a diagnosis, it would be difficult for the member States of the ILO to accept the spirit of emulation between States for social progress. My concern is that globalization is simply recognized as a survival game in a world of unbounded international competition, rather than as a tactic for the development of the global market. It is possible that we will be unable to avoid the enormous social cost, if no consideration is given to the social dimension and fierce competition leads to the minimization of social security benefits, and if labour market flexibility is introduced only in order to reduce costs.

In the case of Korean labour law, which was revised in March this year, it is easily understood that the background of its revision is directly related to the changes in the international environment. It is only for reasons of high productivity and efficiency of enterprises that employers are given more freedom to lay off workers. It is only to meet the needs of employers that workers are urged to do longer working hours without appropriate attention being paid to their health and safety. The activities of trade unions are under serious threat and the balance of power for social progress is breaking down. Fundamental workers' rights for teachers and civil servants are not guaranteed. Korean workers, due to globalization, are increasingly concerned about the traditional "life-time" employment pattern collapsing, deteriorating working conditions and domestic capital flight, which brings about increasing unemployment.

If the social tension caused by globalization continues to be widespread in the world, there will be a serious threat to social well-being and peace. I must say that I myself am puzzled with doubt as to whether it is a good thing that ideological rivalism was replaced with economic rivalism between States. What is most disconcerting is the fact that everything is understood from such an economic rivalry perspective. This might be the main reason for the low ratification rates of newly adopted Conventions. Although it is acceptable to amend the Constitution to enable the International Labour Conference to abrogate obsolete Conventions on the condition that they are carefully and fully examined, the real problem is political will for the application of the Conventions. In the case of Korea, none of the core Conventions has been ratified. I support a declaration of the Conference on fundamental rights and a regular Report of the Director-General on social progress, which will surely promote the instruments for social progress. However, regarding social labelling, I am concerned about the problems of transparency in its procedures and the dangers of discriminatory trade protectionism and its use for political purposes. I believe it should be studied further before actual implementation.

Concluding my remarks, I expect that the ILO will refresh its devotion to the mandate for the realization of social justice and full employment, particularly in a complex and difficult era of globalization such as the one we are facing today.

Original Arabic: Mr. DJILANI (Employers' delegate, Tunisia) — We are meeting today, yet again, at the ILO and we wish to reaffirm that the reason why we are here is to seek and to find the practical solutions which are required for development, both nationally and internationally.

First of all I would like, on my own behalf, as well as on behalf of the Tunisian employers, to offer my warmest congratulations to Mrs. Keltošová on her election as President of this session. May I also warmly praise the work of the International Labour Organization and its Director-General, Mr. Hansenne, in promoting the activities of the ILO and its bodies.

We are very proud of the assistance that is extended to us and which permits us to define our future perspectives and to participate in the search for solutions to the challenges presented by the globalization of trade, the opening up of frontiers and competition.

To ensure employment and a livelihood for its people is the challenge faced by every country throughout the world, because this is the first guarantee of sustained development and social peace which each country needs and is the guarantee of safeguarding human dignity. We are aware of this challenge in Tunisia, a challenge that can only be met within the framework of a partnership which increases possibilities for investment and exports.

May I underline the need for attaching great importance to the work of the young — in particular graduates — because they make up the majority of the population in the developing countries, and they will ensure the success of all development projects, which are a basis for reform and rehabilitation, with a view to building a better future.

His Excellency, the President of the Republic of Tunisia, Mr. Zine El-Abidine Ben Ali, has taken numerous pioneering steps in order to guarantee the success of Tunisian enterprises permitting them to play their role in ensuring job opportunities within an environment of solidarity which does away with all marginalization and all exclusion, and giving great importance to human resources, in improving the legislative, fiscal and social context within which enterprises operate.

As regards employment we must recall the need to provide facilities to make it easier to promote employment policy, in particular those favouring small and medium-sized enterprises. These must take into account other considerations, such as structural reform through vocational training programmes which are backed up by access to new technologies and to new techniques. Moreover, we feel that standards and new rules as a whole should assist in achieving these objectives. While we adhere to them, we remind you of the need to stress those standards specific to child labour, because we are convinced that the measures taken in this respect have the support of everyone. Tunisia was one of the first countries to ratify the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child. This is part of our overall approach to protecting the fundamental rights of children and ensuring their protection in all places.

I would like to praise the constructive and productive role played by the International Labour Organization, which has strengthened its position on the world scene. With regard to its structure and its credibility, the Singapore Conference recognized the ILO as the only organization with the right of inspection on social questions, which is one of the best proofs of the esteem in which this Organization is known for finding appropriate solutions to different thorny social problems, using consultation to make the social partners aware of the problem, and then to lead towards shouldering their responsibilities. In spite of the achievements of the International Labour Organization, we nevertheless consider that ILO reforms should seek to improve or eliminate those Conventions which are no longer consistent with the radical changes in the international economic order. In any case, most of these Conventions have indeed received only a small number of ratifications.

Challenges in economic development are subject to levels of social progress. We would like to reaffirm that this is intimately linked to our search for new means to promote enterprise and competitiveness, because enterprises must rise to the challenge and reconcile their local role with the need to survive within international competition. All of this requires major financial and technical resources, which are often missing in the developing countries.

As social partners we, through the ILO, must take up all these questions with transparency and effectiveness, bearing in mind the diversity of economic conditions and social circumstances. In this Organization we are accustomed to search for everything which allows fruitful cooperation to take place between us and strike a balance in the wishes of our people with regard to development and prosperity in our respective countries.

Mr. SAMET (Government delegate, United States) — Let me begin my remarks by offering the congratulations of my Government to the Director-General on his Report to this 85th Session of the International Labour Conference. His Report is a carefully reasoned and highly useful framework for our deliberations on labour standards, given the nature of the global economy at the end of the twentieth century.

Although we might not agree with all of its observations, it does, in its presentation and prescription, fully recognize the magnitude and the seriousness of the challenge before us.

We are, after all, being asked to answer whether this Organization, the oldest in the United Nations system, will meet the challenges of the next century, just as the ILO's founders in 1919 met the challenge of this one.

Our circumstances offer both great opportunity and the potential for a most serious failure, because this body and this plenary are confronting the most elemental issue of whether we are prepared to renew our mandate at this time in history. The alternative, in our view, is the risk of paralysis or, even worse, irrelevancy.

Let us recall that we are discussing here what we ought to do to assure the greater implementation of core labour standards, and there is nothing more basic to our responsibility. These standards are now well understood and well agreed upon. They include freedom of association, the right to collective bargaining, the prohibitions on forced labour and exploitative child labour, and the principle of non-discrimination in employment.

Let us also recall that the economics on this matter have been thoroughly debated in the OECD and in our own working party, and we have learned as much as the science of economics seems able to tell us. First, that trade liberalization and core labour standards are mutually reinforcing in terms of their economic benefits. Second, that the implementation of core labour standards will benefit all economies, no matter their level of development. These standards are simply not a question of what can be afforded; on the contrary we cannot afford not to implement them.

Indeed, let us further recall that, for the first time in a half-century of the GATT — now WTO — the world's trade ministers at Singapore recognized that implementing core labour standards is important to the objectives of the world's trade agenda and they committed themselves to support them. At the same time the declaration of our trade ministers should have finally put an end to the misstated allegations of protectionism and unfounded arguments about wage rates.

It is now before us to choose. We have debated the social dimension of globalization for some three years, and much has been made clearer. But it is now time to decide. Will we agree to negotiate on the basis of the Director-General's Report, as my Government thinks we ought to do, or will we find a new pretext for inaction? Our record is not altogether encouraging, as previously failed efforts in the ILO in 1964, 1970 and 1977 demonstrate.

In any event, the global economy will not wait for us. Of that my Government is sure, and we will continue to work with those nations that recognize it is neither wise nor practical to stifle discussion on labour standards in the WTO, or in other international organizations, such as the World Bank.

Moreover, we will give assistance and encouragement to those efforts in the private sector which seek to positively respond to the demand for higher levels of labour standards around the world. Be it codes of conduct, consumer or social labels, or other market-based initiatives, we will press forward. Indeed, in April, my President formally welcomed the agreement of a coalition of companies and unions on a code of conduct, monitoring principles, and a labelling approach for the apparel and footwear industries.

Now we at the International Labour Conference must decide on our approach. My Government's view is that we should move forward on the following three points:

First, we ought to commit ourselves through new means, such as a declaration, to core labour standards, regardless of whether we have ratified any particular instruments.

Second, we should hold ourselves accountable for our adherence to those fundamental rights through a new supervisory mechanism.

Third, we need to give concrete meaning to such accountability by establishing additional incentives for compliance and disincentives for determined and wilful non-compliance, through labelling and other such means.

I hope those who might be tempted or inclined to argue about the potential risks of such a course can also recognize the costs from not following such an approach are likely to be much larger — in terms of lost opportunities for greater economic growth, increased trade and investment, more and better jobs, and stronger social cohesion.

Let me make two final observations on elements in the Director-General's Report. We also agree that new reporting mechanisms might be useful. To that end, I am here to renew the proposal and offer of my Government that all member nations of the ILO be reviewed for their adherence to core labour standards, and that the United States would agree to go first.

Finally, let me say that we are in substantial agreement with the notion that the entire body of ILO Conventions must be thoroughly reviewed and, when appropriate and necessary, "recodified" to reflect contemporary realities.

We again congratulate the Director-General in offering us a vision that honours the legacy of the founders of this body, and for his wisdom in posing a course of action that can and ought to be the basis of consensus since it reflects our most basic universal values.

Original French: Mr. YAKOUBOU (Minister of Public Service, Labour and Administrative Reform, Benin) — Madam President, it is with pleasure that I associate myself with the deserved tribute paid to you by all preceding speakers on your election to the presidency of the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference.

I would like to extend to you, on behalf of the Government of the Republic of Benin, of the members of the delegation which I have the honour to lead at this session and on my own personal behalf, my warm congratulations to you and to the other distinguished Officers.

Thanks to your personal qualities, I am convinced that under your authoritative guidance the work of this session will be crowned with success.

Allow me to take this opportunity of expressing to the Director-General of the International Labour Office, on behalf of my Government, our gratitude for his tireless efforts on behalf of the Republic of Benin. May I also congratulate the Director-General and his staff on the high quality of the Report they have put before us which is devoted to the standard-setting work of the ILO.

I would like to express my satisfaction at the judicious choice of this subject, which will be the focus of our debate at this Conference. In these difficult economic and social times, the International Labour Organization must continue to demonstrate its institutional strength, its commitment to adapting its structures and methods to the challenges of world development.

It must remain firm and dynamic in so doing, in order not to be thrown off course by the series of crises in the world. I am convinced it will continue and strengthen its standard-setting work, whose impact on the social policies of all the world's countries no longer needs demonstrating. My deepest concern is to see the Organization continue its development effort as it has always done in the past, because the means at its disposal for convincing States and governments are a guarantee of social stability, not only for the developing countries, but also for the industrialized world.

To be delivered from poverty, to find more reliable means of subsistence, to find health, stable employment and better education, these are the aspirations of our African peoples. In the face of these social demands we must act promptly, because each day that passes brings us closer to the danger of a social explosion which threatens all our societies to one degree or another.

My Government is among those which believe that, if we are to meet this challenge, we must take certain steps. First, the International Labour Organization and its Members must continue their standard-setting activities in the light of the new economic challenges. We must intensify and harmonize our work with other international, regional and subregional organizations, in order to promote the world of work through social dialogue. Finally, we must continue the dialogue with the international financial institutions so that they can reorientate their financial policies and thus reduce their often disastrous social costs.

For the past few years, the social situation in my country has been characterized by instability and insecurity on the labour market, as well as by ever-rising levels of unemployment among young school-leavers and graduates. Given its limited financial resources, my country has no choice but to turn to the international community in helping to help it promote a policy of economic integration for its young school-leavers.

The ILO needs to strengthen its capacity to act in developing countries and refocus its work on a short and medium-term programme directed towards supporting national policies for tackling the problem of unemployment among young people and those hit by industrial restructuring.

In these difficult and uncertain times of globalization, trade deregulation and structural adjustment programmes, it would be desirable for the International Labour Office to make a special effort to help our countries carry out a consistent policy in the field of continuous vocational training, and strengthen the dialogue and partnership between the State, the trade unions and the employers in order to ensure more effective convergence of economic and social policies. These are the suggestions that seem to me worthy of interest and which I thought useful to contribute to our debates.

I hope that this 85th Session will strengthen the International Labour Organization, confirm its commitment to its principles and help it to achieve its objectives of peace, justice, freedom and social progress.

Mr. POTTER (Employers' delegate, United States) — As the Report of the Director-General shows, the ILO is at a crossroads in its history. Will the ILO continue down the road of seeking to regulate every labour market imperfection or perceived inequity by adopting more and more Conventions? As the low rate of ratification of recently adopted ILO Conventions demonstrates, this choice risks making the ILO less and less relevant, marginalizing its impact now and into the next century. As the recognized guardian of basic worker rights, will the ILO choose the road that reinforces its central role of the protector of core worker rights?

The continued proliferation of problematical Conventions is due in part to the method of selection. Once a topic gets on the Governing Body list for possible standard setting, it can remain on the list, seemingly for an eternity, until it is eventually selected. Selecting subjects for standard setting by a process of elimination is a road to irrelevancy. The question that needs to be asked before a standard is selected is whether the issue is ripe for international regulation or guidance, i.e. the labour market issue must be definable and there must be sufficient data on which to assess the dimensions of the problem, rather than relying solely on anecdotal evidence and worst-case scenarios.

Except for extraordinary circumstances, such as the 1998-99 discussion on child labour, the ILO should adopt a procedure whereby a general discussion must always be held first on an area of proposed standard setting for the purposes of determining whether an issue is ripe for international standard setting or revision, or whether standards of conduct, recommendations, guidelines or further research would be more appropriate. It would also establish a better basis for the initial questionnaire. Following the general discussion, the Governing Body would make an assessment as to whether standard setting is appropriate. To maintain quality, the two-discussion procedure should always be used in developing new standards. We believe that such an approach would improve the quality and relevance of ILO Conventions and Recommendations over the long term.

United States employers agree with the Director-General that "a Convention should deal with essentials; (...) it should not enter into too much administrative detail". This laudable goal can be defeated, however, by the tendency of the ILO's Committee of Experts to add implementation requirements not within the contemplation of the technical committee drafting the Convention. In keeping with the principle of subsidiarity, more needs to be left to the discretion of the ratifying country. At the same time, governments should be held accountable for their vote to adopt a Convention and their intention to ratify it.

The globalization of the world economy contributes to economic and employment growth and improved working conditions. United States employers are adamantly opposed to the social clause in the trading system to permit the application of coercive measures to enforce labour standards. In our view, the Director-General's scheme of giving a country a social label is the social clause in disguise and offers the prospect of making the ILO more irrelevant by leaving it to a third party — the consumer — to decide. Furthermore, the idea of monitoring and inspections of countries on the spot is unwieldy and would be unresponsive to addressing those workplace human rights situations that each of us as citizens of the world would consider to be outrageous regardless of whether a country has ratified the so-called core ILO Conventions. Bonded child labour, rampant discrimination, denial of any ability to exercise freedom of association, a persistent pattern of failing to enforce applicable labour and employment laws are the kinds of egregious circumstances that we believe should be encompassed in a solemn declaration of principles.

These principles would be separate from the details of the core Conventions or observations of the existing ILO supervisory bodies. They would be subject to a complaints procedure through the Governing Body, which would make the initial jurisdictional determination. This would be a parallel political track that would not supplant existing procedures. The central questions would be: is the country concerned in general compliance with the principles or is there a persistent pattern of non-compliance; does the country enforce the labour and employment laws that it has in place; and in the case of developing countries, is the country making progress to meet the principles?

In the view of United States employers, the ILO is at a crossroads in its history. We hope it makes the right choice for the sake of mankind. To paraphrase the American poet, Robert Frost, from the poem The road not taken:

Somewhere ages and ages hence:
Two roads to protecting worker rights diverged in the world and the ILO —
It took the one that promoted economic growth, jobs and basic worker rights,
And that has made all the difference.

Original Arabic: Mr. KHALIL (Minister of Social Affairs and Labour, Syrian Arab Republic) — On behalf of my own delegation and that of the other Arab countries, I would first of all like to express congratulations to Ms. Keltošová for the tremendous confidence the participants at the Conference have displayed in electing her as President of the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference and to wish her the very best of success in her work. We hope that the serious discussions to be held between the social partners will lead to decisions and recommendations which faithfully reflect the objectives of the ILO.

I would also like to reiterate the interest of the Syrian Arab Republic in maintaining its cooperation with the ILO and with its various bodies and committees. Our cooperation has always been sincere and constant because the activities of the Organization pertain to work and workers. Our cooperation is based on our policy which is inspired by the words of our President, Mr. Hafez al-Assad, to the effect that we glorify work and workers, we fight against exploitation and exploiters and we are expanding our possibilities in the field of labour in order to block the path of all exploiters and intruders in the world of labour.

At this point we should like to highlight the great efforts made by the Director-General and, indeed, comment on his Report to this session entitled The ILO, standard setting and globalization, which discusses the issue of the recognition of the fundamental rights of workers as a precondition for social progress, the issue relating to the choice of subjects for greater impact, and the issue of the choice of form of instruments and the content of standards.

We believe that the ILO has a very important role to play with respect to the elaboration and promotion of standards and we would therefore fully support the strengthening of the International Labour Standards Department of the Organization in order to enhance its effectiveness in the protection and application of the fundamental rights of workers. However, we do not agree with the protectionist approach which links trade with labour standards.

Furthermore, we are concerned by the absence of positive steps toward the broadening of the base of the use of Arabic in the ILO bodies. We would like to see more extensive use of Arabic in the documents, studies and publications concerning Arabic-speaking States at the tripartite level. We would also like to see further reinforcement of ILO structures in Arab countries to strengthen existing offices in Beirut, Cairo and Algiers and to supplement the work of the multidisciplinary teams, and encourage the continuation of the work of the Regional Arab Programme for Labour Administration in Tunis.

I would now like to comment on the Appendix to the Report presented by the Director-General on the observations made during a mission earlier this year to Palestine, the occupied Syrian Golan Heights and other occupied Arab territories. I wish to thank the participants in that mission as well as the Director-General for having raised the following points in the Appendix of the Report.

Following the formation of the new Israeli Government on 29 May 1996, a ministerial decision was taken to cancel restrictions on settlement development in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, lifting the previous government's partial freeze of settlement expansion (paragraph 10, page 4). While the general situation of occupation remains the same, in the two domains 1996 saw a worsening: the new style of complete cutoff through total or partial closure of the occupied territories, and the rapid increase in the number of new settlements and the massive roadworks programme under way to interconnect them with Israel and Jerusalem through by-pass roads (paragraph 12, page 5).

Arabs living in the occupied Syrian Golan Heights are experiencing difficulties in having their qualifications for high- paying jobs respected (paragraph 23, page 9). The representatives of the Director-General continue to receive reports of discrimination carried out against the Arab population in the spheres of agricultural production and exports, land and water resources, and conditions of employment. As regards the confiscation of land, it was increasing. This measure had the same economic consequences as reported in previous years (paragraph 24, page 10).

The unions and human rights NGOs have also expressed concern over the regulations published by the Israeli Employment Service's Department of Payments, which oppose the transfer of workers from one employer to another, and amount to the enslavement of the worker to the Israeli employer (paragraph 30, page 12).

The employment and income situation of workers of the occupied territories has steadily deteriorated since the signing of the Oslo Agreements in 1993 (paragraph 43, page 18).

While we appreciate the information contained in the Appendix to the Director-General's Report, we should also like to point out some of its negative aspects.

The Report describes the Palestinian reaction as "terrorist acts", while it describes the acts to which Palestinians are subjected as "acts of violence". In its observations made on the ground, the mission report should refrain from the use of expressions such as "the Syrian authorities claim ..." which implies uncertainty and doubt, and expressions such as "workers in the territories" instead of "workers in the occupied territories". The Appendix also contained the expression "controversial decision" in referring to General Assembly Resolution A/51/L.68 of 12 March 1997 which condemned the establishment of an Israeli settlement on Jabal Abu Ghenaim in occupied Arab Jerusalem, and it should have also referred to the two Security Council resolutions adopted in this regard.

There is need to bolster the project and programmes with the Palestinian Authority and we hope that these activities will provide benefits to both employers and workers in the occupied Syrian Golan Heights who face the same hardships as their Arab brothers in occupied Palestine.

Syria has done everything in its power to ensure the success of the Middle East Peace Process and has cooperated with sincerity and good faith in the establishment of peace in the entire region and to put an end to war and suffering. We hereby declare and reiterate our readiness to resume negotiations in pursuit of a new opportunity to secure progress in the peace process. However, the new Israeli Government continues to ignore the achievements of the peace talks which have lasted for more than five years and is trying to bring the situation back to square one. The Government is trying to distort the base of the peace process, which was used as the terms of reference in the Madrid Conference, in the implementation of United Nations resolutions and the land for peace principle. They are inventing new ground rules according to their wishes and expansionist policy, such as "security before peace", "peace for peace" and "negotiation without preconditions".

As President Hafez al-Assad has stated, Syria has chosen peace as a strategy and has always fought for just and global peace on the basis of international law and corresponding decisions and above all, the land for peace principle, global and just peace which restores rights to persons against whom violations have been perpetrated.

The whole world and its institutions and organizations recognize that the Arabs have done all they can to achieve a global and just peace. Israel has a long way to go, it must respect the Charter of the United Nations, human rights and international resolutions to return lands and rights to those who have been dispossessed of them and it should abandon its armament policy, abandon the threat and use of force, curb its territorial desires and end oppression and massacres.

Please allow me, in conclusion, to commend the resistance of the Arab people in the occupied Syrian Golan Heights and the south of Lebanon and in all other occupied Arab territories. Victory will always come to people who fight for their rights, their freedom and their liberty.

Original French: Mr. DIOP (Minister of Labour and Employment, Senegal) — I would like to extend to the President the warm congratulations of the Senegalese delegation which I have the honour to head at this session of the International Labour Conference.

I also extend these congratulations to the other Officers whose contribution will also be valuable in carrying out your important mission. I have no doubt that under your enlightened guidance the work of this session will achieve the success which the international community expects of it, and I would therefore assure you of the support and cooperation of my delegation in assuring the success of your work.

The examination of the challenges and the unprecedented opportunities which accompany changes in the international environment constitutes, for the ILO, both a priority task and an historic responsibility.

Even if the Director-General's Report is reassuring as to the ILO's resources and particularly as concerns its ability to react and to anticipate developments, that is why this 85th Session should culminate, among other things, in the clearest possible reaffirmation of our Organization's mandate, particularly as concerns its role in ensuring the most scrupulous respect for the Declaration of Philadelphia and the utmost loyalty to the lessons of its founding fathers.

Today we realize that the ILO is called upon to react to what is described as a turning-point in the development of the world economy with the conclusion of the agreements which emerge from the Uruguay Round and the creation of the World Trade Organization. It is therefore most timely that the ILO should reaffirm its principles and its rules and should give fresh impetus to their application, in view of the issues and the unprecedented possibilities now open to the international community.

The liberalization of trade and the globalization of the economy must bring the prosperity and peace they seem to promise to all States, large and small, rich and poor.

In this regard, we trust that the social label will not be a pretext for rejecting the products of the southern countries because, in our view, the real issue today is to rethink the dynamics of international relations in such a way as to end the impoverishment of the southern countries; to fight poverty through the creation of wealth, to make solidarity a requirement of international cooperation, in such a way as to support the efforts of developing countries fully to exercise all their economic, social and cultural rights. This is the only fight worth fighting in our time and those too are the new responsibilities which must inspire the work of all institutions and particularly those of the ILO, an Organization whose powers, technical competence and tripartite structure are designed to facilitate a broad convergence of views.

It is to this end, and for these reasons that Senegal attending the first Ministerial Conference of the WTO in Singapore last December forcefully urged that the respect for labour standards was the business of the ILO.

Today it is important to recall that in many of our countries, although everything is being done to combat possible covert attacks on labour standards, the difficulties inherent in underdevelopment, poverty, hunger and illiteracy very often undermine the efforts these countries are making.

It is against this background that we should view the pertinent problem of indebtedness. For over a decade now, debt has been one of our countries' major concerns.

The growing marginalization of developing countries, in general, and of the African countries, in particular, is in large part due to their problems of indebtedness.

That is why Senegal, like many African countries, I have no doubt, supports the initiative of the ILO's Director-General in looking towards a more sustained collaboration with the Bretton Woods institutions through a partnership for strengthening the social dimension of structural adjustment which would take account of all the problems facing our countries in their fight against underdevelopment.

In his Report, the Director-General rightly poses the two essential and indissociable preconditions which must be met if social progress and the economic progress expected of trade liberalization and globalization are to be achieved.

"The first condition", he says, "is of a static nature: the universal recognition of certain basic rights which should allow the social partners to claim their legitimate share in the development resulting from globalization.

The second condition is of a dynamic nature: it requires the setting up of an appropriate institutional framework to encourage States to use any benefits they might reap from globalization for achieving social progress."

I remain convinced that in our various countries the social partners are already won over to the idea that they must pursue deliberate and concerted policies to ensure that these two conditions are met.

The great merit of the two conditions is to set forth clearly that globalization is a fragile process and, if it is to be legitimate, must be based on the standard-setting work of our Organization.

My delegation is among those who believe that in the present context where countries at different levels of development, countries with very different standards of living and of environment are brought into direct contact, some ILO Conventions are still pertinent and effective. This is particularly true of the Convention on fundamental freedoms and the Conventions that seek to promote employment policy. Senegal, for its part, has drawn heavily on those instruments in setting up its own national employment policy.

I would therefore like to conclude by recalling that the aim of the fundamental standards established by our Organization remains the same. These are the rights of men and women, that is, the right to protection, conciliation and social justice.

Our role is clearly to set forth the meaning and the obligations that derive from them in order to ensure the well-being and the social progress of our peoples.

Original Spanish: Mr. ALBURQUERQUE (Secretary of State for Labour, Dominican Republic) — On behalf of the Government of the Dominican Republic and on my own behalf, I wish to warmly congratulate the Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, for his timely and appropriate decision to choose for his annual Report the subject The ILO, standard setting and globalization.

We all know that over these past several years serious debate has arisen between those who favour the existence of a social clause in free trade agreements because they consider it useful and effective in avoiding social dumping and those who denounce and criticize the clause as an instrument for protectionism and for domination on the part of highly industrialized States.

It would seem that the debate had been closed with the Ministerial Declaration at the WTO Meeting in Singapore, indicating that the ILO is the body wherein to consider all matters relating to the fundamental rights of workers. These rights cannot be overlooked in the framework of globalization, because if due account is not taken, this would encourage development at the margin of social justice and would deprive wage-earners of the instruments necessary to claim their legitimate share of the economic growth which is generated by trade liberalization.

How can the ILO meet this formidable challenge in respect of certain human rights in the world of work in a globalized economy? The reply offered by the Director-General in his annual Report proposes that member States commit themselves and undertake obligations to respect specific and irreducible core standards: freedom of association, collective bargaining, the prohibition of forced labour, including the struggle against child labour, minimum age for admission to work, equality of remuneration and non-discrimination. As one can easily appreciate, the Director-General's proposal is limited to those rights which should be universally recognized, sidelining quite clearly the pretention of certain persons who wish to deny developing countries the advantages that they might derive from their lower wages and social costs.

The Government of the Dominican Republic shares the Director-General's views and supports his plan. Our Government has at all times maintained its unshakable will to promote change and to become part of the globalization process whilst ensuring due respect and guarantees for the core rights of those who extend a service in return for a wage. In this way, it is appropriate to indicate that my country is signatory to six of the above-mentioned Conventions. It is only the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) that has not been ratified, although we are setting up a tripartite workshop to analyse its particular implications as a prior step to possible ratification.

Mere ratification of the core Conventions or a solemn declaration of respect for these Conventions, though necessary and desirable, is not a sufficient guarantee to actively foster social progress. It is essential to put in motion at the same time means which will permit objective follow-up on the real and effective application of these fundamental principles, so that in this way both national and international public opinion will be able to appreciate the efforts made by each State "to turn the economic benefits resulting from the liberalization of trade to good account in terms of social progress".

The ILO is the recognized body for setting up this supervisory machinery, which by no means implied a degree of reduction of sovereignty of each State which when acceding to the ILO voluntarily accepts the Constitution and its basic principles, such as firm commitments to strive for social progress. Machinery such as the Committee on the Application of Standards and the Committee on Freedom of Association have been effective in the fight to ensure the respect for international standards, and that is why governments and non-governmental actors should examine seriously and thoroughly the possibility to foster activities that will give recognition that we are acting in conformity with a series of fundamental principles and rights, either through the submission of a periodic report and a tripartite debate within the ILO or by the granting of a social label of a general nature, not limited to export processing zones, which would be awarded by the ILO, and not by a specific country or group of countries, so long as it falls within the voluntary framework of an international labour Convention.

The Government of the Dominican Republic firmly backs what is said in the Director-General's Report to the effect that comparative advantages related to a certain level of remuneration or social protection is legitimate to the extent that it is a factor for economic growth, but at the same time it reaffirms its unstinting will to combine its eagerness for sustainable development with the respect of fundamental human rights in the labour sphere.

To this end the Government of the Dominican Republic indicates this very clearly and echoes what the Director-General has said, that "introducing a social conditionality would be nonsense because the opening up of markets constitutes to a great extent a kind of precondition to social progress, it would be just as inconsistent to claim that all partners, in the name of social progress, should have access to all markets without having to give account to anyone on their practices in this field".

Mr. SNIJDERS (Minister of Labour, Suriname) — Madam President, it is a great pleasure to congratulate you on behalf of the people and the Government of the Republic of Suriname on your election as President of the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference. We are convinced that the deliberations which will be held under your expert guidance will pass off successfully.

In his Report entitled The ILO, standard setting and globalization the Director-General has raised a subject that proves that this institution is aware of a number of social changes taking place in today's world. The liberalization of international trade and the globalization of the economy connected with this liberalization require great efforts from businesses but even more from workers to adjust to the changing circumstances.

In particular, the interests of the workers and their rights are in danger of being undermined. We therefore think that the ILO made the right decision to address this issue, which is also in accordance with its aims.

There is no doubt that important economic questions such as employment, economic growth and development as a consequence of the globalization of the world economy have caused great changes worldwide.

Launching action models is a good approach of the ILO, since changes which may be desired take place slowly.

The sooner the developments mentioned in the Director-General's Report are observed the earlier preparations for adjustment can be made and the necessary measures can be taken.

For that matter, as circumstances in the world economy are changing, the ILO's role with regard to determining labour standards should change as well. The same concerns the structures, the organs and the mechanism which hereby fulfil a part.

My country is also confronted with the consequences of liberalization of trade and globalization of the economy. In this connection the Government of Suriname has taken a number of policy measures which should make sure that the rights and claims of workers in the new situation that accompanies liberalization of trade will not be repressed.

We also need to take care that the conditions under which employers have to produce do not change in such a negative way that productivity suffers. Within this field of tension and power it must be clear to both the workers and the employers that quality improvement of production is essential.

Within the framework of possible conditions suggested by the Director-General in his Report to enable the working class to enjoy the fruits of globalization and their rightful claims thereon, it has been proposed that some Conventions are ratified which will have to be the basis of the claims, rights and working conditions of workers and other relevant groups.

In this connection, I can inform you that because of the fact that the Government of my country attaches fundamental importance to equitable income distribution and also on the basis of our Constitution, those Conventions form the foundation of the labour system in the Republic of Suriname.

By virtue of the afore-stated, my country shall contribute to the attainment of the goals of the ILO as described in the Director-General's Report. There is no way back.

The development and progress of the workers, the creation of conditions to bring about sustainable development, as well as my Government's conviction that an equitable income distribution, socially and economically, will be an incentive to workers' dedication, give us the confidence that the ILO will give further form and content to the establishment of a just world community.

Original Spanish: Mr. RIVADENEYRA ORCES (Minister of Labour and Human Resources, Ecuador) — Allow me to greet the President, and through her all the delegates at this Conference, on behalf of the democratic Government of the Republic of Ecuador and express the wishes of our President, Fabián Alarcón Ribera for closer links between our country and this international organization and its structure, carrying out its principles which light the ever- wider path of labour relations, emphasizing that, on this basis, employers, workers and the Government in my country have signed an agreement entitled "Protocol for a Social Covenant". It is intended, through agreement and consensus, to come up with solutions to serious and long-standing institutional problems. Five working parties have been set up to deal with the following subjects: wage policy, employment policy, revision of social security, vocational training of workers and modernization of labour relations. All of this is intended to improve the conditions for participation in globalization on favourable terms for our country, as well as to make social justice a reality in accordance with the demands of people.

In Ecuador, under the present Government in particular, we consider it necessary to ensure co-participation and co-responsibility in applying the principles and Conventions of the ILO to which my country has adhered, and we clearly state that we will work hard to seek solutions in order to ensure that standards and Conventions are applied in full.

Furthermore, my Government supports and agrees with what was said in the Director-General's Report regarding the universal guarantee of workers' fundamental rights, and in particular, continuing those efforts initiated in the Governing Body, the drafting of a solemn declaration which would recapitulate the fundamental principles of the Organization and set up an effective and inexpensive monitoring system.

We also accept the Director-General's judgement that we member States are committed to actively promoting social progress in all its aspects at this time of globalization of the economy and services. We therefore share the initiative of the Director-General suggesting that a periodical report on social progress in the world be prepared to be followed by a tripartite debate which would enable an objective assessment to be made of the efforts made by each country to this end, which should translate into social progress the economic progress resulting from trade liberalization.

I cannot fail to explain to this Conference the events that have recently occurred in my country. Compelled by prevailing circumstances and prompted by the will of the people, the National Congress constitutionally removed the President from office, replacing him with the Speaker of Congress on 11 February last, and determined his term of office through a constitutional transitional government. This is without precedent in our history: a massive demonstration of the population in the streets without loss of human life or damage to private property. This social and legal event took the form of a referendum on 25 May last, in which the people expressed virtually unanimous support for the decision taken by Congress, and some 70 per cent declared themselves in favour of the constitutional Government of Fabián Alarcón Ribera. By happy coincidence this event is consistent with the ideas put forward by the Director-General in Chapter I, section B, of his Report. I am bringing this historic event to the attention of this distinguished international forum so that our efforts to ensure national dignity will be seen objectively and in a positive light at the international level, since we are believers in peaceful coexistence and the democratic life of peoples.

Allow me once again to pay my highest respects to the President and assure her of the willingness of the Government of the Republic of Ecuador, which I have the honour to represent, to cooperate openly with the ILO.

Mr. FISHER (Government delegate, Australia) — Thank you Madam President. On behalf of the Australian Government, I congratulate you on your election as President of this Conference. I also welcome the opportunity to comment on the Director-General's timely and relevant Report.

At the outset, Australia reiterates its satisfaction with the Singapore Declaration. We agree fully that the ILO is the competent body to set and deal with core labour standards. The WTO invitation to address international core labour standards is consistent with the views expressed at the Copenhagen Social Summit. The ILO must respond quickly and appropriately. The Director-General's Report contains some useful proposals in this regard.

Australia in principle gives its support to the development of a declaration of principles that would define core, or fundamental, international labour standards. We cannot, however, provide unqualified support until its details have been settled.

In this way the ILO can declare the principles of labour rights and be seen by the international community to be taking the lead. Already there is pressure in other forums for action, and the ILO must not lose the initiative. Australia believes that the declaration should not refer to specific ILO Conventions. Rather it should describe the relevant principles to which all ILO member States should consider themselves bound, whether or not they have ratified the relevant ILO Convention. We recognize that it will not be an easy task to codify the principles of the core labour standards, but it should not be an impossible one.

The Director-General has not addressed how the declaration should be implemented. Australia's view is that it would be preferable not to establish new special machinery. Rather the mandate of the Committee of Experts should be expanded to enable it to supervise the application of the core principles concerning forced and child labour and non-discrimination. Freedom of association principles would continue to be supervised by the Freedom of Association Committee.

Australia has ratified six of the seven relevant Conventions and complies with the principles of the seventh, Convention No. 138 concerning minimum age for employment. For technical reasons, Australia cannot ratify that Convention, which we expect will be overtaken by the foreshadowed Convention on exploitative child labour.

We welcome the ILO's increased focus on core labour standards. We encourage the Director-General to continue to promote the implementation and ratification of the relevant Conventions and to seek article 19 reports from those countries that have not ratified them.

Australia believes that enhanced ILO supervision of the implementation of the core standards will have a positive impact on human rights. As for the longer term suggestions in the Director-General's Report, Australia was not convinced that the social labelling proposal would contribute significantly to the observance of core labour standards. Such a scheme would have to be heavily promoted, with independent monitoring. Even then there would be no guarantee of success, because it would depend on consumer confidence in the scheme and, most significantly, consumer conscience. Australia is not convinced that the expense and effort would have a significant result. We would prefer that the energies of the ILO remain focused on the main objective of promoting the application of core standards by more traditional means.

Turning to Part II of the Report, Australia believes that the pace of new standard setting should slow down. The current process means that three technical items must be selected for every Conference agenda. This is too many. The focus should be on items which update or replace existing standards. If the international labour code is to command respect, it must be up-to-date and have universal relevance, thus the revision or termination of outdated and irrelevant Conventions is important.

The constitutional amendment to permit the abrogation of outdated Conventions is a step in the right direction. It must be followed up with the rigorous identification and abrogation of outdated Conventions. We should not be fainthearted, keeping older Conventions on the books simply because elements of them might still be relevant to a few countries. Conventions should have universal application and relevance.

The relatively poor ratification record of the so-called "modern" Conventions should be a matter of concern for all ILO Members. Why are we adopting so many Conventions which are then not ratified? This does little for the credibility of the ILO's labour code. Australia supports the Director-General's suggestions in relation to Recommendations, that more consideration be given to the adoption of autonomous Recommendations.

The Director-General's comments on the need for a more systematic follow-up and evaluation of instruments are also relevant. Australia supports the widening of the scope of General Surveys to include a more critical analysis of the instruments themselves. We suggest that a new standing Conference committee be established to evaluate instruments. However, to avoid increasing the workload of the Conference, this new committee should replace one of the three standard-setting committees.

Turning to a final point, Australia considers that an unofficial codification of standards requires stronger justification. It is difficult to see what real benefit would follow.

In conclusion, I reiterate Australia's in principle support for a declaration of principles and support for the proposed constitutional change. At the same time, Australia sees this as part of the continuing process of modernizing the ILO to meet the challenges of the next century. There remains much to be done.

Original French: Mr. PENDY-BOUYIKI (Minister of State for Labour, Employment and Vocational Training, Gabon) — Speaking on both a personal note and on behalf of the Gabonese delegation, I should like to extend my congratulations to the President and, in doing so, I would like to join the previous speakers and congratulate her on her election as President of our Conference. Given the way in which the proceedings have been guided so far, I am positive that they will be a success. Clearly, this session has a very key role to play because the Conference is called upon to examine and adopt the ILO budget for the millennium 1998-99.

Given the substance of the many items on our agenda, given the valuable contribution of the Report of the Director-General of the ILO, I would simply like to make a few comments on the Report, entitled The ILO, standard setting and globalization.

The ILO international labour standards and their monitoring system remain, as we know, an essential instrument for the promotion of democracy and human rights worldwide. Economic growth and the liberalization of trade are praiseworthy because they constitute the hope of stimulating competition for developing countries.

If we accept globalization, at the same time we must reinforce our efforts to apply ILO standards. To meet this challenge, our Organization itself must be able to seek effectiveness in the application of existing instruments as has been done, and with success indeed, with regard to freedom of association, thanks to the dynamism of the committee dealing with that subject.

The ILO, through simplified procedures, must also be able to amend or repeal instruments which have become obsolete and ineffective. In order to do so we believe that the Conference should adopt the amendment to article 19 of the Constitution, as submitted by the Governing Body.

The Director-General's Report stresses the proliferation of subjects or a number of variations on the same subject. The same subject, therefore, may be dealt with on both a sectoral and general level. We support the Director-General's proposal, in this regard, to resume the work of codification which could lead to the elaboration of an international labour code and this would be a much more practical working tool.

Globalization makes the standard-setting process of the ILO, the promotion of the fundamental rights and the will of States to ratify ILO Conventions even more complex. My Government endorses the campaign of ratification adopted by the ILO since 1995 and we should also ensure that a number of other essential rights relating inter alia to health and safety in the workplace are applied.

A number of countries have concerns of an essentially economic nature and, above all, they wish to reinforce their competitiveness in the international arena. This is why work is becoming dehumanized and social justice is on the wane. In order to be able to gauge the efforts of our Organization in terms of social progress the standard-setting work of the ILO must be truly transposed to the national level.

In Gabon, we are conscious of the constitutional primacy of law as a pledge of social justice, and we reconfirm our commitment to ILO ideals. This is why one of the main areas of progress for us in recent years will have been the adoption of our new Labour Code. Since 1994 our Government has been reforming and overhauling the labour market and, institutionally speaking, we now have a national office for employment and vocational integration and reintegration financed by the state budget. We would like to reinforce our capacity to monitor the labour market, collect statistics and create jobs. We intend to give new momentum to labour administration in one of its main tasks, monitoring the application of social legislation, which has become very complex in the wake of deregulation, restructuring and globalization.

The labour administration must also be given the effective ways and means to reach a large number of social partners in the informal sector often outside the purview of labour legislation. We welcome the relevance of an overall study on Convention No. 150 and Recommendation No. 158 on labour administration. This study, as well as the assistance of the multidisciplinary team in our subregion will in fact be of tremendous assistance to us.

Finally, our action can only be beneficial if together we look for sustainable solutions to alleviate poverty and to prevent social disorganization so that these will not persist in developing countries and especially in the sub-Saharan region of Africa.

Original Russian: Mr. LUBLIN (First Deputy Minister of Labour and Social Development, Russian Federation) — Allow me to join all those who have congratulated the President on her election to this high office, and to wish her all possible success in guiding the work of this 85th Session of the International Labour Conference.

This session will have to determine what kind of International Labour Organization will approach the end of this century. It will have to set the priorities for the work of our Organization, bearing in mind the needs of the ILO's member States.

One of these priorities, in our opinion, should be to improve the standard-setting activity of the Organization. In this connection, the Report of the Director-General, which contains proposals for tackling the problems now facing the Organization, represents a good basis for an exchange of views. Despite the abundance of points open for discussion, the Director-General is certainly right about the main thing. The ILO has — and must take advantage of — the opportunity, through its standard-setting activities, to fulfil the lofty responsibility for social progress which it is expected to assume in the world of the twenty-first century.

The Ministerial Conference of the World Trade Organization in Singapore, the World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen, and the April 1996 meeting in Lille reaffirmed the ILO's leading role in ensuring social justice in conditions of economic globalization. The economic interdependence which results from exchanges of goods, services and capital has indeed pointed out the need for all the member States of the ILO to observe fundamental rights in the social and labour sphere.

I would like to remind you that my country has ratified six of the seven core Conventions, and is studying the possibility of acceding to Convention No. 105 on the abolition of forced labour.

In principle we support the Director-General's proposal that the ILO should draw up a document in the form of a declaration or charter on observance by member States of the fundamental rights in the social and labour sphere. At the same time, for the purpose of further work on this question, it is important even in the preliminary stage for us to know how and to what extent these fundamental rights will be enshrined in such a document, and what sort of supervisory machinery is envisaged.

For many countries with transitional economies, including the Russian Federation, support for such a step has particular implications.

Globalization, as the Director-General notes in his Report, has necessitated reform in a number of countries.

In the Russian Federation, as is natural in such situations, the restructuring of our economy has squeezed the resources available for providing the necessary social safeguards. Our Government thus must make difficult choices among the priorities for social policy.

The Government of the Russian Federation, which is determined to observe the key social and labour rights while taking measures to ensure financial stability, thus maintains a dialogue with the social partners.

This dialogue is aimed at ensuring, at a time of economic reform, that a balance is struck in the social sphere, and at creating a social infrastructure appropriate to the market economy.

However, it should be remembered that many of the Russian Federation's social safeguards still bear the imprint of the previous, centrally controlled economy. For some of the population they do not make economic sense, and for those who are in need because of financial cutbacks they do not provide the necessary support.

The need to reform the system is an obvious consequence of globalization, and one which the Director-General points out may make it more difficult for the Members to apply ILO standards. This contradiction is precisely what I was referring to when I mentioned the particular implications for countries with transitional economies.

It is significant that the Director-General notes that the ILO must not stand on the sideline as a trend develops whereby the social effects of globalization are accompanied by increasing privatization in the social sphere, with so-called economic expediency as the sole guarantee of future prosperity.

Clearly, the ILO needs to assist those member States, particularly those with transitional economies, which are implementing programmes involving the participation of the international financial institutions. The ILO should carry out a careful analysis and forecast how these trends will develop.

As regards the elaboration of new Conventions and Recommendations, there is a need to select the subjects of such standards more carefully in the future. In this connection, we regard as rational the Director-General's idea of drawing on the experience of the ILO's regional offices and the multidisciplinary teams, taking into consideration the views of the social partners. We also think the idea of creating a portfolio of proposals on standard setting is a good initiative. It is important here that there should be more stringent criteria for the selection of subjects of future instruments. The proposal to carry out an informal classification of ILO standards and draw up criteria with which to decide whether standards have become obsolete is also worthy of support. This could be done by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, for example.

This year will be a special one for the Russian Federation's participation in the ILO, as together with the International Labour Office, we are working hard to set up a multidisciplinary team in Moscow. The ILO's expert assistance in tackling social problems in countries with transitional economies is now becoming politically very important, and can indeed make a contribution to solving these problems not only in the Russian Federation but in most of the countries of the CIS.

In conclusion, allow me once again to wish all the participants in this Conference a successful and fruitful session.

Original Portuguese: Mr. PAIVA (Minister of Labour, Brazil) — Globalization and economic integration have affected the level and composition of employment and earnings, the social organization of labour in production and the quality of life of workers. These economic transformations at both the global and local levels have generated a need to change the institutional environment that rules the working of labour markets and the system of industrial relations.

The growing liberalization of trade gives rise to a concern that the workers should benefit from this process and that the goods exchanged through trade should be produced in accordance with the core international labour standards set by the International Labour Organization. The Report of the Director-General addresses the theme of standard setting by the Organization in a context of globalization and economic integration. This issue is of great concern to my Government, and it is the subject of the speech I am delivering at this time.

We think that the welfare of workers should be considered as fundamental in the process of economic integration and trade liberalization in order to ensure that economic prosperity and social progress proceed side by side. Globalization should benefit all, including the workers. Therefore, we must establish principles and mechanisms which guarantee that globalization encompasses a process of social integration.

The Brazilian Government considers the basic rights of workers as part of its human rights policy. For us, it is a basic principle that the recognition of workers' fundamental rights is an essential condition for social progress. We thus pledge full respect for the core ILO Conventions, the prohibition of forced and child labour, freedom of association, the right to organize and bargain collectively, and the principle of non-discrimination. We are dealing with these issues through concerted government actions, in partnership with civil society. We are committed to eradicating all intolerable forms of the exploitation of child labour. To this end, we have created a task force to deal specifically with these questions. The Ministry of Labour coordinates action in the field of the eradication of child labour and has signed a technical cooperation agreement for these activities with the ILO. Our objective is to ratify Convention No. 138 which is now undergoing the final phase of consideration and assessment in our Parliament.

We also believe workers' rights must be defended by fighting against any form of labour market discrimination, pursuant to Convention No. 111. With the aim of providing new policy recommendations on this matter, the Ministry of Labour coordinates a group made up of members of government and of civil society. We are also implementing a technical cooperation programme with the ILO in order to design and implement anti-discrimination policies.

We are carrying out labour reform. The backbone of the reform is the adoption of plurality in union representation, broadening freedom of association and changing the ways labour unions are funded. The executive branch intends to send to the Parliament a proposed constitutional amendment that will permit us to sign Convention No. 87. We are also promoting changes in our ordinary labour legislation so as to broaden the scope of collective bargaining and to make it the core of our system of industrial relations. Collective bargaining is already a reality in Brazil.

Our actions are in keeping with the core ILO Conventions and are being carried out in partnership with workers, employers and civil society at large.

Furthermore, the Government considers that the workers must have a political voice in the process of economic integration. Their needs and demands should be communicated to governments and businesses that are engaged in the creation of new economic blocs. They have thus been given an active role in Working Group 10 of MERCOSUR. We have also given full support to the creation of a labour forum in the framework of the American Free Trade Area (AFTA).

We fully agree with the content of paragraph 4 of the Singapore Ministerial Declaration, which places the issue of labour standards within the scope and responsibilities of the ILO. The ILO should search for the means to freely promote respect for these standards. The Government shares the concerns voiced by the Director-General in his Report to the Conference. We must seek those principles and mechanisms conceived in the context of the existing powers of the ILO, and give the Organization a more vigorous approach to the implementation of and respect for basic Conventions, as was requested by the World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen and the WTO Ministerial Conference in Singapore. We believe that the ILO should endeavour to encourage countries directly to implement basic labour standards by means of a system of accompanying measures and mutual assistance. A Recommendation accompanied by a follow-up procedure such as a report on the social progress of the world (as suggested in Part II of the Director-General's Report) might be appropriate tools to this end.

Notwithstanding our concern for implementing and respecting labour standards, the Brazilian Government has strong reservations as regards the creation of a "social label". We would rather allow this issue to ripen through further discussions so that we can all become fully aware of its implications.

We wish, however, to make it clear that we consider the implementation and adoption of core labour standards an issue that deserves attention not only by governments and international organizations such as the ILO, but also by civil society at large, including NGOs. In Brazil many of the Government's actions involve partners in civil society and are carried out through negotiations with the relevant social partners.

Lastly, we think that the ILO should focus its standard-setting role on the implementation of the core Conventions. It should also, as the Director-General recommends, be more rational and show more restraint in setting other standards.

Just as we are deeply concerned about the possibility in any international forum of disguised protectionism being established if there is a link between labour standards and trade sanctions, we also feel strongly that these standards should be promoted and valued as part of universal human rights, in conformity with the principles of the social policy of the Brazilian Government.

Original French: Mr. GOMINA-PAMPALI (Acting Minister of Public Service, Labour and Vocational Training, Central African Republic) — On behalf of my delegation, and speaking on a personal note, I should like to echo the previous speakers and congratulate you, Madam President, on your election to the presidency of the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference, and I wish you all the very best in this noble and honourable task.

I would also like to congratulate the Vice-Presidents, whose assistance is extremely precious, in the accomplishment of their very important tasks.

I would also like to extend my congratulations to Mr. Michel Hansenne, Director-General of the ILO and, through him, all the ILO staff for their sustained efforts in favour of international cooperation and the implementation of our Organization's action programmes.

Once again I reconfirm the confidence and the hope that my country places in the ILO and our full support for the objectives it pursues.

The Report of the Director-General of the ILO concerns standard setting this year. In the opinion of the Government of the Central African Republic, The ILO, standard setting and globalization is of specific interest because all the questions raised in our debates constitute, in the present context, one of the major concerns of all the constituents of the ILO in general and of the Central African Republic in particular.

Under the combined effects of globalization and liberalization of trade, the international community, if it is not vigilant will, in the short term, risk being a helpless bystander to a profound transformation of the labour world, and there may be social explosions because in their programmes for the future a number of institutions will give precedence, in the name of absolute growth, to economic development rather than social development.

The gulf of inequality between countries, and within countries between people, shall widen and deepen because the more wealth and prosperity are concentrated in one part of the planet or society, the more poverty and crises grow at the other end.

This is why the liberalization of international trade should not be allowed to worsen inequalities. Now, it must rather continue to remove customs and tariff barriers in trade between States. This is one of the basic resources for social progress. At the same time, as the world becomes a global village characterized by interdependence amongst States, we must ensure a parallelism between the economic progress stemming from trade liberalization and social progress.

The ILO, for its part, must design new standards to govern this new framework in this movement. The universal guarantee of the fundamental rights of people at work which is a condition of the participation of the workers in the profits of globalization is something very close to my Government's heart. In fact, the deep significance of these rights has been enshrined in the preamble to the Constitution of the Central African Republic, dated 14 January 1995, which guarantees the respect for fundamental human rights in all their forms.

Committed to the key principles of liberal, pluralist and participatory democracy, which has guided our political regime since 1993, the Central African State has understood that development, an obsessive myth of modern times, is, basically, first of all, a matter for humankind, and this is why we have set up a ministry responsible for human rights. This conviction means that we fully support the two axes of thought of the Director-General in his excellent Report. The liberalization of international trade in the context of globalization should not have a negative impact on the fundamental rights of workers.

Finally, before closing my speech, I would like to thank Mr. Michel Hansenne, the Director-General of the ILO, for all the attention and assistance afforded to my country, especially reinforcing the technical skills of the labour administration of the Central African Republic, of which I am in charge.

We are very attached to the ILO's work at a time of turmoil and social and political tension in my country which has led to a quasi-breakdown of society and an unprecedented destruction of the economic tissue because the political and military events of 1996 have deeply weakened our economic structures and led to insecurity. National solidarity may be called into question if our national efforts towards recovery are not supported by the international community.

I should also like to avail myself of this opportunity to launch an appeal to the international community to support and extend the action of the ILO to help to support the efforts of our people and the authorities in my country to get out of this crisis which, in the long term, may end up as one further human disaster.

The combination of these contributions could enhance the functioning of our labour administration and could help us meet the priority objectives that we have indicated in the social sphere. Finally, I would like to extend my greetings and thank the population of Switzerland, especially those in the Canton of Geneva for their hospitality in this country which is the meeting point between all the men and women who fight and work for the promotion of social justice worldwide, which is the main aim of this august and venerable Organization. Once again, thank you for having given me the floor so that my country's voice can be heard.

Original Spanish: Mr. DAER (Workers' delegate, Argentina) — The General Confederation of Labour of the Argentine Republic has participated with great interest in the discussion of the matters on the agenda of this 85th Session of the International Labour Conference.

In the face of the challenges presented by the globalization of the economy, and the interdependence and globalization of phenomena resulting from them, we consider the ILO to be an essential tool to build a more just and equitable society and to strengthen world peace.

It is for this reason that I wish to congratulate the Director-General for his Report and, in particular, matters relating to compliance with core Conventions and the corresponding commitment which all Members take up in respect of basic rights as well as ensuring their respect and control by all using the very innovative mechanisms proposed in the Report.

For these reasons, it is useful, within the framework of this august assembly, to concentrate our efforts on giving thought to these proposals, which we must urgently strengthen in order to mitigate the effect of globalization on our peoples, in particular, in those economies which are subject to very strong external financial conditionalities.

The democratization of national and supranational decision-taking bodies, the strengthening of the social dimension in economic development and the revitalization of tripartite dialogue are the best contributions which this generation can achieve in order to build a new social contract, a task which must not be delayed.

While many voices are still complaining that our governments are moving backwards in terms of labour legislation and social security, under the pretext of modernization, it is the very model which they helped to promoted that is having the most negative effect.

Neo-liberal policies, the retreat of the State, the increase in social conflict resulting from unemployment, the unjust distribution of wealth and the lack of opportunities are definitive proof of the perverse nature of an irrational and savage market.

We must ensure that the State reassumes a more active and energetic role, using its sovereign power without conditionalities based upon the requirements of the market and on economic flows. This State must guarantee a just reallocation of resources, equitable administration of social opportunities and balance in capital-labour relations.

The change has already started in this globalized world. Economic fundamentalism has failed. Today the time has come for social equilibrium.

Argentine workers have accepted the challenge of transformation of the country, but we do not accept that it be built on the basis of unscrupulous political and economic interests which endeavour to impose ultra-liberal ideals by eliminating entrepreneurial risk, reduction of wages, elimination of institutions and mechanisms created to protect individual workers and the workers in their collective organizations, thus opening the road to hyper-concentration, maximization of profits, and the installation of structural poverty and social exclusion.

The General Confederation of Labour favours democratic construction through social dialogue. Collective bargaining, freedom of association, representation of the workers through their trade unions, solidarity and participation in the design of social policies, are for us the road which will permit us to fight against unemployment and exclusion.

On these bases, and after great efforts, we have entered into a declaration of agreement with the Government on 9 May. The employers' reply was quick in coming. They are using all their efforts to hinder this accord. The Government now has to take the floor if it really does believe in progress and social equilibrium, as well as in the respect for basic rights of workers and their representative organizations.

The ILO has to affirm, without any doubt, that competition cannot be based on ignorance or watering down of core social rights. The elimination of trade unions, the weakening of the collective bargaining system, the removal of protection from stable employment, cannot be used as sources of competitive advantage. It is therefore urgent to adopt effective international measures to rein in this offensive against those principles and values which gave rise to this Organization and gave it legitimacy.

We come with all the force of history and of the difficulties we are encountering at present, in order to support a more active and effective role for the ILO in defending the basic rights of workers. Let us not forget today that fighting against unemployment, encouraging social integration and avoiding the violation of labour and social standards are the best and only ways to strengthen democracy, the rule of law, and to guarantee peace and welfare for our peoples.

Mr. KINYONDO (Minister for Labour and Youth Development, United Republic of Tanzania) — Madam President, on behalf of myself and the Tanzanian delegation may I take this opportunity to congratulate you on your accession to the high office of President of the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference, which you deserve 100 per cent by your excellence in mastering it.

I congratulate the Director-General for his topical and analytical Report. Indeed globalization has ushered in a host of new stakeholders other than the traditional social partners we are accustomed to. These new stakeholders have their own interests and are committed to achieving their objectives, some of which are oblivious to the effects they will have on other stakeholders' interests. Globalization has opened up the doors of liberalization of manufacturing and international trade which, according to the Singapore World Trade Organization Conference, has created more better-paid jobs in many countries. Unfortunately, this remains to be seen in many developing countries, which continue to bear witness to raising wage inequalities, unemployment, job discrimination, alienation of qualified native management, declining living standards and increasing poverty.

In the process of globalization, some countries have emerged as winners where others have been relegated to the position of losers, hence leading to their marginalization and the relevant investors — concentrating only on a few States — simply do not care. Globalization must not end in the rape of weak countries, rather it should result in equitable mutual benefits by all indulging in it, so that it may escape unnecessary conflicts that may even result in wars.

Also statistics indicate that agricultural employment, which has traditionally been the highest sectoral employer in many developing countries, has dropped to 61 per cent while industrial employment has risen to 14 per cent in the wake of globalization. For low-income countries like the United Republic of Tanzania, this small industrial sector is still unable to absorb the thousands of new entrants into the labour market, as a result of which they seek refuge in the informal sector, where legislative protection and hence labour standards afforded them are minimal.

There has thus evolved the need to refine our policies in such a way that they are twofold: i.e. addressing those fortunate enough to retain their jobs in the light of the ongoing structural measures, while tackling their transitional employment problems inherent in the globalization process through the creation of more employment-cum-income-generating opportunities. This is the reason my delegation subscribes to and supports the ILO's endeavours to evaluate the impact of standards and reviewing them in the process.

Benefiting from the fruits of globalization ought to encompass a workforce that enjoys social justice, security of employment, and terminal benefits into their old age in the form of sound and comprehensive social security. Indeed the empirical evidence recognizes that globalization offers mutual benefits and growing opportunities to all countries if so willed, but we should not be oblivious of the costs incurred in the process, hoping that they will simply fade away in the long term. Though we acknowledge that relevant policy measures are required to cope with the difficult structural economic adjustment problems, our efforts must be complemented by the international community, as propounded in the Director-General's Report on the ILO's standard-setting and monitoring mechanism.

Bearing in mind that the formal sector is typically very small and the enforcement capacity very weak, labour standards in many developing countries apply to only a small fraction of the labour force. Most workers are not reached by protective labour legislation and, through such legislation, standards. As often pointed out, they benefit from public action that attempts to improve the working environment in the rural and informal sector, e.g. through the provision of drinking-water, electricity, improved sanitary conditions, the eradication of infectious diseases and more.

Hardly ever are social justice and progress addressed conjuncturally. Standards were not conceived for the purpose of only protecting urban workers but also, I believe, to create more opportunities for all working people, through which they may achieve that objective of social progress.

My Government has adopted employment policy reforms to enhance employment and sustain income-generating activities. These policies seek to improve and promote micro and small-scale enterprises with a special focus on self-employment of youth, women, retrenched workers and persons with disabilities, most of whom are concentrated in the informal sector. Although implementation of these policy reforms are still in their embryonic stage, we are optimistic that they will be successful given the appropriate enabling environment, lubricated by internationally recognized facilities and binding standards. The Tanzanian Government is pleased to note that this session of the International Labour Conference has a committee discussing for the first time the issue of job creation in small and medium-sized enterprises, with the objective of formulating a coherent set of guidelines specifically addressing the means of encouraging employment creation through small and medium-sized enterprises. Going by albeit little experience we have had, in conjunction with examples from other countries, my Government believes that this lacuna ought to be filled by this Organization with the necessary growth catalysts and standards.

In this manner, we believe, the ILO's fundamental standards would have greater universality in the their application. We believe that by subscribing to the Constitution of the ILO, the United Republic of Tanzania has indicated our political will to achieve this end.

Original French: Mr. DIOP (Workers' delegate, Senegal) — Madam President, first of all on behalf of the Workers' delegation of Senegal and in my own name, I would like to congratulate you on your election and wish you every success as President of the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference. Your election is well deserved for many reasons, judging from your background as an experienced champion of human rights, in particular those of women and children.

Globalization, which was the centre of our discussions in Dakar a few weeks ago at the meeting of the 12th Pan African Congress of the ORAF/ICFTU, is again this year the focal point of the present session.

The reason for this is that globalization is one of the main concerns of workers and their trade union organizations. Its repercussions on the economies of developing countries are criticized every day, because they place workers and the populations of these countries permanently in a precarious situation and create more and more hardships in employment, education and training, health, and of course for women and children.

We cannot overemphasize the trials that our populations are undergoing, because globalization has led to a strengthening of structural adjustment policies and a worsening of the debt burden. The most visible consequences of this are unemployment and underemployment, enterprise closures and privatization, devaluation of our currencies, the progressive elimination of the public service — in short, the pauperization of entire social strata of the population.

Moreover, the crisis and the need for investment are always used as an excuse for violating human and trade union rights.

Trade union rights are violated everywhere, with workers being thrown into prison for insisting on payment of their wages, opposing the privatization of national companies or demanding more democracy and social justice.

Elsewhere, subtle methods are used to amend labour legislation so as to make the employment market more flexible, sometimes without the workers' representatives knowing. This is the appropriate forum to denounce the Organization for the Harmonization of Business Law (OHADA), which is engaging in this type of practice in West Africa. That is why we are in favour of the proposed solemn declaration of fundamental workers' rights on behalf of all Members of the ILO, whether the corresponding Conventions have been ratified or not.

What is the point of having international labour standards if we do not strengthen the supervisory mechanisms so as to follow them up and enforce them? That is why the ILO needs to fine-tune its strategies and at the same time step up its technical cooperation activities. The multidisciplinary teams are making a major contribution towards the attainment of this goal.

Considering the social upheavals that are taking place in the world, I would like to stress the need for trade union organizations to strengthen their competence in the field of economic and social development. In addition to its principal activity, the trade union movement — which is defensive by nature and hampered by its cooperative approach — should henceforth become involved in national development activities. This new mission of the trade union movement means that it must become involved in world issues which it has to adapt to. We must invent a new approach to the challenges of the third millennium, and this through a strengthening of tripartism.

In my country, Senegal, tripartism is well established and accepted by all the social partners. It has made possible a permanent dialogue among all the social partners in development. In addition to the official tripartite consultation structures (the National Labour Advisory Board, the Tripartite Follow-up and Consultation Committee), the Head of State of Senegal twice a year receives the social partners after their quarterly meetings with the Prime Minister. Thanks to these meetings, trade union organizations have managed to make significant progress in defending the interests of workers, inter alia, by reviving a number of enterprises that were in difficulties or had been shut down, by paying several months of arrears in salaries in enterprises threatened by uncontrolled liberalization, by consolidating the autonomous management of the social security institutions.

Our organization, with the support of the social partners, has started to set up a purchasing centre in order to offset inflation and speculation on the prices of basic commodities. It is also working on the introduction of a national employment retirement solidarity fund to combat unemployment and the threats hovering over the future of our social security institutions.

There are other avenues that we are pursuing with our partners because we must rethink our action in terms of the changes that have occurred and find the means of entering the third millennium with a greater chance of succeeding in the social area of development. It is up to us and us alone to create the right conditions so as not to be excluded from the game that is being imposed on us by globalization.

Original Thai: Mr. BOONRAT (Workers' delegate, Thailand) — On behalf of the Workers' delegates of Thailand, I would like to convey the best wishes of the Thai workers to this Conference for successful and fruitful deliberations.

Thailand is developing from an agricultural society into an industrial one. Most workers are exploited. In the era of globalization the promotion of free trade has had bad repercussions on Thai workers and the Thai labour movement. Foreign investment has been moved from Thailand to Viet Nam and China, where labour costs are cheaper.

Workers in the textile industry have been laid off and the employers have refused to comply with trade union collective bargaining agreements. This has created a lot of difficulties for Thai workers. These kinds of situation are going on and will increase further in the near future due to the declining economic performance of the country. I believe that more and more workers will be laid off and exploited. Employers do not intend to comply with the laws. There will be more and more worker strikes, protests and demonstrations in order to force employers and the Government to comply with Thai legislation and trade union collective bargaining agreements.

Thai workers believe that the liberalization of trade or free trade may take place peacefully only when there is fair treatment of all workers as human beings regardless of national origin, religion and sex. Fair practices may only be guaranteed through the ratification of the seven ILO core Conventions. Unfortunately, the Thai Government has only ratified two ILO core Conventions, namely Nos. 29 and 105.

What I have mentioned here is the present situation of workers in Thailand. In order to make it more clear I would like to summarize the situation of Thai workers' problems as follows. First, there is continuous unfair sacking of workers. It is still going on due to the introduction and implementation of new technology without taking account of the job security of workers. There is the move of multinational companies to other countries in order to seek better profit opportunities and there are more contract labour practices. Contract labour problems are serious for both the private and the public sectors. They constitute one of the major problems in strengthening the Thai trade union movement. A huge migrant workforce has replaced Thai workers in a lot of sectors. This has led to poor enforcement of labour laws. Labour standards have also been ignored. State enterprise workers do not have the right to organize trade unions and are not free to join under the same umbrella as private sector workers. Child labour is growing due to the increase in the services industry.

On behalf of Thai workers I would like to request the ILO to provide technical assistance to the Thai Government and the Thai labour movement. First, to convince the Thai Government to ratify more ILO core Conventions, for example, Nos. 87 and 98, in order to promote better labour standards in Thailand. Second, regarding contract labour, to provide short-term technical assistance in order to assist the Thai Government to determine measures to protect workers' rights in this sector. Third, to provide technical assistance in order to assist the Thai Government in solving the disappearance of the former President of the Labour Congress of Thailand, Mr. Thanong Po-diarn, who disappeared on 19 June 1991. Fourth, regarding migrant workers, to provide technical assistance in order to assist the Thai Government to determine measures to protect migrant workers' rights and determine measures to plan the flow, numbers and areas of work.

As the Thai workers' leader, I would appreciate it if the ILO could play a more important role in the world of free trade in promoting ILO Conventions for a better standard of living of workers as a whole.

Lastly, I would appreciate it if some parts of my speech today were followed up by the ILO. I would like to thank you for giving me this opportunity to address you today and I hope that this 85th Session of the International Labour Conference will be successful.

Mr. KWON (representative of the International Federation of Journalists) — It is an honour to address you on behalf of the Korean workers.

Let me first thank the Director-General for his admirable leadership and his Report which outlines the conditions which show the continued significance of the ILO in the era of globalization.

The struggle of Korean workers earlier this year can be a model of how the ILO standard-setting and supervisory capacity can contribute to the efforts for social justice.

It must be noted however that there is still no full freedom of association. The Korean Government claims that the new labour law, enacted without workers' participation, meets the ILO standards but, in fact, it continues to deny the right of teachers and government employees to join a union of their choice. As a result, the Korean Teachers and Educational Workers' Union is still outlawed and its newly elected president and other active members are subject to persecution. The Korean Government also continues to deny legal recognition for the Korean Confederation of Trade Unions because, among other reasons, it has outlawed the teachers' union. Many thousands of unionists support imprisonment and dismissal just to achieve this much. I am certain that this was how all the labour rights came into being in those countries where they have become the foundation of their societies.

This kind of struggle is continuing today, and a great number of workers are even today suffering from repression as can be seen from the Experts' report.

Our efforts for basic labour rights and social justice, difficult as they are, are today facing unprecedented difficulties and challenges due to globalization.

Globalization, as rightly noted by the Director-General, opens new possibilities for global progress. However, as widely acknowledged by the ILO, and even the World Bank, it represents a radical challenge, or even destructive threat, for our societies. This is the cause of people's actions such as the recent wave of strikes in Europe and Korea. These tell us that workers both in the advanced industrial nations and emerging countries will refuse globalization which pits workers against each other and the worsening social and working conditions.

Globalization calls on us to renew our commitment to the basic rights and benefits embodied in the ILO standards. This is the message contained in the Director-General's proposal for the declaration of our commitment to the fundamental ILO Conventions.

The efforts to strengthen the ILO must be combined with efforts to strengthen the agents who struggle for this end so they are able to take up the ILO standards as an effective instrument of their struggle.

Allow me to point out the issue of trust in the efforts to build a shared vision for global social justice. There is a sense of mistrust in our debates. We should not shy away from it lest it returns with a vengeance issuing from the historical experience of colonial domination and exploitation.

On the one hand, the former colonial powers devastated by the Second World War have recovered their standard-setting spirit and this year we celebrate the 50th anniversary of the Marshall Plan that enabled it. However, the colonies and societies and peoples are still languishing or just beginning to gather themselves to develop.

I do not know if their efforts for development take the form of catching hold of, or trying to catch at the coat tails of globalization, which everyone regards as a source of greater problems. I believe the Director-General's reference to an equitable share of the benefits of globalization pointed to this issue which has been with us for the last few decades. It is the issue of equitable share of the world's prosperity and humanity's development across nations and peoples, especially across South and North.

A vision and the strategy to come to terms with globalization must tackle this issue head on. It must be based on a clear reaffirmation of our solidarity for common welfare. In the context of the ILO, this calls for the strengthening of its technical assistance capacity.

There is the special issue of trust for the Korean unions. The debate over Convention No. 29 involving war-time "comfort women" has shown the need for real solutions to deep-rooted mistrust. The healing of wounds is only possible when the death-bed wish of victims for the restoration of their honour and dignity, which cannot be bought with any amount of money, is fulfilled. Without this it would be impossible to win the trust needed for a common vision and solidarity for common welfare.

Finally, while we recognize the inevitability and the overall welfare effects of the free movement of capital, we must develop creative and effective means to encourage or force transnational corporations (TNCs) to become responsible citizens of the world. The urgency is accentuated by the rapid erosion of government capacity and the ever-increasing power of TNCs or financial giants to dictate to the governments, especially in the developing nations, to create a tailor-made environment for themselves.

In conclusion, I would like to declare my full support for the Director-General's Report for the strengthening of the ILO as it is a cornerstone of a broader strategic effort for globalization of social justice. The Korean Confederation of Trade Unions will work in solidarity with all others who share the vision to build a historical and social force capable of harnessing the energy of globalization for the realization of the common human aspiration and global social justice.

Mr. WISTISEN (Workers' delegate, Denmark) — It was with great pleasure that we in the Danish trade union movement received the Report of the Director-General to this year's session of the International Labour Conference. The discussion of ILO standards is crucial as we are faced with the ever-increasing globalization of trade and industry. More and more power is concentrated in the hands of the multinational companies. At the same time the WTO has paved the way for increasing business and investment across borders. Free general trading blocs reinforce these developments. It is therefore more important than ever that the letter and spirit of the ILO standards be observed. It is nationally recognized labour standards that represent workers' protection in a world with increasingly intensified competition. International relations may contribute to economic growth but we will not accept that free competition leads to workers' lives and health being put at risk.

It is therefore important for this Conference to continue the approach contained in the Copenhagen Declaration and confirmed at the WTO's Conference in Singapore. Here the countries committed themselves to respect basic workers' rights. In the ILO we must express our sharp condemnation of countries using forced labour and at the same time we must ensure that multinationals investing in these countries cannot do so with impunity, but it must be reflected in public opinion.

Children should be secured education and should not spend their childhood in factories. All countries should live up to this responsibility, and in the more wealthy part of the world we have an obligation to secure assistance for the implementation of training programmes to replace child labour.

The report of the Committee on the Application of Standards also shows that a number of countries do not respect the basic conditions of membership of the ILO. In coming years attention must therefore be focused on the various countries' application of the principles of freedom of association and the right to bargain collectively.

I would like the ILO to be given more power to secure basic rights through the use of the procedure which applies to the observance of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98. We all know from our daily life that if we are members of an association we have to follow the rules in force. This should apply particularly in the ILO.

We strongly support a discussion of this issue at coming sessions of the Conference. I can also support the intention behind social labelling. However, such an arrangement must be given real value through supervision of observance. There should be no possibility of empty advertising as in the case when certain companies prepare an eloquent code of conduct without involving the employees or their organizations in the formulation of such rules.

I would like to congratulate the Director-General on this Report and urge that its contents be debated between the secretariats of the ILO and the WTO as foreseen in the Singapore Declaration. I hope that at the WTO Conference in 1998 he will not, for the second time, be denied access to speak.

Original Arabic: Mr. BAKHEIT (Employers' delegate, Sudan) — May I start by expressing the warm congratulations of my delegation to Mrs. Keltošová on her election as President of this session of the Conference. Her wisdom and experience will surely contribute to the success of the Conference.

I would also like to thank the Director-General for his Report and for his choice of topic, namely, the ILO and its activities with regard to standard setting in the context of globalization.

We are convinced that the elaboration of standards is the main task of the ILO and its very raison d'être. The Director-General has made an apt choice for the theme of his Report. We would nevertheless like to comment on the suggestions and analysis contained in the Report.

Firstly, as a member of the Employers' group and along with all the partners of this Organization, we have a very great responsibility to accord the highest priority to standard setting as prescribed in the Constitution of the Organization and the Declaration of Philadelphia to promote social justice and ensure peace in the world. We therefore support all the efforts made by the Director-General and the Governing Body in the campaign to increase ratification of the core Conventions dealing with human rights. But we hope that there will be still greater effort in that area and, particularly in the Employers' Federation of Sudan, we have initiated serious dialogue to achieve this objective. Nevertheless, all this calls for conviction within the framework of constitutional structures and existing ILO supervisory mechanisms since there could be frightful consequences if we imposed these standards, particularly in developing countries which are enduring such painful and tough economic conditions.

Secondly, as we have said before, we hope for the continuation of the principle of voluntary acceptance of international Conventions by member States, while taking the necessary measures to encourage these countries to adopt the international Conventions. As to human rights, which has become a political instrument to punish all countries which have not obtained the advantages of the new economic order, some countries adopt measures which go as far as boycotts and embargoes, without a thought to the devastating consequences on the lives of people.

In Sudan, we believe firmly in social justice and the importance of the complementarity of the social partners because the Islamic religion establishes these principles.

The attainment of these objectives must be through good relations between the rich and poor countries, the cancellation of debts accumulated by the poor countries, and through technical assistance to help them to achieve their potential and modernize their societies. We also believe that these countries must work relentlessly to revise their legislation and policies in order to achieve these objectives.

In Sudan, as employers, we have met with our partners under a commission charged with the revision of labour laws, and we have managed to achieve tripartite participation, based on the expansion of the labour force and worker protection.

As far as the low level of ratification of Conventions is concerned, especially the core Conventions, we fully support the efforts of the Director-General to encourage more countries to ratify these Conventions. We must help those countries to overcome their difficulties but not through threats and blackmail.

We believe we should encourage them by offering greater flexibility in solving their problems, and do so in a serious and neutral fashion.

We thank the Governing Body for choosing the question of general conditions to encourage employment creation in small and medium-sized enterprises, and a study has already been carried out to that end.

Prior to the opening of this session of the Conference, on 25 and 26 May, we organized a workshop on the role of small and medium-sized enterprises on the creation of jobs in collaboration with the ILO. Various studies were presented and discussed by the experts. The workshop adopted conclusions and recommendations of benefit to the social partners, that is to say, the Government, the employers and the workers.

Our Government has signed a peace agreement with the rebel factions to put an end to the blood-letting of the past 40 years. In the Employers' group, we have encouraged each employer to invest all their effort in our nation to reinforce the structures, to rebuild the country and particularly the areas which have been so affected by the war. We appeal to the entire international community, the richer countries and industrial forces and financial institutions to help us in this task.

After studying the report of the Director-General regarding the situation of workers in the occupied territories, particularly in Palestine, the Golan Heights and southern Lebanon, we see no progress or development. On the contrary, the conditions of workers has worsened because of the actions of the Israeli authorities.

We appeal once again to the ILO to increase its cooperation and technical assistance to solve these problems and to improve the lot of these workers.

Mr. SHAETONHODI (Deputy Minister of Labour, Namibia) — My intervention will mainly be confined to the Report of the Director-General on standard setting and globalization, the subject of debate in this august house. Namibia has been following the debate with great interest on the issues of standard setting and globalization. We in Namibia attach great importance to the universally respected fundamental human rights in the workplace. These two issues have been the focus of debate since the Social Summit in Copenhagen in 1995 and the recent meeting of ministers of trade in Singapore. These issues have also come up at a time when the ILO is rigorously advocating the ratification of ILO standards, in particular the seven core Conventions on fundamental human rights.

Namibia supports the objectives of the ILO and a system of labour standards aimed at achieving these objectives. We believe that ILO standards play an important role in helping member States, especially developing countries, to improve the well-being of their people through an equitable approach to socio-economic development. We recognize that there is an urgent need to strengthen the ILO supervisory machinery and to support effective implementation of these standards throughout the world.

In pursuance of social justice, Namibia ratified two of the seven core Conventions, namely Convention No. 87 on freedom of association and the protection of the right to organize and Convention No. 98 on the right to organize and collective bargaining. It is pleasing to note that the fruits of such ratification are currently being realized throughout our socio-economic structures. It is also encouraging to note that both the Namibian Constitution and the Labour Act explicitly prohibit forced labour and child labour practices. This in itself demonstrates the Namibian commitment towards human rights and social progress.

As you may be aware discrimination in pre-independence Namibia was institutionalized, meaning that marked disparities in the fields of education and training, employment and occupation still exist. In our efforts to redress past discriminatory practices and to bring us into line with the provisions of Conventions Nos. 100 and 111, a policy in this regard has been developed and legislation on affirmative action and equal opportunities in employment is due to be promulgated. This we have achieved as a result of our continued cooperation with and through the ILO and, in this case, the Government of Norway.

On the topical issue of the globalization of the economy, the Report of the Director-General acknowledges the existence of differing views concerning the impact of globalization on social issues. These views we believe place the ILO in a difficult position as it strives to advance its objectives in fulfilling its sacred mandate. While recognizing the possible benefits the global economy may generate, Namibia maintains that the ILO must never compromise its historical mandate of standard setting, monitoring and evaluation. It should be pointed out that investments that big economies make in the developing world should not be geared towards forcing developing economies into a situation where the rights of the workers are sacrificed. Instead, the ILO should step up its efforts to establish a more useful medium of promoting social justice and progress in member States as they strive to survive in today's globalized economy.

Namibia further supports the motion that member States, whether or not they have ratified the core Conventions, should be obliged to submit regular reports to the Organization. In our view, such an approach could help to instil among member States a sense of responsibility towards the achievement of social progress worldwide. Taking into account these developments, it is imperative for the ILO to increase its technical assistance, especially in developing countries, and to devote more resources to the activities of multidisciplinary teams. This would significantly advance and intensify the efficiency and effectiveness of developing countries in applying ILO standards.

Namibia further agrees with the principle that the guarantee of fundamental rights is a prerequisite for social progress and wishes to recommend that the report on social progress should not just be one of statistics but should give examples of success and hence failure, and by implication try to avert factors leading to failure, and lead to the implementation of, where practical, systems that would bring about success. We therefore wish to recommend a regular report of this kind, preferably on a biennial basis.

In conclusion, we trust that the Report of the Director-General will further open a lively and constructive debate. Let us again rededicate ourselves to the noble ideals and objectives we have set for ourselves as we address the problems and challenges facing us, and seize the opportunities being presented by the advent of the twenty-first century.

Mr. CELI VEGAS (representative of the World Federation of United Nations Associations) — The Report of the Director-General presented to the first plenary sitting of the 85th Session of this Conference emphasizes globalization. The Director-General states that economic progress should be accompanied by social progress and that the ILO should guarantee a greater universality in the application of its fundamental standards. In fact, the Director-General went so far as to say that the universal guarantee of fundamental rights is a prerequisite for workers to be able to share in the benefits of globalization.

A large group of people of all nationalities are not specifically covered by any ILO Conventions. The World Federation of United Nations Associations requests that their rights should be included in the greater universality of application of standards. These are the spouses or partners or international corporate, diplomatic, intergovernmental, governmental and non-governmental organization employees. They can be excluded from the workforce for most of their "working life", often working hard for their spouses' employer but without remuneration. The majority of these spouses are women. These are surely in violation of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111).

In view of the Beijing Conference which recommended an improved role for women, and in light of the ILO's new International Programme on More and Better Jobs for Women, the WFUNA urges the General Conference to consider this matter, and is taking its own action through "Working Partners", which promotes international development by supporting spouses who wish to maintain their own career.

In this era of globalization, mobility of both goods and people will continue to increase. People need greater access to the means of employment for work mobility. People stationed in one country are assigned to take responsibility for or to work in other particular countries. Within the new principles of the world trade system, people should be free to move from one country to seek work in other countries. This calls for the reorganization of international employment systems.

Therefore, the number of expatriates in any country will continue to increase. They consist, mainly, of two groups: those who serve in the diplomatic corps or international organizations; and those who work in multinational businesses. The spouses of these expatriates, most of whom are women, usually find it difficult to obtain gainful employment in the host countries. Most of them become frustrated at not being able to pursue and develop their own careers. Many marriages are broken, productivity declines, children suffer.

There are several barriers in the present employment system which generally prevent spouses from working in host countries. First, there is a misperception among governments, trade unions and other institutions about expatriates and their spouses. They think that both expatriates and their spouses take jobs from the domestic labour forces. The evidence does not support this. Second, there have been cultural and psychological barriers in diplomatic service to spouses working in the same office of an institution, or even spouses working at all in a host country. If a spouse is working in a domestic enterprise, it might be necessary for them to give up their right to diplomatic immunity. Third, there has also been a misperception in companies that employ many expatriates. Most employers think it will increase their costs if spouses work in the same company, and that it will reduce the efficiency of the expatriate workforce if spouses work in other companies.

Employing spouses will give benefits to employers of expatriates, the host country, as well as to the families of expatriates. First, the benefits of employing spouses in the same companies or organizations will be a reduction in the cost of recruitment, overseas transportation, medical insurance, housing and education allowances. Second, the host country will benefit through the employment of spouses, because it will reduce the hiring costs of expatriates, which, in turn, will have a positive effect on trade and development. Third, employing spouses not only will add to the family income of expatriates, but will also encourage both expatriates and their spouses to pursue and develop their careers. Therefore, the reorganization of the international employment system is important in order to ensure much more mobility of people whose work takes them from one country to another. The new international employment system should ensure greater access to employment in host countries for the spouses of expatriates. This will come about only by the agreement of all countries through the United Nations or at least the International Labour Organization.

In the meantime, the WFUNA's Working Partners' Programme is strongly recommending that: (a) employers in multinational enterprises, including offices of international agencies in host countries, should increase the recruitment of spouses of expatriates providing they have appropriate qualifications; (b) the ILO should widely clarify and dispel any misperceptions of governments, trade unions and employers in many member countries on the role of expatriates and their spouses; and (c) national governments and the ILO should study the numerous projects and job-creation programmes created by expatriate spouses and working partners which promote development and increase employment and training opportunities for nationals.

Failure to address this issue will lead to a decline in international development, security and trading, as expatriate mobility declines, and employers fail to recruit adequately qualified and motivated people, with more assignments ending prematurely.

Original Spanish: Mr. BENTANCOR (Workers' delegate, Uruguay) — Poised as we are on the threshold of the third millennium, our world is currently undergoing changes that deeply affect the various political, economic and cultural systems. Globalization of the economy and of trade, regional integration processes, along with the effects of the technological and scientific revolution, mark all of these changes. The changes are proceeding at a dizzy pace and are highly complex. The outlook for the future is consequently deeply uncertain. Unemployment, poverty, marginalization, the exploitation of child labour, contemporary forms of slavery, increasing manifestations of xenophobia and racism across vast sweeps of the earth, all oblige us to think very carefully about problems old and new that are currently afflicting mankind.

In today's world scientific and technological progress opens up enormous possibilities for people, never before in history has humanity been endowed with so many and such rich resources as today.

These facts place us at a kind of ethical crossroads. The choice is stark. Either we build a new political and social order, that is at the service of man, or we convert ourselves into being the willing agents of irrational and dehumanizing productive development.

The existing economic system both compounds inequalities and creates categories of sideline citizens and on the other hand increases disproportionate profits for the few. The alternative is to construct societies that involve democratic decisions about the fabulous riches that the intelligence, the efforts and the sacrifices of millions of workers have contributed to generating.

We have to curb fierce competition that sweeps aside the elementary rights and freedoms that belong to people with their yearnings for social justice and which may even sweep the entire planet that is ever more threatened by ecological pillaging. In this context it is more and more vital to seek agreements between various sectors of society. These should be set up within the framework of the hard and fast principles of justice, democratic consolidation, social solidarity and cooperation. This will make it possible to achieve greater social equity and justice within the framework of stability and democratic dialogue.

We workers assign a vital role to the ILO. It should be remembered that both in the conclusions of the 1995 World Summit in Copenhagen and in the Singapore declaration, participating governments stressed that the ILO has to play a special role in the field of employment and social development and that the ILO is competent to establish labour standards and monitor their enforcement.

At the same time we have to demand consistency between the declarations made at certain international summits and international practice and behaviour. Bolstering the supervisory machinery and respect for ILO Conventions, in particular in the sphere of fundamental human rights, are ways of assessing the political will of the member States to comply with the commitments and declarations made at these conferences.

Although we do not believe we are attacking an essentially legal problem — it is rather an ethical and political one — our trade union delegation nevertheless supports the proposals contained in the Director-Generals' Report, with certain reservations. We believe that the Director-General's document contains some very interesting aspects regarding social rights. A proposal for greater political and moral responsibility within States deserves our attention.

Furthermore, we agree with the tools for putting this into practice, namely accepting international inspection, the so-called overall social labels, demanding explanations why certain Conventions have not been ratified or are violated. I think it is a good idea to lay more stress on the fact that responsibility exists not only by virtue of ratifying a Convention but also by the simple fact of adhering to the ILO Constitution, to its objectives and principles. Solemn tripartite declarations on essential aspects that must be respected, whether or not the Conventions have been ratified, along with regular reports on social progress in the world followed by tripartite debate, is another fascinating suggestion to be found in the Report.

The present economic climate implies the need for both a social clause like the one championed by the MERCOSUR trade union organizations and for more trade union action at the international level with its necessary protection. The creation of conditions that would improve labour and social relations by focusing on the need for social justice should be a standing goal for this Organization. The principles set out in the Declaration of Philadelphia more than 50 years ago are as topical as they ever were in today's world.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL-TAIB (Minister of Labour and Vocational Training, Yemen) — In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! From the outset I would like to express on behalf of the delegation of the Republic of Yemen, and myself, sincere congratulations to the President on her election to chair this session of the Conference. We are convinced that her experience and competence will guide our work towards success. I would also like to congratulate the Vice-Presidents on their election and wish them every success.

Madam President, thanks to your vast experience as a member of this Organization, you will understand the present and future challenges which are increasing the expectations of workers with regard to the resolutions and recommendations that will result from this Conference with a view to the achievement of the objectives set forth in the Constitution of our Organization, because the ILO, with its tripartite structure, is responsible for monitoring and defending the interests of the workers who are the most important component of production. It is thus up to the ILO to strengthen relations between its constituents in order to improve the production process and increase productivity, through a good understanding between the agents of production and increased international investments to promote development in general.

As you have seen, the items on our agenda are of the utmost importance and deserve an in-depth examination on our part, particularly the question of the ILO's standard-setting activities, which is one of the most important issues dealt with in the Report of the Director-General at a time when globalization is spreading to all sectors of activity: the practical, scientific and organizational sectors of our Organization.

It is obvious that the Report of the Director-General has triggered a considerable amount of controversy this year with regard to the social clause in the context of the liberalization of trade. Although we are convinced that account must be taken of the fact that social standards must be developed along with economic progress, unfortunately economic development has been accompanied by recession and unemployment in our countries, which means that our societies are at present not in a position to respect new standards which are likely to be misunderstood or misinterpreted. This might hamper trade flows and increase unemployment. That is why we believe that the question of the establishment of a link between the social clause and international trade requires further examination and be dealt with in an in-depth study.

Despite the progress accomplished by the Organization with regard to technical cooperation — as reflected in the number of beneficiary States and organizations as well as the increase in the budget in this sector and the increase in activities — the poorest countries which have the greatest need of such cooperation in order to build their infrastructure should be able to benefit from broader programmes.

I would like to draw your attention to the situation in the Arab territories occupied by Israel since 1967. The situation of employers and workers is constantly deteriorating, and is characterized by increasing economic and social suffering in the region due to the practices pursued and measures adopted by Israel in violation of the Constitution and standards of our Organization: violations of the right to work, industrial boycotts which prevent people from putting their goods on the market, the confiscation of land, the establishment of settlements, measures to Judaise Jerusalem, the repression and harassment of the Arab population.

We express the wish that our Conference will adopt a resolution condemning all of these measures which infringe international law and human rights. At the same time, we hope that the Organization will strengthen its technical programmes in order to help the Palestinian Authority in coping with this very difficult situation.

We welcome the initiative adopted by the Organization to monitor the implementation of programmes for Palestinians. We are very happy with the general outline of the budgetary proposals for 1998-99, in particular with regard to the Regional Office for Arab States. We would urge the ILO to strengthen its activities in the region.

Original Spanish: Mr. GONZALEZ CASCO (Government delegate, Paraguay) — The Government of my country which considered the Conventions and Recommendations of the ILO, would like to underline its action to ensure that the rights, guarantees and obligations enshrined in the current legal framework are being carefully observed and fulfilled.

My country is not a stranger to developments called for in labour matters. My Government understands this well, and I am pleased to be able to inform you that the latest increase in the minimum wage has been carried out allowing for inflation, with the agreement of employers and workers. The Government of Paraguay is actively fostering the establishment of trade unions, offering guarantees with regard to non-intervention in their internal debates.

The main concern of my Government is of course labour conflicts, particularly those of a collective nature and calling for the attention of the labour administration authorities. It is therefore a favourable time for the establishment of tripartite bodies, which are tending to find excellent solutions to labour problems, through the observation of the principles of dialogue, negotiation and conciliation. In this way, numerous subjects of social importance have been able to be amicably resolved without calling for intervention by other decision-making authorities which always turn out to take so much longer and to be more onerous for the parties involved. Thus, more than 60 per cent of the conflicts brought up for discussion this year have been able to be resolved to the satisfaction of all parties, and it thus demonstrates that this practice is held in much greater esteem in our society, not only as a mechanism to avoid these problems but also to find solutions that benefit all parties.

The implementation of labour laws has contributed significantly to satisfying protests and demanding rights, as well as raising public awareness with regard to the observance of labour standards. A relevant point this year has undoubtedly been the inclusion in the budget of the general expenditure of the nation of budget lines for medical insurance and family allowances for state employees.

With regard to civil servants, in February 1994 the President of the Republic presented to the President of the Federation of Public Servants a draft of new statutes for public servants, drafted by eminent constitutional lawyers from my country. In turn the Federation of Public Servants handed to Parliament a new version of the statutes. For their part, the public servants brought together in the Central Union of State Employees (CESITEP) their own draft text for these statutes, as a code for state employees. Consequently, members of the Chamber of Deputies submitted a draft law for the statutes governing public servants. At present the only draft text being studied at parliamentary level is the one put forward by the Chamber of Deputies, but it has to be pointed out that that text has not been endorsed by the public service unions.

Following the policy of observing and implementing article 19 of the ILO Constitution, in May 1997 the National Congress handed in a list of international instruments approved by the International Labour Conference between 1982 and 1994. This puts into full operation the obligation to submit these international instruments to the competent authorities.

In addition, it has become common practice to request the registration and publication of collective contracts on conditions of work in the public sector, which themselves constitute a clear example of the negotiation and consultation which are gaining greater esteem in this labour sector.

In order to confront the challenges of globalization, in which we have been immersed as a result of the Treaty of Asunción, which brought into being MERCOSUR, the Ministry of Justice and Labour, in search of excellence in the workforce and training for the working class, encouraged the development of courses, seminars, workshops and discussions directed at various types of workers through the National Service for Professional Promotion. These initiatives are designed to allow the national labour force to fulfil the new requirements of today's labour market.

We wish to congratulate the Director-General on his Report and his important proposals which we hope will be carried forward after tripartite consultations in each country and we support the adoption of a solemn declaration reaffirming the fundamental rights of workers and its application for all member countries of the ILO.

Finally, we wish to thank God for being able to share this with you all.

Mr. BANDA (Deputy Minister of Labour and Manpower Development, Malawi) — It gives me great pleasure and honour to be accorded the privilege of addressing this assembly on behalf of the Government and people of the Republic of Malawi.

On behalf of my delegation and indeed on my own behalf, I wish to congratulate you, Madam President, on your well-deserved election to the high office of President of the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference. I do believe that with your vast wealth of experience, wisdom and able guidance, you will bring the proceedings of this Conference to a very successful conclusion. In addition to this blessing I would like also to assure you of the support of the Malawi delegation in all deliberations at this Conference.

Turning to the theme of the standard-setting function of the International Labour Office, my delegation considers the Report of the Director-General to be a positive search for solutions to labour problems embedded in the overall international development endeavour. Given the mandate to advance world peace through promotion of social justice, this is a very welcome move which explores further avenues for the International Labour Organization to promote and maintain social justice in line with the constantly changing world.

I am pleased to inform this noble assembly that Malawi attended the Singapore Ministerial Conference of the World Trade Organization (WTO) on core labour standards, and that, Malawi agreed with others, I quote, "that core labour standards should not be included in the WTO negotiations because the International Labour Organization (ILO) is the most competent body to set and deal with these standards and that the WTO should only support the ILO for its work in promoting them".

The Singapore Ministerial Conference also rejected the use of labour standards for protectionist purposes and agreed that the comparative advantage of countries, particularly low-wage developing countries, must in no way be put into question.

I am also pleased to inform this noble assembly that under our Malawian democratic Constitution, all ratifications of Conventions have to be presented to the National Assembly before the State President gives a consent.

I am also pleased to inform you that Malawi is now processing and consolidating the national labour legislation on the bases of the Conventions that our present democratic Government has already ratified, and those not yet ratified.

As you are aware, the market economy and democracy are indeed gaining ground, though at levels which differ from one country to another. I am pleased to inform you that soon after the Government led by the United Democratic Front came to power on 17 May 1994, the Government introduced the Poverty Alleviation Programme because the Government is aware that Malawi is one of the poorest countries in the world. This programme is meant to eradicate from our people the miseries of ignorance, disease, hunger and the national debt burden.

I am also pleased to inform you that the Malawi Government has introduced the Free Primary School Education Programme for our girls and boys. The Malawi Government has also introduced the Girls Free Secondary School Education Programme. The Government believes education is the key to development and also the way to open access for women to Parliament.

Finally, Malawi needs ILO assistance in the areas of employment promotion such as entrepreneurship development for small and medium-sized enterprises, and also in the consolidation of the mechanisms of tripartite cooperation. My Government believes that tripartite cooperation is the instrument that could empower workers to feel proud that they are part and parcel of the social and economic development of our country in order to bring about social harmony between the three social partners, the Government, employers and workers.

Mr. TROTMAN (Workers' delegate, Barbados) — Mine is the voice not only of organized labour in my own country, Barbados, but of my colleagues in Antigua and Barbuda and the Bahamas, in Belize, Dominica, Grenada, Guyana, Jamaica, Saint Lucia, Saint Kitts and Nevis, Saint Vincent, Suriname, Trinidad and Tobago as well as Bermuda, Curaçao and Montserrat who are not yet Members of the ILO.

We all have a history of exploitation and abuse of our masses by small privileged groups and we are all quite appreciative of the significant difference made to the quality of life in our countries by the standards set by successive sessions of the International Labour Conference and applied by our political and business leaders. It is this history which leads the workers of the Caribbean to support without qualification the call made in the Director-General's Report for greater membership ratification of Conventions and implementation of the standards in their daily activities. I hope the interpreters will forgive me for digressing to say that this must not be understood to mean that we agree totally with the Director-General's Report. The Caribbean naturally has reservations about parts of that Report, but we welcome it as a provocative item intended to challenge ILO Members to re-examine their positions on the role of the International Labour Organization as a setter of standards.

We reject out of hand as misleading and untrue any claims that would suggest that the basic standards currently exercising the attention of the ILO have to wait until countries have reached a satisfactory level of development before they can be applied to those countries. We equally reject as spurious and distasteful the suggestion that those of us calling for certain basic social and living standards are making out a case for a single global minimum wage or that we are questioning the entitlement of developing countries to benefit from their comparative advantage. After all, we in the Caribbean are developing countries which are striving even now to benefit from that said comparative advantage.

What the Caribbean Trade Union abhors is the interpretation which some, hopefully absent from this Conference, would seek to give to the term "comparative advantage". By the term, some believe that they see an excuse for sending school-age children to perform invisible work or wage work when they should be enjoying the pleasures and the innocence of childhood and when, from the earliest possible time, they should be experiencing equality of opportunity by having their right to whatever education is available, since without equality of educational opportunity there can be no equality of work opportunity and no equality in that country's distribution of its social benefits.

Today we in the Caribbean region still bear the scars of enforced labour, whether it was called penal servitude as with the British poor whites, or indentured labour as with our East Indian victims, or just ordinary slavery as with the Africans corrupted by their northern neighbours.

In spite of that past, we can boast of civil and social provisions where the offspring of those slaves are the leaders of parliaments, the heads of state and the intellectual inspiration of our nations. What makes this possible is the preparedness of those who previously exercised power and privilege to share that power and to surrender some of those privileges. It was a clear matter of enlightened self-interest. Those leaders were willing to guarantee suitable education for all because they realized that true and lasting peace would never be realized within national boundaries or indeed across datelines, if some fundamental right of equality of opportunity was not confirmed and underlined by the right of equality of education and hence the need to abolish child labour. The case we make for the abolition of child labour we make equally for the cessation of discrimination in conditions of work and pay levels, the discontinuation of forced labour and of course the right of association and to associate and bargain collectively.

Time will permit merely a brief summary of how the Caribbean labour movement sees support for these basic rights as being vital to the development of our region. We insist that the development of our countries has only taken place where the masses in those countries have experienced an improvement in the quality of their lives. Development must not be approved or supported if it means the encouragement of private wealth at the expense of the well-being of the masses.

We submit that the International Labour Organization, acting as a global mirror, has been able to permit us to look critically at ourselves and to make appropriate adjustments to our dress. The world leaders who met a few short years ago in Copenhagen at the World Summit there confirmed that the Caribbean view is generally acceptable. What is required now is the political will of those governments to move beyond philosophical and intellectual support to an action plan to remove from the roots those abuses which continue to breed poverty, hatred and social exclusion.

The Director-General's Report is timely in these circumstances. We urge you to give it your support. To do so is not blindly to adhere to the shibboleths of the past but rather to ensure that the mad rush to maximize profits does not result in the building of global ghettos with all their attendant social consequences. What we need to ask ourselves is are we creating a pond only for the fast fish or are we creating a pond for all fish?

Original French: Mr. NSENGIMANA (Minister of Public Service and Labour, Rwanda) — Allow me to congratulate the President on her successful election to the presidency of the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference. We are convinced that her competence and wisdom will imbue this assembly with a spirit of mutual understanding amongst all the partners present today. I would also like to congratulate Michel Hansenne, the Director-General of the ILO, for his clear and precise Report.

The effects of the genocide undergone by my country represent a disaster that will be with us for a long time. However, the peoples of Rwanda, attached to the ideal of reconciliation, are making tremendous efforts to restore the economic, social and cultural fabric of the country. The Government of National Unity, set up on 19 July 1994, is firmly committed to a course that will restore the hopes of the Rwandan peoples to live together again, and has made a major effort to reconcile all sections of the Rwandan population.

Rwanda, although it upholds the fundamental principles of the International Labour Organization, which is to operate according to a tripartite system, was unable to ensure the participation of all of the social partners due to the present precarious economic situation.

At a time of globalization, my country has introduced a system that is open to one and all. Available posts are subject to competition, the principle being that recruitment is based on competence and experience. The Government is doing everything to limit the obstacles hampering national and foreign investments. This open policy should not, however, make us overlook or forget the social reality of our country and all other countries. Indeed, liberalization should also be aimed at the creation of employment and the promotion of SMEs according to the needs expressed by our respective local communities.

My delegation is not in favour of the link which the Report of the Director-General makes between labour standards and international trade, since this involves protectionism and perpetuates traditional inequalities between developed and developing countries.

My country very much appreciates the aid and assistance provided to it by the International Labour Organization. For this purpose, I would like to refer to the revision of our Labour Code in order to adapt it to the basic instruments of our Organization. The officials of the labour administration in my country have been following a training course at the Turin Centre for the last two years in the field of international labour standards.

The Regional Office of the ILO in Abidjan sends us experts so that together we can examine our priorities, and my country sees this as an effort on the part of the Office to provide us with assistance after the loss of a large part of our human resources in the 1994 genocide.

My country very much appreciates this assistance. However, allow me to say that it is far from sufficient to cover all of our needs. I would thus like to request the assistance of the ILO and, through the ILO, the assistance of all lending institutions, so that all of the projects that were suspended in the wake of the 1994 events can be relaunched for the benefit of the Rwandan people in general and workers in particular.

I would like to end by asking all delegations to speak on our behalf vis-à-vis their governments and their respective bodies and organizations, so as to help Rwanda in its national reconciliation efforts and in its efforts to bring about rehabilitation and development of its human and socio-economic resources.

The PRESIDENT — We shall now resume the discussion on the reports of the Chairperson of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Mr. GRECH (Minister for Social Welfare, Malta) — Madam President, I take this opportunity to congratulate you on being elected as President of the Conference. Likewise, I would like to congratulate the Director-General for his excellent Report which goes a long way towards seeing the ILO adapt itself to the requirements of the changing world both towards and into the new millennium.

During the past years, this Organization has been carefully examining the social aspects of economic globalization and this Report shows that it has now produced some specific recommendations for action. The liberalization of trade alone will not lead to a universal improvement in standards of living unless it is accompanied by the observance of those fundamental human rights of which the ILO has always been a champion.

Although as of October last there has been a change of government in Malta, I can assure the Conference that the new Government has the deepest respect for the ILO with which it intends to work very closely. My country adheres to this Organization's principles and there are definitely no fundamental issues in regard to the acceptance of these principles and their application in everyday life.

The Report this year suggests that the ILO should adopt a minimum of social requirements which would enable an ongoing assessment by the ILO itself as to what extent social progress in a particular country is keeping pace with the process of economic globalization. We in Malta believe in a flexible tripartite approach to economic and social problems. In point of fact, consultations on these subjects take place on an ongoing basis in the Malta Council for Economic Development which is the highest tripartite forum on economic and social policy in Malta.

In the international sphere, Malta is giving its full support to the European-Mediterranean initiative which, amongst other things, seeks to secure economic and social cooperation between European and Mediterranean States so as to ensure balanced development in the region. Our hosting of the Euro-Mediterranean Conference last April is living proof of our commitment in this area.

Since taking over the Administration last November, the Government of Malta has been actively examining the fiscal system in consultation with the social partners and economic bodies. The objectives of the new system of taxation are not only the raising of fiscal revenue but, even more important, the observance of equity and the promotion of balanced economic and social development.

As regards the self-employed, besides appointing a parliamentary secretariat for the self-employed, an ad hoc committee was also set up to examine the social problems affecting such persons. This committee has already made its first of a series of recommendations to the Government. Special training programmes have also been introduced for self-employed persons who need management training. Other initiatives for helping small and medium-sized firms are also in the pipeline.

On the other hand, the Employment and Training Corporation provides training courses for persons seeking employment and for those who seek to improve their career opportunities. It also provides specialized vocational training courses for persons with special needs, including the disabled.

Unfortunately, during the past 18 months, there has been a slowdown of the economy which has resulted in an unacceptable rise in unemployment. But the situation is none the less being carefully monitored. Furthermore, in view of the relatively low rate of female participation, measures are actively being considered to induce married women to combine work and family responsibilities and to facilitate their re-entry into the workforce.

I am pleased to note that one of the items on this year's Conference agenda deals with general conditions to stimulate job creation in small and medium-sized enterprises. The present Administration in Malta is committed to stimulate the growth of SMEs and for this purpose a special division within the Malta Development Corporation is being set up to provide technical assistance to small enterprises.

Occupational health and safety is an area where the social partners have always been very cooperative and the Government is relying on their continued cooperation to embark on new initiatives and improvements. Although most employers in Malta are small and meet with problems when investing heavily over a short period of time, health and safety cannot be compromised. The situation is therefore being carefully monitored to ensure that work practices are improved in an orderly way without causing undue disturbance to industry.

The social partners wish to see an improvement in the present system of industrial relations and to reduce as far as possible the need for compulsory arbitration. This is a controversial area where progress necessarily takes time and the new Administration is examining the situation very carefully. The Malta Council for Economic Development has made some practical suggestions for improving the machinery for the voluntary settlement of trade disputes by conciliation and for expediting arbitration procedures. However, there is a general consensus among the social partners that it is not possible for the time being to proceed with the entire removal of compulsory arbitration.

I conclude by wishing the ILO, and particularly the Director-General and his staff, every success in their efforts to see this Organization take on with pride and dedication a new role — a role adapted to the needs of the new millennium.

Mr. NGUYEN LUONG (Vice-Minister of Labour, Invalids and Social Affairs, Viet Nam) — First of all, allow me Madam President, on behalf of the Vietnamese delegation and on my own behalf, to congratulate you on your election to the highest office of the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference. We believe that under your able chairmanship, our Conference will arrive at a successful conclusion.

During 78 years of its existence and development the ILO has adopted 180 Conventions and 187 Recommendations. The ILO's standard setting has been significantly contributing to the protection of legitimate rights and the interests of workers for social justice and social progress in member States and in the world. The ILO's contribution in this connection has been widely recognized. However, as indicated by the Director-General in his Report, this could be improved if the objectives were more targeted. As our resources are limited, in our opinion, in the forthcoming years the ILO's efforts should be focused on reviewing and revising existing instruments with a view to making them more relevant and realistic, and thus increasing the rate of their ratification and application.

In this regard, we welcome the inclusion on the Conference agenda of the discussion and adoption of an amendment to the Constitution which allows the Conference to abrogate many obsolete Conventions by a two-thirds majority.

Of course, we must not forget that the most important task of the ILO is to help increase employment and eliminate poverty. This task must be given the highest priority. The employment picture of the world is still not as bright as we expected it to be. We are seriously concerned about the employment situation. Employment is the first priority in our national policy. We would like to see the ILO paying more attention and giving more resources to employment promotion, as it has been mandated by the Copenhagen Summit.

The Singapore Ministerial Conference of the World Trade Organization has arrived at two very important points relating to the issue of labour standards. First, the use of labour standards for protectionist purposes should be rejected. Second, the comparative advantage of countries, particularly low-wage developing countries, must not be put into question.

We share the assessment of a great number of delegations that "social labelling" will only lead to protectionism, which has been rejected by the Singapore Ministerial Conference. In our view, "social labelling" will not help promote the implementation of labour standards, but rather, will only complicate efforts to strengthen them. We wish to reiterate our position that the most effective way to encourage member States, especially developing countries, to accept and to comply with labour standards is to extend to them more technical assistance and cooperation. The imposition of standards and of any unrealistic supervisory mechanism will bring about only negative effects.

Viet Nam always attaches great importance to labour standard setting and implementation of basic ILO Conventions which provide better protection and better living conditions for workers. In accordance with this policy, we have ratified 12 ILO Conventions and have been making reference to many other instruments in the process of formulating our Labour Code of 1994 and its by-laws, despite the fact that Viet Nam rejoined the ILO only in 1992. At present our Government is considering ratification of Conventions Nos. 100 on equal remuneration and Convention No. 111 on discrimination.

In conclusion, let me assure you that the Government of Viet Nam, while striving for economic development and a just and civilized society, will do its best to fulfil the obligations of an ILO member State.

Mr. BARAK (Government adviser, Israel) — At the outset may I congratulate the President on her election as President of this session of the Conference. I am sure that under her skilled guidance our work will be successful and fruitful.

May I also congratulate the Director-General, Mr. Hansenne, for the thoughtful Report he submitted to the Conference regarding the issue of standard setting in the light of the phenomenon of globalization, which strongly affects the economic and structural environment of our world.

No less important are the reports submitted to the Conference by the Chairperson of the Governing Body describing the activities of our Organization during the last year in a variety of fields within the scope of the ILO's competence. Of these I would like to mention just a few, namely, developing and promoting employment and social policies, participation in the international effort to combat child labour, improving conditions of work and lodging of migrant workers, and dealing with legal issues concerning the supervisory procedures for the implementation of international labour standards.

Turning back to the Director-General's Report, we share with him the opinion that the time has come for an overall evaluation of all problems concerning the standard-setting machinery of the ILO. At the same time, one should add a word of caution as regards the solutions offered by the Director-General in his Report. Indeed, the need for the examination of these problems, which were so amply defined by the Director-General, is apparent, whether in connection with the question of globalization, or as an important and independent issue which needs to be dealt with urgently and systematically. On the other hand, if we are to consider new approaches to the standard-setting procedures, for example, by strengthening the system of Recommendations, we should still adhere to the Conventions as the mainstream of ILO standard setting, so that the obligatory nature of the body of international labour standards will remain intact.

May I refer now to another topic being addressed in this Conference — namely contract labour. Although the legal meaning of this term is quite complicated, it is still clear that we are dealing here with people who are performing work while their status is uncertain. On the one hand, they are not considered as workers, while on the other hand, they are not economically independent, and so cannot be considered as self-employed.

As a rule, in Israel this uncertain status does not exist. We recognize legally either the worker/employer relationship or the status of independently self-employed people. Everyone who performs work must fall into one of these two categories, the labour courts having formulated very clear and wide-ranging definitions for both.

Furthermore, specific legalisation provides that when a worker receives his or her wages not on a monthly, weekly or daily basis but rather on the basis of production, be it the number of units produced or sales success, this does not constitute a derogation from his or her status as a worker entitled to all the benefits provided under labour administration or collective bargaining.

As regards the revision of Convention No. 96 dealing with fee-charging employment agencies, may I mention that in Israel we have provided for the protection of workers in need of the services of private employment agencies by a means of network of wide-ranging legislative measures. Restrictions imposed on these employment agencies concerning the collection of fees from workers, on the one hand, and the principle of equal treatment to be ensured for all workers, without any discrimination, on the other hand, are well-rooted in our legislation. We have also recently provided for these and other measures of protection to cover workers employed by labour contractors.

While indicating our appreciation of the Director-General's main Report, we cannot but express with regret our disappointment with its appendix which, as reflected in its title, is supposed to deal with the situation of the workers of the occupied territories. Instead, it is a highly political Report addressing a range of sensitive issues which are outside the competence and mandate of the ILO in general, and the Director-General's mission in particular.

Because of its bias and inaccuracies, the report cannot be taken seriously. This is a pity, because its real purpose is to focus on technical assistance which the ILO can offer Palestinian workers. Israel is in favour of such assistance and would wish to cooperate, but all this Report has done is to alienate the Government of Israel, ultimately to the detriment of Palestinian workers.

Our guest of honour this morning is His Majesty, King Hussein of Jordan. On behalf of Israel I would like to salute him as one of the great peacemakers of our time. Not only has he made peace between Jordan and Israel, but he has helped keep the Middle East peace process together. Within the peace agreement between our two countries, we are endeavouring to improve conditions for workers on both sides of the border. Among other steps taken in the sphere of labour, a joint industrial park is being planned for the Aqaba-Eilat area and we are contemplating joint activities in the field of vocational training. The potential is great.

In brief, there is as usual much to be done, both at the global level and at the regional level, in cooperation with all our original partners. The ILO must help these endeavours, not hamper them. Now it is time to get down to practical work.

Mr. RYCHLY (Government delegate, Czech Republic) — First of all let me tell you how pleased I am that the Presidency of this session of the Conference was given to a person from Slovakia, a country which still remains so close to the Czechs.

The Report presented to the Conference by the Director-General is certainly not a boring or sterile, theoretical essay. It tries to respond to the challenge of globalization in the economy, with concrete suggestions, which is to be appreciated. I would personally like to express my view on two crucial problems: the universal protection of basic labour rights and the standard-setting activity of the ILO.

The Czech Government welcomes the consensus reached, thanks also to the help of the ILO, as regards the contents of the so-called basic labour rights. These standards, contained in, among others, the seven basic ILO Conventions, are being fully respected by the Czech Republic, and we would naturally welcome their universal implementation. The method chose for their further promotion or supervision — and their definition — should be based on the widest possible consensus of governments and social partners. Moreover, the appropriate mechanism must be given an indubitable legal basis.

As regards the standard-setting activity of this Organization, I welcome all proposals to work for its further improvement. In order to keep this kind of ILO activity as a kind of "jewel" — it must bring in some real "added value". By that, I mean value that cannot be created within the framework of national legislation or collective agreements. Paramount attention must be given to the choice of topics for international instruments, as well as to their appropriate form. This goes not only for future standards, but also for the ones adopted in the past. This is why I can only welcome the fact that on this year's agenda there is a draft amendment of the ILO Constitution enabling it to cancel obsolete and non-functioning standards. I also welcome, in this connection, the negotiations on the revision of Convention No. 96. Just as it is true that governments and parliaments of member States must sometimes go back to existing legal instruments to adjust them to new conditions and needs, it is also true that international standards cannot claim an immortal existence.

The budget proposal for the next two years which is going to be presented to this Conference will contain restrictions in practically all items. These are certainly distressing measures, but they reflect the efforts made by most governments to decrease public expenditure and strengthen public finances. I am afraid that even the Government of the Czech Republic has recently had to take stringent measures, responding to slower economic growth and increasingly unbalanced situations both in international trade and the national budget. After a successful transition towards the market economy and several years characterized by economic growth and improving living standards, we are forced now to make some corrections to our economic policy, as well as to take some other unpopular measures. Apart from the above-mentioned reduction of the state budget, it will be necessary, and here the Government coalition is in agreement with the opposition parties, to reduce the rather too fast growth of wages in both the public and private sectors in order to bring it into harmony with the growth of labour productivity. The Government is also determined to help accelerate the process of structural changes in the micro-economic sphere, even at the cost of an expected moderate increase of the hitherto very low unemployment rate.

It is obvious that these measures can hardly be put through without the understanding and cooperation of the social partners. Our Government has already given an impulse to a renewed dialogue with the most representative associations of employees and employers. Negotiations at the highest level have started. These events are surely not going to be exceptional.

I would like to point out that the corrections our Government recently decided to make in no way mean a withdrawal from the basic targets that were in view from the very beginning of the economic reform and the transition towards the market economy. On the contrary, some steps have to be accelerated. Above all, it is necessary to finalize privatization of a number of strategic enterprises, including banks, and to improve the legal framework for the market.

While respecting international engagements, it will also be necessary to finalize the social reform, with the aim of finding a more effective way of using available resources. A crucial task then remains: searching for a reliable and balanced way of financing pension insurance. It is quite natural that in this field we will be inspired by the best foreign experience and as in the past we are looking forward to cooperating with the ILO.

Mr. RAJAPAKSE (Minister of Labour and Vocational Training, Sri Lanka) — Madam President, on behalf of the delegation of Sri Lanka and on my own behalf, I am greatly honoured to extend to you and the Vice-Presidents of the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference my sincere congratulations. I am confident that under your able leadership this Conference will achieve success through frank and constructive debate.

The Director-General of the ILO deserves our appreciation for submitting his Report on standard setting and globalization to the current session of the Conference. The topics covered in this Report, including social labelling, are important and deserve careful consideration, particularly the effects on developing countries.

The Director-General's remarks on the social dimension and the liberalization of trade contained in his Report are very timely. However, there is another aspect of globalization which is a priority for most of the developing countries. I am referring to the inflow of investments and technology, both of which are essential for rapid economic growth and social development. I think these topics need careful consideration because there are different viewpoints in regard to labour laws and standards and their impact on trade and the inflow of investment and technology.

In over a century Sri Lanka has enacted 45 labour laws. This provides a comprehensive range of benefits and protection — protection to workers that includes freedom of association, minimum wages, conditions of employment including termination of employment, safety and health, social security, protection of women and children, and foreign employment. We are indeed very proud of the record of safety nets that have been provided for our workers. Since 1919 we have used the ILO's standards as a basis for our legislation. In fact, we have ratified 36 ILO Conventions so far and more ratifications are in the pipeline. This is the fourth highest number of ratifications in Asia and the Pacific region. If you compare this figure with some of the fastest growing economies in the region, where there is a large influx of foreign investments, the number of ratifications is much lower.

Sri Lanka, like several other developing countries, has provided attractive packages of incentives to foreign investors. In addition to this, foreign investors often ask for more flexible labour laws and a less regulatory environment. It is said that in faster growing economies, the prevailing labour laws and labour standards are more favourable to investors. This raises a very pertinent question. Is there a link between inflow of foreign investment and labour laws and labour standards?

In his Report the Director-General refers to the findings based on a questionnaire on the social dimensions of the liberalization of trade. He says that there has been a relative decline in the ratification of Conventions. At least in some cases this may be due to reticence to make long-term international commitments. In the same way when it comes to foreign investments too there appears to be a need to examine carefully the extent to which labour laws and standards affect the inflows of foreign investment and technology. The tripartite structure of the ILO provides us with a unique consultative mechanism to examine such issues and reach a balance between the demands of globalization and social protection.

In conclusion, I would like to state that as far as Sri Lanka is concerned, we are firmly committed to democracy, social justice, tripartism and a stable system of social protection for workers. Countries like Sri Lanka with a long tradition of labour protection established labour standards long before the advent of globalization. Therefore, in keeping with the times, we are prepared to review and revise our labour laws and standards. In fact, we have already formulated a national workers' charter in consultation with our social partners. We need to take this process forward so that we can take advantage of the economic and technological benefits of globalization. Following the same line of thought, Sri Lanka will support the proposal for an amendment to the ILO Constitution to authorize the Conference to abrogate Conventions that it considers obsolete. But what we are not prepared to do is to compromise the values that are enshrined in our labour standards — the values to which we are firmly committed, including those that are clearly expressed in the ILO Constitution — and I quote: "Universal and lasting peace can be established only if it is based upon social justice" and "labour is not a commodity". I wish the Conference every success.

Original Spanish: Mr. MODU AKUSE BINDANG (Minister of State for Labour and Social Security, Equatorial Guinea) — On behalf of the delegation of Equatorial Guinea and on my own behalf, may I congratulate the President of the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference on her election. My congratulations are addressed also to the Vice-Presidents and other Officers in the assurance that your well known ability and experience will lead to the successful conclusion of this Conference.

We are aware that the present situation deserves much thought to ensure compliance with the obligations and social progress in the various member States through overall social adjustment which will give a general feeling of well-being.

Our statements may seem repetitive. All regions of the world are represented at this session of the Conference and our objective is to lay a solid basis for lasting social developments. We cannot endeavour to improve the life of our citizens where there is social imbalance.

The Director-General's Report appeals to our consciences. Humanity is facing a major challenge. The world is also confronted with suffering caused by regional and local conflicts, the debilitating effects of sickness, poverty, hunger and natural disaster.

We must endeavour to ensure the future welfare of all nations with vision and in a spirit of tolerance which requires social peace. Isolated efforts are not enough: we must take joint action, there must be solidarity, and especially solidarity between rich and poor so that the ideals of social justice become, not a mere declaration of good intentions, but takes shape to the satisfaction of all member States.

The ILO must create reliable mechanisms leading to true social structure in each member State for the consolidation of social dialogue. By this we mean that we cannot lay the foundation for sustainable development if our structures are not consolidated. We face enormous difficulties.

The Report of the Director-General is an extremely important document which requires of us thorough analysis to come up with the appropriate responses. The ILO's accumulated experience, its objectives and its work are deciding factors. We must commend the Report in its reference to the need to strike a global balance between social and economic progress as a consequence of trade liberalization. We believe the ILO — as in the past, must continue its efforts on the international scene to redress imbalances and improve the worldwide dialogue for greater universality in the dynamic promotion of social progress which recognizes the fundamental rights of workers, giving the appropriate impetus at the institutional level and thereby creating a mechanism of emulation among States.

Many member States of this Organization, like my own country, face major difficulties. We experience difficulties in the stability of employment promotion, in the implementation of the role of the ILO in our existing socio-political structures, including in multiparty democracies. We are also experiencing problems created by the devaluation of the CFA franc, the repayment of our external debt, and structural adjustments as required by the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund. In short, we are having all kinds of difficulties. But we continue to have faith in the role of the ILO in improving our structures and safeguarding social peace in our States.

My country and Government have been, are, and will be walking hand in hand with the ILO as a member State. We have ratified a number of Conventions and are prepared to ratify others. Our people and Government hope to significantly improve our standard of living, thus guaranteeing progress and welfare across society.

On behalf of the Republic of Equatorial Guinea I would like to express the hope that this 85th Session of the International Labour Conference adopts a solemn declaration as a means of recapitulating the essential principles and setting up periodic review mechanisms of social progress throughout the world. We wish to express our gratitude for the ILO's work on behalf of social justice. We hope that the spirit of solidarity between employers and workers will thrive in all member States of this Organization.

Original Spanish: Mr. ARRATE MAC NIVEN (Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, Chile) — I would like to congratulate the President on behalf of the Government of Chile on her election and for the wisdom with which she is presiding over our meeting. My country wishes the ILO and its member States every success in the Organization's future work.

Today's world, at the close of the twentieth century, is going through a process of change that affects every facet of the lives of individuals and nations. There are far greater uncertainties about the future in our globalized world. Old truths have crumbled and people feel less sure about what they are and, more importantly, about what they will be. Scientific and technological changes, the globalization of the economy, the expansion of trade and the revolution in communications have opened up new horizons and more possibilities for progress than existed in the past.

We have to acknowledge that in a world such as ours, that is subject to the onslaught of unforeseen changes, constructive efforts must be made to reach a new equilibrium that will temper the uncertainty without compromising the new opportunities.

Very few institutions, if any are as well placed as the International Labour Organization to contribute to this task of striking a new social balance that will allow for more material and spiritual welfare without further suffering and anguish for our peoples and for our citizens. The ILO, with its unique history and exceptional experience, offers a vigorous and wide-ranging system of standards, as well as the machinery needed to supervise and, if necessary, request observance of these standards. More specifically, the ILO has its own special feature. Unlike any other international organization, it can bring together that wealth of social reality that is tripartism, by virtue of which government authorities, employers and trade unionists can sit around the same table with the aim of reaching agreements.

It is our shared responsibility to forge from this institutional heritage, through concrete proposals and not merely in words a force that can actually contribute to the world economy's further development on an equitable basis for national economies, while at the same time ensuring greater social progress for all and protecting the lot of the most disadvantaged.

To achieve this objective, which I am sure, above and beyond legitimate differences of opinion, is shared by Government, Employer and Worker representatives attending this Conference, I believe that it is vitally urgent to agree on stable, long-term criteria in at least three particular areas.

First, the main thrust of the future should focus on fundamental labour rights. This means pooling our efforts to guarantee that every worker wishing to do so can join a union without hindrance, discrimination or persecution; that any workers wishing to organize in order to collectively bargain over wages and working conditions may do so through effective means; that there is no form of forced labour in the world; that we should progressively eradicate child labour; and that we should effectively condemn in words and in practice every illegitimate form of discrimination at the workplace.

As the Director-General stated in his Report, this will require new forms of inspection and supervision.

Without these, our Organization will not have the necessary credibility and effectiveness, and eventually other international bodies — be they multilateral or regional — will probably attempt, however poorly, to replace the ILO in performing its natural role.

As far as Chile is concerned, it is quite clear that these new forms of inspection and supervision should fully guarantee that the benefits of free trade for the relatively less-developed countries cannot be cancelled out by arbitrary decisions taken by other countries, especially if there is a protectionist intention underlying them. My country rejects all forms of protectionism that are rooted in narrow interests, that deny the poorest countries the chances of bettering their lot. But we also reject that other form of protectionism which protects privileges and blatant injustices, and which prevents the benefits of trade and growth from being distributed equitably, and from reaching workers and citizens at the bottom of society's ladder.

On this very important question our Organization must take centre stage in forging a tripartite consensus.

Second, I believe the proposal to revise the existing Conventions is consistent with my first point, and warrants support, so as to ensure that in cases where they can be declared obsolete, and through procedures such as the one proposed by the Director-General, these Conventions are properly revised. Our main concern must be to provide for greater transparency for all the international criteria that are garnered together within the Conventions.

Third and finally, I believe that it is vital for the performance of the tasks that I have spelt out that the ILO have adequate and stable funding, that it is not subject to the uncertainties that have bedevilled us over the last few years. At the same time, to do this there must be a major review and reform of our existing institutional structure that goes beyond the positive efforts made these past few years.

In the future, our Organization must be more focused on these new international concerns, with clearer and more precise objectives. Its strength will not depend on its size, its infrastructure or the number of people that work for it, but rather on its universal scope, on the high professional and technical quality of its staff, on the efficiency with which it is run, on its follow-up and evaluation machinery and its independence of thought and judgement.

The ILO cannot shrink away from these challenges, however difficult they may be. I hope that together we will have the courage to face up to them, with the combination of prudence and boldness that they demand.

Eleventh (special) sitting

Friday, 13 June 1997, 11 a.m.

President: Ms. Keltošová

ADDRESS BY H.M. KING HUSSEIN IBN TALAL OF THE HASHEMITE KINGDOM OF JORDAN

The PRESIDENT — Today our Conference is honoured by the visit of His Majesty King Hussein Ibn Talal of the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan and Her Majesty Queen Nour.

I have great pleasure in declaring open this special sitting of the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference, and I call on the Secretary-General of the Conference to introduce His Majesty King Hussein of Jordan to the Conference.

Original French: The SECRETARY-GENERAL — It is a great honour for me to introduce His Majesty King Hussein Ibn Talal of the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan to the Conference.

Your Majesty, on behalf of the entire international tripartite community gathered here may I extend to you, as well as to Her Majesty Queen Nour, a cordial welcome to the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference.

In you, your Majesty, the world sees a figure striving for a just, comprehensive and lasting peace. You are one of those who engage in dispassionate and constructive dialogue, favouring mutual understanding and a rapprochement between peoples. Your unswerving, courageous and determined efforts at every stage of the Middle East peace process constitute undeniable proof of this, and they merit the gratitude of the ILO and of all who share its convictions.

Your presence here this morning is a token of your attachment to the universal ideals and values nurtured by the International Labour Organization over 79 years, in other words the pursuit of peace through social justice.

It is our desire to defend these values in the globalizing economy that we are now facing, with all the hopes and uncertainties that it arouses. This implies our engagement in the struggle against poverty and for the promotion of employment, the protection of workers' fundamental rights, and the fostering of democracy.

The ILO shares these objectives with a number of countries, including the Kingdom of Jordan, which has already ratified five fundamental Conventions and which maintains close ties with our Organization through a successful partnership policy and a satisfactory cooperation programme.

In Jordan these ratifications have been implemented through a clearly expressed political will and concrete action designed to reduce social inequality, to focus on the promotion of employment for the largest possible number and to conduct a constructive dialogue with the social partners.

The new labour legislation adopted by the Kingdom of Jordan puts into tangible form the universal principles of equality and justice which constitute the foundations of our Organization. The priority given to equality of opportunity and treatment between men and women in employment, and the fostering of collective bargaining and the settlement of disputes by legal means, also deserve mention.

Within its terms of reference the ILO will, together with those who share its ideals, pursue its endeavours to promote peace wherever it is called upon to act. It is doing this in the Middle East and in other regions of the world, for the hopes it nurtures for social peace are commensurate with the legitimate expectations of the entire international community.

Your Majesty, we are delighted that you have accepted our invitation to address this assembly and we look forward to hearing your message.

The PRESIDENT — It is now my great privilege to invite His Majesty to address the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference.

Original Arabic: HIS MAJESTY KING HUSSEIN IBN TALAL OF THE HASHEMITE KINGDOM OF JORDAN — In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful! Peace be upon you, and God's mercy and His blessings.

It is a pleasure and an honour for me to be among you here today on the occasion of the 85th International Labour Conference, in response to the kind invitation of my dear friend, His Excellency Mr. Michel Hansenne, the Director-General of the ILO, who has my deep respect and appreciation for his hard work, renowned experience and wisdom in carrying out his global responsibilities.

It is also my pleasure to congratulate Her Excellency Mrs. Olga Keltošová on her election as President of this Conference, and I wish her every success in this session of the Conference. Greetings also to their excellencies, the heads and members of all participating delegations, at this unique gathering of the three pillars of production: government, employers and workers. This tripartite structure, is indeed, the essence of the strength of the ILO and its continuity in an ever-changing world.

During the past few decades we in Jordan have made great strides at all levels of life, whether political, economic, social or legislative. Our infrastructure forms a solid base for our development effort. We have always taken time to re-examine our policies and undertake the necessary steps to reform in accordance with the needs of the day, and in response to even greater strides in technological innovation and to the changing regional and international environment. Our economic restructuring programme is a manifestation of our economic adaptability and of our willingness to achieve the highest possible degree of self-reliance within a well- balanced, flexible and competitive environment to ensure a smooth transition to higher levels of economic activity.

Understanding, full comprehensive and gentle democratic dialogue were the hallmarks of creating a consensus amongst us. By ensuring that all interests are catered for, we have managed to lessen the impact of inconsistencies and imbalances. This approach is the only alternative to confrontation and strife. We have always recognized that the individual is Jordan's first real resource which has been the compensatory factor for the deficiency of our natural resources. Our policies were geared towards improving the standard of living of the average Jordanian and to provide the necessary social welfare.

The Jordanian Constitution laid down, over 45 years ago, the noble values of work and protected the rights of workers in unambiguous terms of clarity and justice. Since the promulgation of our Constitution and our accession to the ILO back in 1956, we were always inspired, and continue to be, by the principles of the ILO in our legislation in employment, vocational and technical training, as well as social security.

My Government has ratified six of the seven main Conventions concerning basic human rights. The most recent Convention ratified by the Cabinet was Convention No. 138 concerning minimum age. This Convention is undergoing the necessary constitutional procedure for its final adoption and application thereafter. As to Convention No. 87 concerning freedom of association and the protection of the right to organize, existing Jordanian legislation already stipulates the protection of freedom and labour rights, as well as the right to organize in professional and labour associations. That Convention shall certainly have my Government's consideration and attention.

I take this opportunity to emphasize the excellent relations Jordan enjoys with the ILO and its various components, and I look forward to even greater levels of cooperation in the future.

It is not a coincidence that the entire world in 1994 joined this Organization in the celebration of two important events: the 75th anniversary of the establishment of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the famous Philadelphia Declaration. It is also not a coincidence that the ILO received the Nobel Peace Prize in 1969 on the occasion of its 50th anniversary. This took place in recognition, and in appreciation, of the importance of the role of this Organization as a unique international organization with its tripartite composition, and historical roots based on a philosophy centred on the individual, wherever he or she may be, and in total disregard of origin, colour, nationality or belief, always emphasizing world peace and achieving justice as well as the social, spiritual and material welfare of mankind. Therefore, such an institution deserves all respect and appreciation and merits our entire support, be it nationally, regionally or internationally, to go together towards a bright new future.

Our world witnesses a new era today — a real revolution in all forms, that of science and globalization. It is a revolution that has established new dawns of excellence and innovation, adding new dimensions to industry, production and communications and fresh aspects to knowledge, which has transformed the world into a global village — removing borders, bringing down walls, dismantling psychological as well as material barriers among peoples and nations, and thus ending the era of isolation and the remnants of the cold war. It has imposed on us all and on the world community new realities on the ground, with fresh challenges and problems of a nature never seen before by mankind.

Such a revolution comes at a time when the world still suffers from so many worrying social and labour problems: increasing poverty, rising unemployment, weakening means of production, the ever-increasing requirements of vocational and technological training, worsening conditions of employment, issues of labour immigration, employment of women, children and youths, as well as those with special needs, and numerous other issues at the workplace. Additionally, those problems prevailing in developing and the less developed countries in particular — such as chronic slow growth, scarce natural resources, low financial and investment capabilities, their ever-increasing indebtedness, as well as the dangers of isolationism, inequality and, finally, their economic and political marginalization — all affect their adjustment and integration into the world economy.

In view of such changes, it has become clear that nations as well as international organizations have embarked on an unfair competition, leading to a situation where economic might wins over social matters, thus adversely affecting the gains of development and social welfare that were achieved by millions of workers in the world through hard work over so many years. In this respect I would like to emphasize that democratic dialogue among the concerned parties is the only course whereby conflict can give way to harmony leading to a just, balanced and fair solution to all problems.

It is a good omen that for a number of years the entire United Nations and all of its specialized agencies (of which the ILO is one) now not only take a more pragmatic and objective look at world affairs but have also acquired a clarity of vision and a sense of responsibility that are deeply heightened. We are very optimistic that the ILO is closely following up the positive outcome of the World Summit for Social Development held in March 1995. The Summit's Copenhagen Declaration should eventually pave the way to the emergence of a fair, open and efficient world order which will balance the costs and benefits of globalization among all the nations of the world.

By its diligent and active participation in peacemaking, Jordan translated its long held and total belief in a just, comprehensive and durable peace in the Middle East by signing a peace treaty with Israel in 1994. We have totally fulfilled the conditions, obligations and requirements of that treaty, for we have always believed that true peace requires that all concerned parties honour fully their signed agreements in letter and spirit. What is required now, for the continuation of the peace process, is a complete cessation of disconcerting policies and practices that contradict international legitimacy, such as the policies of settlement, land confiscation (especially in Arab Jerusalem) and demographic manipulation which, in their totality as well as in their individual aspects, breach obligations entered into in good faith to discuss all these areas in the current and in the final-status negotiations; for such policies and practices would endanger hopes and detract from the aim of achieving a lasting, just and comprehensive peace. Such policies would also have an adverse effect on endeavours to revive the other peace tracks still lagging behind.

For our part, we shall continue to work for the achievement of such a peace in which we believe. A peace that is just, comprehensive and durable is one that will provide the future generations of the children of Abraham with the opportunities they have always longed for, one in which Jerusalem will be the symbol of harmonious consistence among the followers of the three monotheistic religions, and of piety in worshipping God and God alone.

Under such a peace, Jerusalem will also represent the achievement of an Arab-Israeli peace, and more particularly a Palestinian-Israeli peace in an open city constituting in its eastern and western parts a capital of both Palestine and Israel, or in any such manner that the Palestinian and Israeli parties may — within the parameters of the rules of international law — agree upon in negotiating a final-status settlement.

Let me conclude by saying that we recognize the ILO as the beacon of light which leads the world's future generations — who long for security and real economic and social stability — towards a new dawn of just, righteous and equitable peace.

I wish you every success in your deliberations.

May God's peace and His blessings be upon you.

The PRESIDENT — It is a great pleasure for me to express to your Majesty on behalf of all the participants of this Conference our deep gratitude for the honour you have bestowed upon us by your presence and your powerful address.

Your Majesty, while listening to you, I understood better than ever why your unique leadership is respected and recognized all over the world. You are known to be a ruler of wisdom and courage who dares to face complex and difficult situations with confidence. The most well-known example is, of course, your engagement in promoting peace, not only in the Middle East but also in other regions. Convinced that the advancement and prosperity of the region necessitates harmonious relations between all of its inhabitants, you called for dialogue and new beginnings. While advocating the resolution of conflicts by diplomatic means rather than the use of force, you never forgot that lasting peace could only be built on justice, and continue to fight for the rights of those who suffered as a result of conflicts.

Much courage and wisdom was required also for the transformation of the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan from a tribal and nomadic society to a modern State. We admire your efforts to promote the economic and social development of your country, in spite of set-backs caused by nearby conflict situations and the resulting influx of refugees. Your task was not, and is not, an easy one, yet while modernizing Jordan's society and economy you succeeded in safeguarding your Kingdom's rich cultural heritage as well as its ethnic and religious plurality.

The support you give to the principles of human rights and your appreciation of the importance of tripartism are observed with particular satisfaction by this distinguished assembly. The effective role of the social partners in the socio-economic development of your Kingdom has already produced visible results. These developments would not have been possible without your personal engagement in promoting consultation and cooperation between the social partners.

Your Majesty, allow me to make special mention of your personal engagement in promoting the participation of women in your country's economic and social development. We understand that the prominent role played in this respect by Her Majesty Queen Nour has made an inestimable contribution to the advancement of Jordan's women. In my capacity as Minister of Labour, Social Affairs and the Family, I am very much aware of the importance of women's contribution to social welfare and social progress. I am convinced that our global community can only respond to the challenges of our times if it makes use of all of its human resources. It gives me great satisfaction to know that world leaders like Your Majesties are in the forefront of advancing the status of women through words and deeds.

Your Majesty's appreciation of the ILO's worldwide efforts to combat child labour is a great source of joy for us. However, it gives us even more comfort to know that, while not facing the problem of child labour as it exists in many other countries, you decided to take preventive measures and established a foundation to this end. This should serve as an example to all of us who are eager to ensure the safety, health and development of our most precious resource, our children.

Your Majesty, accept once again our deepest gratitude for honouring our Conference with your presence and for enabling us to listen to the inspiring words of a true statesman.

May your great international prestige and the wisdom and courage that have always guided your actions be a source of renewal in the search for peace in your region.

Original French: The PRESIDENT (Ms. SASSO MAZZUFFERI) — We now resume the discussion of the reports of the Chairperson of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Original Spanish: Mr. CORRALES LEAL (Government delegate, Venezuela) — May I, on behalf of the Venezuelan delegation, congratulate the President on her election as President of this session of the International Labour Conference.

Both States and the multilateral system must be proactive in responding to the changes which are observed in the worldwide economy. They must respond in ways which will help them adjust their own institutions and structures towards greater growth, but also ways which encourage the benefits of this growth and a better, more equitable distribution of the wealth thus generated.

The clearest signs of these economic changes can be seen in the internationalization of decisions on relocalization, investment and technology, and not merely in the increase in international trade. This results in worldwide adjustments and a new logic in determining how to gain competitive advantages and how to carry out added value processes. Obviously the new forms of production and competition in a globalized market play a decisive role in determining models for generating employment, for investing economic surpluses and distributing the benefits of growth among the different societies in the world, and among the different social strata within each country.

How should the multilateral system deal with the undeniable need for a body of standards which not only fosters trade and growth but also, and in particular, access to the benefits which result from them? How can it solve the equally obvious need for these standards to be effective in practice and not merely formal; for them to be enforceable and assessable?

In the field of trade, the WTO is doing its part. Virtually all the countries of the world are involved, through that organization, in establishing new standards and structures to benefit all, while at the same time defending individual interests. The economic interests of any State which considers that it has been adversely affected by the trade behaviour of others must be settled in the WTO, and not elsewhere, in the light of the appropriate consideration of subsidies, dumping or other practices which might be considered as unfair.

The ILO, for its part, is responsible in its specific field — labour — for renewing and making ever more effective its own instruments in order to deal with these same economic changes, to foster social progress and a better distribution of the benefits of growth. Venezuela welcomes the Report of the Director-General which opens the way for a renewal of the Organization — a renewal which obviously cannot wait. We share with the Director-General the desire to accelerate the revitalization process, by effectively strengthening the application of the fundamental labour standards throughout the world, and by bolstering the Organization's ability to promote standards and its capacity to assess progress in the application thereof.

In order to carry out this renewal, we do not need to reinvent the ILO's field of activity. It is already clearly defined in its mandate. We must instead give greater strength and dynamism to the machinery which is legitimately available to the Organization. To extend the responsibility of the Organization to take up matters or manage instruments outside its remit is to detract from its strength, from its ability to negotiate, and from its credibility in its own field of competence.

The ILO cannot fail to consider the overall social impact of globalization, which is a fact of life which it can address. But it must not be used as a forum or a tool to promote the trade strategies of certain countries. These may try to renew protectionist barriers under the pretext of social progress for workers in countries where proper application of the fundamental labour standards is lacking.

It is not by applying trade barriers to the exports of the developing countries that we can promote progress or improve levels of employment or wages in these societies. We must therefore reject the use of any means of trade restriction as a tool for the implementation of basic labour standards. These rules must not be used to justify discrimination or trade protectionism, which would have the same effect.

In this framework, we should like to express our concern and disagreement with the proposals for a social label, which would be a unilateral trade barrier applied in the interest of a certain group of developed countries. The acceptance of this measure would legitimize the use of labour standards for the purposes of trade protectionism.

However, just as it is not acceptable to use labour standards for protectionist ends, we cannot deny the need for specific and visible reforms in certain countries in the labour field, nor can we overlook the urgent need to strengthen the weak machinery currently available to the ILO for assessment and monitoring of compliance with the fundamental standards.

In the light of these thoughts, Venezuela recognizes the importance and appropriateness of much of the thinking in the Director-General's Report. There is indeed a need to renew the standard-setting function of the ILO, to adapt and strengthen its means of action in today's changing world, and to safeguard the values which have stood behind its work since its creation, particularly the affirmation of dignity in and through work, and the search for social justice.

In our opinion, strengthening the ILO should include three immediate lines of action. Firstly, the selection and review of those Conventions which may be considered as fundamental to labour protection, and the drafting of a declaration on this matter. In the same vein, we welcome the amendment to article 19 of the ILO's Constitution authorizing the Conference to abrogate Conventions which are considered to be obsolete. Secondly, the definition of an effective strategy to promote the ratification of the appropriate international Conventions by those States which have not yet acceded to them, and thirdly, the study of specific follow-up and supervisory machinery for the application of standards, and of recommendations to be made by the Organization with due respect for the sovereignty of each State, as this is a fundamental principle of international law.

As Venezuela is attuned with the changes taking place in the worldwide economy, our country has carried out wide-ranging reforms which open the way for sustainable growth and an overall modernization of its economic apparatus, while at the same time promoting greater participation of the social partners in decisions relating to reform. These reforms also strengthen stability in employment levels and increase workers' social benefits. For example, a tripartite agreement on comprehensive social security was signed on 17 March 1997. It confirms the importance attached to social consultation and consensus as the appropriate means to be used in updating labour legislation.

As a consequence of this agreement, we are now submitting to the National Congress four draft bills which will fulfil the following objectives: Reform of the labour code (which was adopted this week); the draft framework law on comprehensive social security; the draft law on pension and retirement funds; and the draft law on forced labour and vocational training.

Institutionally, these agreements and the legislation to which they have given rise are going hand in hand with modernization and extensive reform in the Ministry of Labour. In conclusion, we hope that the deliberations and conclusions arrived at during this Conference will lead to a strengthening of the renewal of the ILO, and contribute to better compliance with the fundamental labour standards. We are committed to the values and objectives of the Organization, and reiterate our will to actively participate in strengthening it.

Mr. BEDA (Minister of Manpower, Sudan) — Madam President, on behalf of the Sudanese delegation and on my own behalf, allow me to join the others in congratulating you on your election as President of the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference. We are confident that through your wisdom and able leadership this session will reach fruitful conclusions.

At the outset, I commend the Director-General on his inspiring Report on ILO standard setting and globalization. Against the background of the wider debate on the issue at the Governing Body level since 1994 and at the Conference level during the previous session, we would like to emphasize some of the salient elements that are closely related to the attainment of social progress in the developing countries.

First, the liberalization of trade, though important for achieving greater balance in trade for the benefit of developing countries after the protectionist measures from which they have suffered, cannot be favourable to these countries unless it is linked to the removal of other barriers to allow for the transfer of capital and technology to the developing countries. If this were the case, there would be the hope of benefitting from sustainable economic growth and achieving social progress, even if it occurs at a slower pace than that expressed by several ministers of trade at the Singapore Conference.

Second, commitment to the values of the ILO in respect of workers' rights, as embodied in the Constitution of the ILO and the Declaration of Philadelphia, cannot be overemphasized as manifested by these countries in all international and regional fora. In this connection, the developing countries are firm about using their comparative advantages to be competitive in the world markets, while adhering to and observing workers' basic rights.

Third, the respect for the implementation of workers' basic rights should in no way be used as imposed sanctions conducive to a new form of trade protectionism. For the developing countries, an in-depth and thorough study of the difficulties encountered in both ratifying and implementing these Conventions should be supported by the ILO through its technical cooperation activities. It is hoped that multidisciplinary teams, covering most of the constituents, would play a positive role in this respect.

Fourth, for the developing countries, we see that respect of workers' rights should not be isolated from overall social development based on economic growth, particularly as far as poverty alleviation, employment creation and social justice are concerned. The promotion of policies, taking into consideration the commitments of the Copenhagen Social Summit and the Beijing Declaration and Platform for Action, is a matter of paramount importance to be addressed by the ILO through technical cooperation in the context of the new programme and budget for the years 1998-99.

Fifth, in the prevailing political environment following the end of the cold war and the bipolar world, worries are growing in the developing countries that international trade will not occur within a framework of neutrality due to the use of the double standard approach to isolate specific countries. These unfair practices will surely prevent such countries from enjoying the fruits of globalization and the attainment of social progress.

In the light of the preceding observations, we would like to comment on the ideas submitted by the Director-General as follows:

It is a fact that in all the international and regional fora the member States of the ILO strongly express their commitment to the core Conventions of the ILO on human rights. My country, the Sudan, has ratified most of these Conventions and we are also studying and considering the possibility of ratification of the others in close consultation with the social partners. We would just like to add here that the existing constitutional institutions should be fully utilized to reach that end. This type of practice should be encouraged within the existing constitutional institutions. Any declaration on core labour standards extending obligations to those who are not party to the ILO Conventions would contravene the principle of voluntary adherence by States and would create problems that prevent members States from ratifying.

On the idea of social labelling, we have doubts about the results in view of the dangers enumerated by the Director-General himself and moreover due to the fact that labour standards would be legitimately used to promote trade protectionism.

As to the question of more targeted standards in order to achieve greater impact, the changing world needs the ILO Members to review existing labour standards in order to amend or adapt them. In this respect, we strongly support the amendments of the Constitution of the ILO placed on the agenda of the Conference and appreciate the input of the Working Party of the Governing Body regarding the Revision of Standards.

We share the view that the supervisory system needs to be evaluated to be more fair in the selection and treatment of cases. The system should not be open to use the double standard approach that serves political interests.

In our view, the ongoing debate should continue by gathering all the ideas expressed at the Conference and compiling them for in-depth discussion by the Governing Body. In this way, the Conference will be in a better position to reach appropriate conclusions on the issue.

Having said that, we would like briefly to shed light on some recent developments on social progress in the Sudan.

To put an end to the protracted civil conflict in the southern part of the Sudan that destroyed the social infrastructure and caused misery to the population through refuge and displacement, and even hampered economic and social development in the whole country for many years, a peace agreement has been reached between the Government and the Democratic National Salvation Front which comprises many of the warring factions. The agreement guarantees basic human rights and fundamental freedoms, such as the right to equal treatment, irrespective of gender, race, colour, religion or origin; the right to freedom of thought and conscience; freedom of association and assembly; freedom of movement; freedom of the press; immunity against arbitrary arrest; detention and torture; as well as freedom of religious worship and preaching. The agreement resolved all the issues of the conflict through political power sharing, equitable distribution of wealth and special provision for rehabilitation and reconstruction within a four-year transitional period. After that a referendum is to be conducted for the southern Sudanese to determine their self-determination, whether to remain in one Sudan, or to separate. At this juncture we call upon the international community to support these efforts, particularly the efforts of rehabilitation and reconstruction. And the International Labour Organization is also invited to play a leading role, through technical assistance, to support projects aimed at the alleviation of poverty and the generation of employment.

At the end of last month the National Assembly passed a bill for a new labour law to introduce incremental benefits for workers in respect of sick leave, after-service benefits, overtime compensation and, moreover, to open new avenues for workers' participation in decision making, and for women's rights.

This year witnessed new workers' elections on all structural levels up to the National Workers' Federation. These elections were freely and democratically conducted according to the basic regulations of workers' federations, and under the supervision of independent committees of the judiciary.

The social insurance system has been extended to cover establishments employing five workers instead of ten to give more protection to workers in small-scale enterprises.

In conclusion, we would like to call on the Director-General to continue his mission to Palestine and the other occupied territories to monitor the situation of Arab workers in view of the difficulties they are encountering.

Original Spanish: Mr. CARVAJAL BUSTAMANTE (Employers' delegate, Mexico) — Madam President, we are quite sure that your guidance of the work of this 85th Session of the International Labour Conference will be successful, and we congratulate you on that.

We wish to pay particular attention to the immense benefit derived from the various ILO Conventions, the fruit of the joint endeavours of the social partners, and in particular I wish to refer to those Conventions that enshrine fundamental rights.

These basic principles have given force and coherence to the relations between workers and employers, and in turn they have facilitated the coordination and monitoring work of government authorities. The standard-setting activities of the Organization which have been carried out over more than 75 years of the existence of the Organization, have always been based on the prevailing conditions in the world at various stages: those of the industrial revolution, of the postwar period, of the cold war, of the East-West confrontation, and its ideological divergencies have covered countless aspects of the world of work. And they have even impinged upon questions that, in our view, exceed the initial mandate of the Organization.

If we make a quick analysis of the contents of the Conventions that are born of this Conference we will see in some repetition and excess, and in others obsolescence and unenforcebility.

The employers have been subject to excessive standard-setting activities at the national level and in accordance with national conditions and practices. The effects of these have been to discourage investment, to bloat public administrations without leading to better results on the ground in terms of benefits for the workers and increased productivity at work. Too many rules do not spur efficiency.

In other spheres of international relations, and I would quote the case of the OECD, we have been able to appreciate an organization that has provided machinery that has served to stimulate development through deregulation and making standards more flexible. We concur with this outlook and this is the way, indeed, that things are going throughout the world.

If we think about the future of ILO standard-setting activities, we wonder is the inertia of the early days to be continued? Will these activities be responsive to the prevailing conditions in the world? Will creating more and more standards provide a response to the fundamental problems of job creation throughout the world? Can you combat poverty by decree?

We believe that we should channel efforts and resources — which are ever more scarce and thus necessarily more demanding with regard to results — into relevant studies and activities that will be designed to protect existing jobs and to create new ones that will, in turn, lead to greater efficiency, consistent productivity, which is in our view a basic element for sustainable development.

In Mexico we have had to face up to a recent experience in combating the effects of a very serious crisis which has had repercussions beyond our frontiers. With discipline, and taking our nation's interests clearly to heart, we employers, workers and government representatives have put together our efforts to hammer out some very difficult and painful solutions that will lead us to a future of more hope. The consultations, commitments and dialogue between the social partners have guided our steps towards controlling inflation and restoring the health of the economy.

As part of these endeavours, we are committed to deregulation in our search for higher efficiency and better results. A significant example of this is to be found in the compendium of measures in favour of deregulation and administrative simplification taken by the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare as part of the National Deregulation Committee, in which the employers participate. Furthermore, there is unswerving dialogue within the Alliance for Growth, that makes it possible for us to be permanently on the watch so that we may iron out any distortions in good time.

In regular contacts with the representatives of workers, we have set up what is called the New Labour Culture, which serves to define and ratify principles, to lay the foundations for relations between workers and employers, and to provide a set of mechanisms which, when implemented, lead to job creation.

The national commitment of employers and workers is translated into practice through the fulfilment of labour standards as a self-controlling mechanism which obviates the need for any other international machinery, including labelling. We feel, Director-General, that this noble body houses a wealth of options, possibilities and abilities. We believe that, when we are confronting serious challenges, that a major contribution to growth and development, employment generation combating poverty would be to undertake a prompt investigation and bring experts together, such as regional meetings of the social partners, to discuss the subject of investment oriented towards job creation in the framework of trade liberalization, since employment is the safest guarantee for human progress.

Original Arabic: Mr. SAHBANI (Workers' delegate, Tunisia) — Allow me, Madam President, as other speakers have, to express to you my warm congratulations on your election to preside over this important session in the history of our Organization. I wish you full success in you task. I thank Mr. Hansenne, the Director-General, for the Report he has submitted to the Conference. It is a Report rich in proposals bearing solutions to certain problems of the world of work at the beginning of the third millennium.

The questions raised in the Report before us are important, vital. We are all called upon to involve ourselves more to help strengthen the role of this Organization, a role that is based to a great extent on its standard-setting activities and on the set of core Conventions which represent the foundation for social justice, a fair distribution of the fruits of development and safeguarding workers' dignity.

As far as the dignity of the human person is concerned, the idea of "taking a break" from standard setting, called for by some, is a matter that we reject out of hand, as it represents a denial of workers' dignity.

Some are trying to use this period of transition that the world is witnessing as a result of globalization, to deny the values and common denominators, established patiently and at the price of many sacrifices over seven decades.

I believe that the Director-General's Report hits the nail on the head, as it emphasizes the threats that may affect the great human heritage that this Organization successfully represents through the Conventions and standards adopted since its establishment. It also helps by providing new visions which help bring us near to our goal, namely the achievement of social justice. We therefore wish to commend the Director-General who has underlined that the achievement of this goal depends on the existence of a clear political will.

Without being overly optimistic, we believe that this will has now begun to take shape through the unanimous international support for the International Labour Organization; this has shown itself more specifically through the decisions of the Copenhagen Social Summit as well as the Declaration of the Singapore Ministerial Conference of the World Trade Organization.

This unanimity calls on us to find new ways and means of working to achieve a better degree of effectiveness as well as more progress in the field of social development.

In this regard, the Organization can use the authority vested in it by the Constitution, to question governments as to the reasons for failure to ratify or to adapt their legislation in such a way that their laws and practices conform to the overall goals of this Organization. This is why we support the explicit reference in the Report to the need to ensure a binding commitment to a minimum of fundamental rights which must be established and that these must be respected by all member States.

As a trade union organization, we supported at the time the question of the social clause as a mechanism to liberate trade relations. Today we believe that the current developments in fact confirm the justice of our stand. This gives us all the more reason to adhere to the principles of the social clause, as a minimum that we cannot give up, because the Conventions carrying that clause represent the best expression of the dignity of the workforce. Alow me here to refer to the experience of my country, Tunisia. We have ratified the core Conventions. This has had a positive effect on our social relations and their stability on the one hand, and on economic development on the other. The legislative groundwork has allowed us to establish an environment that guarantees trade union rights, enables their practice and implementation, and provides for the success of contractual relationships between the social partners. Though this policy we have succeeded in improving the wages of all earners for nine consecutive years. We have also succeeded in improving social legislation and working conditions, as well as providing better social protection for the most vulnerable groups. We have thereby enhanced the principles of solidarity and social justice in our country.

The Director-General's report on the situation of Palestinians in the occupied Arab territories was brave and far-sighted. We would like to seize this opportunity to refuse the Israeli denial of respect for its commitment aimed at ensuring a just peace in the region. We call for a halt to new settlements, an end to the occupation of Arab territories, and for recognition of the rights of the Palestinian people to establish an independent State with its capital in Jerusalem.

Original Spanish: Mr. DUCREUX (Government delegate, Panama) — On behalf of my Government and of the Panamian delegation may I greet the Director-General of the ILO as well as all members of delegations to this 85th Session of the International Labour Conference. May I greet and congratulate the Minister of Labour of the Republic of Slovakia, Mrs. Olga Keltošová on her election as President of this session of the Conference.

On reading the Director-General's Report The ILO, standard setting and globalization, our first impression is that despite the hopes it raises and promises it makes the liberalization of international trade might well flounder if its beneficial effects are as slow in making themselves felt for workers or if it is associated with an increase in inequalities or precarious conditions. Furthermore, it indicates that economic progress resulting from the liberalization of trade should be accompanied by social progress.

As a developing country, we are pursuing a dynamic plan for social development allied to economic effectiveness, the prime concern of which is to put a stop to spiralling unemployment, which is a must to permit our country to walk the road of competition and economic effectiveness, thus reducing the costs of goods and services and attracting national and foreign investment, and thereby ensuring Panama's full participation in the world economy.

We believe that the progress of globalization should generate considerable benefits for the international community and we must therefore ask ourselves whether or not the distribution, quality and profits derived from globalization and foreign investment will benefit all equally.

"Poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere" states the Declaration of Philadelphia; this is an interdependent world which requires joint solidarity. It is necessary for the ILO to define the terms of reference as well as the scope of the social aspect of the process of globalization. We must not overlook the fact that worldwide economic growth is only the means — the social welfare of humanity is the real end.

The Director-General warns us of the need to strengthen the application of workers' fundamental rights within the framework of the liberalization of world trade and of the globalization of the economy and stresses the need to revise and update the body of standards, something which is a source of pride for the ILO. A constitutional amendment has therefore been proposed which would empower the Conference to abrogate those Conventions which are deemed obsolete. My country considers it necessary to ensure the strengthening of the universal principles which guide the life of the ILO as the most effective way of opposing the growing dangers arising from globalization in the absence of a social dimension and of ensuring a worldwide cooperation system which will protect all, with no national or social exclusions whatsoever.

On 7 January 1997, my Government, through the Cabinet Council, promulgated Decree Law No. 3 improving the procedure for the establishment of enterprises in export processing zones, as well as other measures. This Decree Law is part of our public policy programme to ensure integral development to stimulate both national as well as foreign investment. These EPZs or industrial parks, will concentrate on the export of medium and high technology goods and other services. The Government is prepared to guarantee the respect for the fundamental rights of workers embodied in the Conventions on freedom of association, collective bargaining, minimum wage, and in other labour legislation provisions.

Since 1 September 1994 the Government has been concerned by the fate of public sector workers, in particular those working for electricity, communications and other services where the previous Government had carried out arbitrary dismissals for political reasons without justification. Our special objective has been the payment of wages in arrears and the reinstatement of many of these workers. The ILO bears witness to this as the result of the sending of official documentation on these cases to the Governing Body.

My delegation would like to express its opinion on the latest complaint lodged by the Latin American Central of Workers against the Government for the dismissal of 94 air traffic controllers. The Government has supplied information giving legal justification for the dismissal of these workers who, owing to their position of strength, imperilled international air traffic over our territory, putting the lives of many at risk. The Government was thus obeying national legislation which, over and above the good of the individual or the group, ensures general welfare and safety. This is a principle embodied in our Constitution. I must point out that all of these dismissed officials were paid every cent of the moneys to which they were entitled.

In conclusion, since it came into power, the present Government of Panama has endeavoured to implement a new law on careers in government which will govern and bring into force the new provisions relating to all public servants. In this way we intend to provide a clear definition of the new status of public servants.

Mr. CHO (Employers' delegate, Republic of Korea) — On behalf of the Employers' delegation of the Republic of Korea I take great pleasure in extending our sincere congratulations to Madam Keltosová on her election as President of this session of the International Labour Conference.

Amidst the ongoing globalization of the world economy it is high time to earnestly discuss, on the basis of the Director-General's Report, how to lay the groundwork for progress and maintain momentum.

Globalization is a process through which goods and capital can freely circulate in an expanding market. Of course, there are two sides to every question, but I believe the Director-General's Report overemphasizes the negative impact by arguing that globalization inevitably implies a downward levelling of wages and that the increasingly global economy is accompanied by restrictions and inequalities which give rise to tensions and upheaval.

On the contrary, an invigorated global market will be a major source of opportunities. The generation of wealth and its fair distribution increase the purchasing power for products and services. Profits and savings are the sources of new investment for expansion. Workers' rights will also be promoted in accordance with economic development.

It is encouraging to note that the ILO's ratification campaign has obtained considerable success. The recent decision made by the Governing Body to request member States to submit reports on core Conventions at more frequent intervals can encourage the States which have not yet ratified them to do so. A declaration on the basic principles of core Conventions can be envisaged. Another mechanism for the supervision of the application of ratified or unratified Conventions could be discussed in the form of a report by the Director-General on social progress throughout the world. However, these measures should be undertaken within the context of the Constitution.

Korean employers oppose officially sponsored, endorsed or promoted voluntary labelling schemes which border on official boycotts, and which distort trade and violate the spirit, and possibly the letter itself, of the rules of an open trading system. The Report says that granting a label does not imply discrimination in trade against unlabelled products. But I believe it does. Furthermore, the Director-General's scenario is to provide for a system of carrying out on-the-spot international inspections. This would not be in the least voluntary. We need to make it clear that the ILO is not an organization for standardization like the ISO which is planning to introduce an eco-labelling system.

The Director-General's Report very rightly gives a serious warning about the attitudes of workers' and governments' benches in standard setting. Workers have been unremitting in their preference for the adoption of Conventions, despite their low level of ratification. Many governments are prepared to vote for a Convention without seriously envisaging pressing for its ratification. Because of these attitudes, employers are too often cornered into playing the role of a numerical minority opposition.

A government, by voting in favour of the adoption of a Convention, must undertake a moral commitment to bring about its ratification. In order to ward off blind voting, I propose to disclose a list of governments which have voted for the adoption of Conventions, but have not ratified them within a reasonable period. Alternatively, we could include a special question in the reporting forms on unratified Conventions, as to whether the responding governments have voted for or against adoption.

Times are changing in the worlds of business and work. We ourselves also have to change; at the very least we must not swim against the inexorable tide of transition. The ILO has traditionally regarded social policy as being totally separate from economic policy. A change in this mind-set is now necessary so that each of us can see a successful economic policy as being in the best interests of us all. An enterprise-centred, management-oriented attitude should be translated into international labour standards. A standard-setting mechanism should be adapted to today's worlds of business and work. This is the way in which the ILO's future standard setting should be directed.

Original Spanish: Mr. FUNES DE RIOJA (Employers' adviser, Argentina) — As representative of the President of the Argentine Industrial Union, Mr. Claudio Sebastiani, I would like to reaffirm the conviction of Argentine employers concerning the permanent need for a tripartite environment such as the International Labour Conference which constitutes humanity's world forum, the true motor of social dialogue.

Its usefulness is demonstrated at the national level by the Argentine employers' proposal to tailor the labour system to the needs of employment and competitiveness. Over the last few days, we have submitted our ideas to the Argentine Government about a constructive debate within the framework of a tripartite dialogue which I hope will be fruitful and lead to some flexible positions.

Nobody is unaware of problems in the world of work which ever more lead to problems throughout the whole of society. The stability of political societies and democracies is intimately linked to the ability of countries to generate the right conditions for sustainable development, and in that latter context, the problems of labour and employment are an inevitable priority.

Argentina has grappled with the phenomenal process of globalization with the same challenges and probably a great many question marks that are the result of decades of political instability, economic stagnation, hyper inflation and social debt. However, these conditionalities do not mean that we can put off the responses that community requires. We must indeed commit ourselves to multiply our endeavours. Everyone has a role to play in this, but also joint responsibilities. In the field of adapting standards to the era of globalization, the response at the national level should be to modernize the Argentine labour system, so as to adapt it to the new terms of competitiveness. It is not by chance, therefore, that the Director-General has taken initiatives at a different level, the international one, thus comparing it to the needs of today's world. We believe that it is very opportune that after defending values and promoting change, the Conference has put the question of standards on our agenda, in particular the promotion of fundamental rights of workers in the framework of international free trade and the globalization of the economy.

We do not believe in an overly protective labour system, nor in maintaining a welfare regime that is neither fiscally nor economically sustainable. But we do not believe either in the absence of standards or in pure competition that violates basic human rights. Social progress in the twenty-first century cannot be based on the abuse of rights or on systematic violation of fundamental rights. Rather, it must be based on the affirmation and respect, nationally and internationally, of these provisions.

The new vision of the world should be rooted in this premise, so that we can ensure social progress. When I talk about these premises, what I mean is the fundamental Conventions. Without this common denominator there can be no international social pact able to guarantee a universal community, whose raison d'être and ultimate objective is the welfare of men and women. This leads us to promote standards as the basic yardstick, but they must be enforceable and reasonable and tailored to our times and circumstances.

Therefore, as we have more than once argued, in this very room, against the proliferation of international Conventions, the number and scope of which has become unreasonable, and for which the number of ratifications furthermore has become ever lower, and those who did ratify did not often show the desire or the wherewithal to put them into practice. Now we are convinced that the ILO should root its work in the following parameters: first, worldwide promotion and supervision of compliance with the principles contained in the core Conventions; second, technical cooperation; and third, development of social dialogue. For the first of these functions, the existing constitutional machinery should be used, both for promotion and monitoring, and equal treatment should be offered to all countries, whether they have ratified the fundamental Conventions or not.

It is not a question of competitiveness, it is a necessity that arises from the very existence of an international community. Without observing these basic rules of the game in the international community, there can be no possible trading relations, because proper international relations will not be possible. In view of this, the control system should therefore draw solely on existing machinery, by perfecting the procedures so as to ensure that the approach is serious, impartial and effective.

Technical cooperation and promotion should be tailored to national circumstances, and multidisciplinary groups should continue the work they are doing in the field, leaving aside metropolitan and academic postures, in order to participate fully in the process of transformation.

None of this, of course, can be done without the third element, namely promoting social dialogue because workers, employers and governments should share their responsibility to bring about changes which they can call their own, that will make it possible to draw comparative advantages and transform their productive structures.

Social dialogue is to a pluralist democracy the same as competition is to a market economy. Therefore the blend of political democracy, private initiative and the market economics should lead to social progress.

This indeed is our national response in Argentina. There is no employment without growth, and the labour market should dynamically adapt its institutions to the needs of production and competitiveness. For this purpose, respect for the fundamental principles and for organizational flexibility in production and work are the new vision and the challenge that can be met.

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT (Mr. KHALIL) — We now resume our discussion on the reports of the Chairperson of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Mr. ANTONIOU (Workers' delegate, Cyprus) — Although it is widely known, it should from time to time be repeated that the International Labour Organization has managed to survive through a variety of situations and has faced many problems which were due to different administrative or political systems and, sometimes, due to the very nature of international situations. It has gone through glory and power but it has also faced moments of disappointment and weakness. However, it has been sincerely accepted by the working people. The international space, which is its natural environment, has been its productive workshop.

On its sound foundations, this unique instrument of international social research goes on with considerable progress towards the realization of its targets which are reflected in the achievements of social justice and balance of social responsibilities among the nations. Albeit these two targets are not morally equal they are interrelated and eventually they are amalgamated into one, that is, the achievement of international social justice.

The workers' organizations in Cyprus consider that the international labour standards play an important role in the elaboration of national legislation aimed at the protection of the working population.

Since the independence of the Republic of Cyprus in 1960, the Cyprus workers' organizations have positively responded to the establishment of the tripartite mechanism. Under the tripartism process the Cyprus workers' organizations, acting as a partner in the elaboration of national labour laws, have never hesitated to participate actively in a spirit of mutual understanding and sincere cooperation with the other two partners.

Although the standard-setting function aims at the achievement of social justice, which constitutes the basis of international peace, the ILO standards are not an end in themselves. They are one of the means the ILO has at its disposal to attain its objectives.

In these times the phenomenon of economic interdependency which results from the trade in goods and services and capital flows, known as globalization, calls for a global and universal approach as far as standard-setting action is concerned. In this respect our objective should be to place social progress into a relationship with the economic progress expected from the liberalization of trade.

In order to bring about this development, there must be a universal recognition of certain basic rights which should allow the social partners to share equally the benefits resulting from globalization.

We fully agree with the statement of the Director-General of the ILO that the drop-off in the number of ratifications under the new conditions of globalization is a reality.

The States which take social and progressive labour measures run the risk of exposing themselves in a disadvantageous position against those States maintaining or implementing deficient social or labour legislation. These States, due to the reduced cost in the production of their goods, unfairly compete with those States which have legally regulated all aspects of the working environment. It is therefore a pressing a need to consolidate the social and labour legislations of all the States, through the process of concluding international labour Conventions, and at the same time introducing, as suggested, the award of an "overall social label" to countries complying with a set of fundamental principles and rights and agreeing to have their practices supervised by international inspection on the spot.

Furthermore, we would like to emphasize, that we should avoid hampering the ILO's standard-setting action. At the same time, we should also exploit the full potential of all the Recommendations considering them as instruments in their own rights and followed up on a regular basis.

We strongly favour the suggestion put forward regarding the establishment in the ILO of an overall evaluation mechanism for its standard-setting function.

We can assure the Director-General and all delegates present that Cyprus workers' organizations, in close collaboration with the other two social partners, will, on the one hand, continue to encourage and assist the Cyprus Government in the direction of increasing the number of ratified Conventions and, on the other hand, make the standard-setting function the magnetic pole attracting all the social partners in the framework of this unique Organization, whose objective is to improve the lot of all people in their work. Thus, the instruments, Conventions and Recommendations are the principal means which the ILO puts at our disposal for bringing this about.

Ms. PONCINI (representative of the International Federation of University Women) — On behalf of the International Federation of University Women and as Convener of the Geneva Working Group on Women's Employment and Economic Development representing 22 international NGOs, we warmly congratulate the President for her election and express our satisfaction that the three highest positions of the Conference are held by women.

We congratulate the Director-General for his Report on The ILO, standard setting and globalization. We appreciate that equality of treatment and non-discrimination are highlighted in the core standards, notably Convention No. 100 on equal remuneration for equal work and Convention No. 111 on non-discrimination in employment and occupation. We agree that autonomous Recommendations should be given the same importance as Conventions. They should, as provided for by the Constitution, be followed up on a regular basis as stated by the Director-General on page 54 of his Report. It is desirable that such Recommendations address the issue of globalization, giving national and regional indicators of trends in social and labour progress and enabling more accurate corrective and preventive measures.

We particularly welcome Part I, section B of the Director-General's Report on the institutional setting to stimulate social progress. In effect, there are other ILO instruments important to women workers who are still, in the majority, working in the informal sector, which is largely unorganized and unprotected by legislation. We believe that minimum international standards are indispensable, such as the ones proposed on contract labour. Legislation is especially needed by women to guarantee their economic independence, their right to inheritance and land property, to credit and to protection from other discriminatory policies and cultural traditions.

We are also pleased to note under Part I, section B.2 that the Director-General recognizes the importance of consumers' organizations. Such organizations are in fact one of the primary proponents of environmentally friendly products. However, we believe that other intersectoral NGOs, particularly women's organizations, play an important role in mobilizing responsible action.

We believe the need for gender-disaggregated data in all ILO programmes and documents cannot be overstated. Indeed such gender-disaggregated statistics highlight the problems of women, but they also render transparent problems of other groups such as the unemployment of men in many parts of the world. As an example of this gap, we wish to call attention to Report V(1) on the general conditions to stimulate job creation in small and medium enterprises, in which the statistical tables do not contain gender-disaggregated data, nor is there reference to women as creators of employment. In this regard, according to the report on the ILO's Enterprise Forum held in 1996 (p. 43 of the proceedings), in the United States, for example, "Growth of women-owned firms continues to outpace overall business growth, and employment in women-owned firms employing 100 or more has expanded six times faster than the average for the whole economy". In fact, in ILO documents and international fora, women entrepreneurs are predicted as the new paradigm of the twenty-first century. The women's programme indicated in Report V(I) would have been enhanced by the inclusion of a gender perspective.

The significant increase in the participation of women in employment and economic development means that women should no longer be considered as a marginal group, but as half of the population with the same labour rights as men workers. Therefore, we call on all governments, employers and workers to involve women as full and equal partners in all policy formulation and decision-making processes in linking economic efficiency to social justice and equity, as recommended by the President of the World Bank, Mr. Wolfensohn, at the discussion meeting following his address.

Finally, women's human rights have indisputably been proclaimed throughout the UN system through the declarations and programmes of action of World Conferences, in particular the 1993 Vienna Conference on Human Rights and the 1995 Beijing Conference on Women. We wish to underscore that international labour standards are an integral part of human rights, and to encourage greater ILO coordination with other human rights' mechanisms in consistently including the differential impact of gender in all policies, programmes and practices.

Ms. MOXEY-INGRAHAM (Minister of Labour, Immigration and Training, Bahamas) — Permit me, first of all, on behalf of the delegation from the Commonwealth of the Bahamas, to extend warmest congratulations to the President, and to others, on their election to lead this 85th Session of the International Labour Conference. I know that I speak for many when I say that we have the highest expectations from all of you, and that you will preside with characteristic fairness, wisdom and equanimity.

The 85th Session of the Conference has focused on the Report of the Director-General The ILO, standard setting and globalization. As we have come to expect, it is a most incisive Report which should provide the structure and guidance to many of our governments and those in social partnership with us, as we grapple with the looming issue of entering into a new regime of international trading relationships in a competitive global environment. These new relationships will have an unalterable and profound effect on traditional labour and employment practices and indeed on the role and mission of the ILO as we launch into a new millennium.

It is within this context therefore, that I would wish to confine my brief remarks. Firstly, the creation of a global economy presents us with both opportunities and challenges. The opportunity of new sources of investment and new markets also brings with it the challenges of competition in an open and unprotected environment. This competition is well and good if it takes place on a level playing field. But in reality, there is unevenness in the circumstances. In particular, I refer to wages and other standard practices, known as "core standards". Among these standards are freedom of association, collective bargaining, fair employment practices, including minimum wages and standardized hours of work.

In the global marketplace, small economies, in particular small island economies, characterized by small labour forces, now find themselves competing with bigger economies for the same global investments and markets. By its very nature, however, larger economies have larger manpower resources and skills banks on which to draw and it is also recognized that they have larger reserves of labour which can be utilized at considerably less than acceptable minimum standards of pay and other benefits. While such situations might provide an attractive incentive in the mix of options which may attract potential investment, they are deleterious to the position of small economies such as the Bahamas.

Small developing economies find themselves lacking a wide range of investment opportunities and potential and have been placed in a position of reliance on one or two basic commodities or activities for their economic survival. The forces of global competition and the introduction of unbridled free market policies have already had an impact on employment and job creation in these kinds of societies.

Already we in countries with small economies have seen the effect of this as there have been loss of investment and jobs in sectors such as tourism, textiles, manufacturing and agriculture due, in large measure, to deflationary wages and benefits in the competing countries receiving these new investments.

It is imperative, therefore, that the issue of core standards and the core Conventions should be addressed in the context of trade liberalization. It is heartening to note that this issue was given recognition at Singapore as well as in the Copenhagen Declaration.

Within this context, we firmly subscribe to certain core standards such as minimum hours of work and basic pay standards negotiated, in most instances, between employer and trade unions. Application of these basic ILO principles should be internationally accepted and the ILO should fix its sights firmly on an achievable date and pragmatic measures whereby such targets might be achieved in concert with other relevant international organizations, most particularly at the World Trade Organization.

It flows from what I have just said that we fully endorse the strategy as outlined in the Director-General's Report calling on those who have not already done so to guarantee those universal rights by ratification of the relevant international labour standards. These principles, in turn, should be fully observed and become entrenched provisions in any and all multilateral trade agreements and treaties.

It is my honour to endorse and to give my unqualified support to the initiatives as set out in the Report of the Director-General.

Mr. SISOULITH (Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, Lao People's Democratic Republic) — On behalf of the Lao People's Democratic Republic's delegation, I would like to present my congratulations to the President on her election to chair this session of the Conference. I am convinced that with her profound experience and competence, this Conference will achieve its objectives.

The Director-General's Report contains important issues and accurate information on the long-term process of the ILO activities. Manifold thoughts were expressed to improve standards in view of solving problems and achieving social justice. I wish to present my warm congratulations for the ILO's efforts in this regard.

Nevertheless, the Director-General's Report mentioned the delay in ratifying Conventions and the non-implementation of many Conventions in member countries, but from a general standpoint, the governments in these countries have exerted efforts to promote employment for their population, and have applied measures based on their respective specific features to ensure simultaneous social stability, guarantee human rights and social justice with relentless economic growth.

However, delays in ratifying or in implementing Conventions have their reasons, namely the insufficient readiness due to internal situations and requirement for compliance with the socio-economic development features of each country and, on the other hand, customs, culture, including the history of each country or region, should not be overlooked.

It is well known that trade and labour are two different issues, each having its own specific problems. These two issues are closely interactive. This does not mean that they must be directly linked. Therefore, it is my opinion that solutions to such problems should not serve solely the interest of a group of persons or a group of countries. General provisions should take into account the specific features of various countries in each region and strive to balance the interest between groups of persons or groups of countries. Otherwise, differences would not be resolved, but aggravated.

I agree with many previous speakers that social progress and the elimination of poverty are the consequences of economic growth and not the direct result of the acceptance and implementation of labour standards. Therefore, I think that the ILO should concentrate its efforts to assist underdeveloped or developing countries in developing their human resources, in creating jobs and achieving economic growth.

The Government of the Lao People's Democratic Republic firmly upholds its development policy along the lines of a market economy, and is strongly convinced that the market economy will help the country to transcend backwardness through sustainable development. My Government has emphasized social development and progress by concentrating, from the start, on the development of human resources, and on job creation through the promotion of small and medium-sized enterprises. At the same time, my country has systematically promulgated the necessary laws, including the labour law and regulations on labour management, employment promotion and, with the help of ILO experts, the setting up of a new social security system.

Mr. EDSTRÖM (Workers' delegate, Sweden) — The Swedish trade unions have for decades strongly advocated the advancement of free trade as beneficial for all countries and all workers. But I have to say that the Director-General is definitely right in his perception that there are more and more people questioning the virtue of unconditional free movement of capital and free access to markets, as it is perceived to result in downward competition between countries and deregulation that is detrimental to working conditions and social justice and undermines human rights in working life. That is why we are advocating a social clause.

After the WTO Ministerial Conference in Singapore, the world's attention is now focused on the ILO. Will the ILO be given the mandate to strengthen its supervisory procedures in respect of fundamental standards of human rights? Taking into account what governments have stated at the UN World Summit for Social Development, at the WTO Ministerial Conference in Singapore and in this Organization, the answer would logically be affirmative. But I share the concern of the Director-General that some governments take contradictory positions in different international organizations, and that they act as if they are not bound by the obligations to which they have committed themselves when they became Members of the ILO. In this respect I would like to say that we are profoundly concerned by the statement of the Government of Colombia, on behalf of 113 States. These countries have, in our view, lost all credibility in their claimed support for the ILO and its fundamental human rights.

ILO human rights standards are universal in character. We cannot accept the non-observance of these standards with reference to regional circumstances, prevalent cultural traditions or non-interference. The failure of the ILO to strengthen its supervisory procedures will send a clear signal to workers of the world, which surely will cause reactions. In the long run, the sustainability of the agreed liberalization of trade and capital will be endangered.

The Director-General proposes a type of global social labelling which undoubtedly has some merits, and the proposal deserves further elaboration.

The Director-General also wants to re-establish the status of Recommendations. There is a simple explanation for our hesitation. In our experience, governments and employers' organizations at the national level are not ready to accept that an ILO Recommendation should be given enough attention to have a major influence on legislation. As long as parliaments are not required formally to give their assent to Recommendations, they will not be regarded nationally as important international obligations.

The Director-General reminds us that ILO standards comprise much more than fundamental human rights in working life. All of us have a duty to take measures needed to protect workers around the world from occupational hazards, inhumane working conditions and social injustice. Tripartism is the unique approach of the ILO, but only 81 member States have been able to ratify the ILO's Convention No. 144 on tripartite consultations. I have difficulty in understanding the obstacles to ratification. In my view the ILO Constitution should require member States to establish national ILO committees. Such committees are ideal bodies to discuss questions related to standard setting, including questionnaires, and would probably have a positive impact and limit the number of failures to submit new ILO instruments to parliament or failures to report to the ILO.

We often hear about the drop in ratifications of recent Conventions. But why has an analysis not been made of the reasons? Is it, for instance, due to the fact that some of them are revised instruments?

Finally, I want to say that the continued work in relation to standard setting and revision of standards must bear in mind the values and purposes of this Organization to protect the workers of the world.

Mr. MBOWENI (Minister of Labour, South Africa) — May I take this opportunity to congratulate the Director-General of the ILO for presenting us with a report which addresses the economic and social challenges confronting the world of work in this era of globalization.

We reaffirm our support for the role of the ILO in setting international standards, and we are heartened that others from our continent share our view. The OAU view has already been presented by the Honourable Paul Etienne, the Chairman of the OAU's Labour and Social Affairs Commission. The ratification of the ILO's core Conventions remains an important task for all States. This will contribute towards the uniform application of international standards.

The experiences of several countries around the world have demonstrated that sustainable world-class economic competitiveness and development should go hand in hand with acceptable labour standards, where workers' rights, social justice and human dignity are respected and valued by all.

It is crucial that the benefits of globalization are shared equitably within countries and between countries. Globalization must enhance the quality of life for humanity, particularly for the working people.

Globalization has become a reality. It has positive aspects which we ought to embrace, but it also has negative consequences. We must develop ways, within the ILO system and others, of effectively managing the negative consequences of globalization.

It would be short-sighted for us whose economies are struggling to meet the challenges of globalization to believe we can gain a competitive edge over other countries by undermining basic labour standards. Sooner, rather than later, the super-exploited will rise to demand fair treatment.

Equally, it would be short-sighted of the more developed countries to try to use high labour standards to perpetuate the inequalities between the North and South. Labour standards should not be used as a smokescreen for protectionism.

We should develop an international consensus on labour standards and this kind of consensus can only be achieved through ongoing dialogue which enables us to understand and appreciate the specific conditions in different countries. There should be respect for a programme of fundamental rights of workers. Formulating and monitoring such minimum labour standards should reinforce tripartite consultation and not undermine it.

The Director-General's proposals have particular relevance for us in South Africa. We have vigorous programmes to promote human rights and to eradicate discrimination in our workplaces and society. We are promoting freedom of association and organization to enhance collective bargaining and joint decision making. We are against forced labour, and children who are 15 years and younger must be at school and not at work. We promote the interests of women as workers and in society.

I conclude by appealing to everyone here to support the standard-setting mechanisms of the ILO and to begin to discuss how best we can address the negative consequences of globalization, while taking full advantage of the benefits which it permits.

Original Russian: Mr. LYAKH (Minister of Labour, Belarus) — I would like first of all to join the previous speakers in offering my congratulations to Ms. Olga Keltošová on her election to the high post of President of the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference and express my certainty that under her leadership the session will indeed achieve the aims it has set before it.

The Republic of Belarus considers the Report of the Director-General of the International Labour Office, Mr. Michel Hansenne, The ILO, standard setting and globalization, to be of the highest quality. It contains concrete measures which we believe are capable of truly making the ILO's standard-setting activities in the coming years more pertinent and more effective.

For its part, the Government of Belarus is prepared to demonstrate its political will in this sense.

Belarus, having ratified the seven fundamental ILO Conventions (Nos. 87, 98, 29, 105, 100, 111 and 138), supports the Director-General's objective which appears in the Report, of ensuring greater universality in the application of the fundamental labour standards.

We are in favour of a rapid adoption by the Conference of a declaration, in the framework of the ILO Constitution, defining the universally recognized fundamental rights which must be observed by all the Organization's member States, regardless of whether they have ratified the corresponding Conventions. We believe the declaration should provide for a mechanism to monitor observance of basic labour standards. This mechanism should be designed taking into account and making use already of the existing ILO supervisory machinery, and also taking into consideration all of the organizational and financial repercussions this will have.

We also believe that the ideas contained in the second part of the Report of the Director-General, and which are devoted to a better selection of subjects for future standard setting and the improvement of the form and content of standard-setting instruments, should be applied as soon as possible.

The effectiveness of the standard-setting activities of the ILO and the success of the measures proposed by the Director-General to improve that effectiveness will have a direct bearing on the way States fulfil their international obligations.

As far as Belarus is concerned, we must unfortunately acknowledge that our national social and labour legislation does not yet fully correspond to international labour standards. Some of its provisions may give rise to a double interpretation.

In the emerging tripartite system in the Republic of Belarus, relations are not yet all that smooth. Disputes do arise, and they are not always solved as they should be. But the Government of our Republic is doing — and will continue to do — all it can to prevent such disputes, and when they do arise, to settle them with due regard for the relevant international legal standards, while doing everything in its power to encourage social dialogue in our country.

At this point, the role and importance of social partnership is recognized in Belarus. Article 14 of the country's constitution provides that relations between government bodies, employer's associations and trade unions must be founded on the principles of social partnership. Social partnership has thus been made into a constitutional standard which must be reflected in practice.

The Republic of Belarus is interested in further developing cooperation with the ILO, and in receiving advisory and technical assistance in carrying out social reforms in our country. That sort of help is particularly necessary in order for us to improve the legislative basis governing social and labour relations, and in particular to assist us in adopting a new labour code. ILO assistance is required to further develop the employment system, to fight unemployment, to foster social dialogue, to settle labour disputes, and to instill in each of the social partners a spirit of civilized cooperation in seeking mutually acceptable compromises.

To conclude, permit me to say that I am certain that the ILO has the potential to meet the challenges of the times with dignity as globalization continues, and, as the Director-General said in his Report, to make a qualitative leap forward in its standard-setting work. The Republic of Belarus is prepared to help in any way possible.

Mr. KRISTINSSON (Government delegate, Iceland) — I should like to begin by congratulating the President and her Vice-Presidents on the honour bestowed on them being elected as officers of the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference. I am in full agreement with those who have spoken before me that they will handle this important job excellently, so playing their part in ensuring that this session will produce the best possible results.

I am giving this speech on behalf of Mr. Páll Pétursson, Iceland's Minister of Social Affairs, who is not able to attend this session of the International Labour Conference.

The Minister has asked me to extend his greetings to Mr. Michel Hansenne, the Director-General of the ILO and to this session.

The Director-Generals's Report to the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference, in 1994, bore the title Defending values, promoting change. Social justice in a global economy: An ILO agenda.

In his Report to the International Labour Conference, the Director-General warned of the danger of using the then current recession as an excuse to reduce social justice in the world. He emphasized that the globalization of the world's economies has caused new problems in the field of social affairs. That injustice within States, and between States, has increased due to nations' varying capacities for adjusting to, and meeting, increased competition on a world scale.

The conclusion of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference was to give the Director-General and the Governing Body a mandate to study this matter more fully.

It may be surmised that the Report of the Director-General of the ILO to this session of the International Labour Conference is, in a way, the conclusion to the discussions within the ILO on the reaction to comprehensive trade agreements during the past few years, which have seen the abolition of custom duties and other barriers to trade. The Report contains numerous interesting proposals and comments that use as a frame of reference some words of caution contained in the report of the ILO's Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations.

In this Report to the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference, the Committee of Experts warns that, if it is deprived of its supervisory role on the implementation of important international Conventions on the pretext that increased productivity and an emphasis on competition, a healthy work environment and stability on the labour market would be jeopardized and workers' individual dignity and freedom of choice would be severely limited. The result could be poorer conditions for workers in general. There is ample reason to endorse this view of the Committee of Experts.

When considering the Director-General's Report to the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference, it is necessary to keep in mind the discussions at the 81st International Labour Conference and the words of warning made by the ILO's Committee of Experts on the Application of Standards. The principal conclusion of the Report is that changes in the world's labour markets and the world economy make it necessary to review the working procedures of the ILO for the purpose of adjusting them to changing times. However, it should be emphasized that the ILO's objectives, as defined in its Constitution and in the Declaration of Philadelphia, are still fully valid.

None the less, further efforts should be made to ensure the implementation of Conventions concerning the basic rights of workers in all parts of the world. The question is, how can this be done? The Declaration adopted by the World Summit for Social Development held in Copenhagen in 1995, and the recent Ministerial Meeting of the World Trade Organization in Singapore, make it clear that this is a task that must be tackled by the ILO. In this connection, the important contribution of the OECD in examining the relationship between international labour standards and trade should be noted.

There is reason to give special support to the view that the ILO's Constitution, and ILO membership, involve a commitment to certain basic rights for workers, not only at the national level, but in all parts of the world. These rights are guaranteed by several basic Conventions. The measures taken by the Director-General to promote further ratification of these Conventions are to be welcomed. In this connection it should be borne in mind that Iceland has ratified all the Conventions in question with the exception of one, No. 138, on minimum age. However, I take pleasure in being able to state that last May the Althing, Iceland's Parliament, changed the chapter on the work of children and young persons in our Occupational Health and Safety Act, thus paving the way for Iceland to ratify this Convention as well.

The Director-General's Report proposes that the International Labour Conference should adopt a specific declaration to the effect that the member States should renew their commitments resulting from ILO membership. This is an interesting proposal which should be endorsed. I want to join those who have expressed hope that such a declaration could be adopted by the next International Labour Conference.

Original French: Mr. DE LA HAYE (representative of the World Confederation of Teachers) — The Director-General's Report to the 85th International Labour Conference relates to the problem of standards, which are of capital importance for the living and working conditions of workers throughout the world. As to education, at least in the context of the International Labour Organization, standards are essentially those in general Conventions or in more specific Conventions concerning public services, and the joint ILO/UNESCO Recommendation concerning the Status of Teachers, adopted in 1996, which, furthermore, still constitutes a reference point for the Joint Committee, as also for international organizations of teachers. Probably also within a short period of time, a Recommendation will be submitted to the next General Assembly of UNESCO in October-November next, on the working conditions of higher-education teaching staff, in the drafting of which the ILO has been closely involved.

International labour standards have dual significance. On the one hand they must reflect what can already be done; they must serve as a reference point to defend the rights of persons and must ensure the protection of people and of groups where the application of standards is lacking. On the other hand, they must point the way towards social progress by forward-looking thinking based upon past and present experience.

This dual significance can be seen much more clearly when it is transposed to the situation of education and teachers today. On the one hand, political decision-makers and international governmental organizations are clamouring in unison for education and teaching to be given more importance, today but even more so in the future, in a society which is essentially based upon knowledge and in which lifelong learning will necessarily give rise to new ideas, not only on basic education, but also concerning secondary and higher education, and on the right of access to lifelong training and, in more general terms, on the development of educational systems in a socio-economic context in the process of major change.

On the other hand, following structural adjustment programmes in developing countries, and voluntary adjustment programmes in industrialized countries, the means provided for education are either being substantially reduced or are being called into question. These policies obviously have a direct impact upon the working conditions of teaching staff throughout the world. And, all too often, we and our colleagues are duty bound to note a minimalist if not negative attitude towards the respect for international standards concerning, for example, working conditions, individual and collective rights, trade union rights, the right to participate in school life, the protection of wages, and so on and so forth. The World Confederation of Teachers nevertheless welcomes the follow-up given to the Joint Committee organized by the ILO last year considering the consequences of structural adjustment policies on education and teachers.

Furthermore, we also observe that new challenges have arisen for educational systems and that new and more stringent requirements are being imposed upon teachers. The reduction of budgets gives rise to thoughts about the search for quality. The danger would be that of believing that introducing new technologies could be a universal panacea. This is by no means the case. These new technologies will be effective only if they are included in a coherent, well-integrated educational system.

How then, on the basis of the developments observed and of those on the horizon, can we define new standards or adapt previous standards so that teaching staff can fully play their role as we move towards education in the twenty-first century? This then is the challenge before us today, not only in the world of teachers but before society at large.

The World Confederation of Teachers considers that a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush and that it is indispensable and even of priority importance to ensure first of all that throughout the world there is a correct application of standards relating to or applicable to education and teachers. Training trade union leaders in the optimum use of existing standards today is, as far as we are concerned, an absolute priority.

However, beyond this vigilance in the present, we must build the future and also innovate. This forward-looking approach is particularly relevant in the educational sector today. Hence, on the basis of the changes observed in society today and when taking account of strong trends and recent change in education and in educational systems at large, the World Confederation of Teachers is preparing itself for a detailed analysis of the situation as it exists today and for projections of future outcomes. Aware of this mission, the World Confederation of Teachers has already given considerable thought to the future of education and of teachers. It goes without saying that the conclusions of the International Labour Conference will be a driving force behind those thoughts.

During the four regional seminars, held in cooperation with the ILO and with its regional structures, the World Confederation of Teachers calls upon its members to think about the shape of tomorrow's education. These regional seminars will lead to the World Congress of the World Confederation of Teachers in 1998 with the theme of "The role of teachers in twenty-first century education".

I shall conclude by stating that these thoughts about the future are not a short-lived dream. The structure of standards applicable to teaching, even if not perfect or complete, provides the best possible guarantee that tomorrow the rights of teachers can be defended, even within a new framework. Hence, the standards applicable to teaching will fully carry out their double role, that is consolidating what has been done in the past and, on the other hand, being an instrument for social and economic progress in the future.

Original German: Ms. HOSTASCH (Federal Minister of Labour, Health and Social Affairs, Austria) — Austria is one of the countries that has always been aware of the importance and the influence of international standard setting on social developments as well as the importance of the clear implementation and monitoring of basic workers' rights.

The Report of the Director-General pinpoints some of the weaknesses of standard setting within the framework of the ILO, in particular in recent years, and indicates possible solutions. With regard to these considerations, which I endorse in principle, I would like to submit the following points.

In some cases, ratification is hampered by the detailed legal nature of Conventions independent of their social standards, which is difficult to align with national legislation. If the ILO legal instruments concentrated more on objectives and tendencies, we could probably achieve a higher level of ratification.

Of course there is no lack of major social policy issues at the present time. I share the opinion of the Director-General that the effects of globalization should not be confined to the economic sector alone but must be related to working and living conditions and should be subordinated to a number of generally applicable minimum standards. We therefore regret to note a trend to deregulate social protection, and think the risk of social peace being jeopardized and the temptation to withdraw behind protectionist barriers not unrealistic.

Austria, therefore, fully endorses the ILO's attempts to increase the protection of fundamental workers' rights. We should start setting the course now. Reporting on non-ratified Conventions and the requirement to list grounds hampering ratification, should not be underestimated in this context. However, in addition to this, more stringent means should be introduced for the protection of basic rights. The idea of amending the Constitution towards this end — and here we agree with the view of the Office — seems neither purposeful nor necessary, the reasons being that the basic principles which require protection are already enshrined in the Constitution which was adopted by all Members upon their accession to the ILO.

Austria, therefore, is far more in favour of the Director-General's proposal to formulate a document based on consensus according to which the principles of core Conventions for the protection of workers' rights — independently of ratification — are respected by all member States. Whether this declaration should refer to compliance with the principles of Conventions or also their details, will have to be discussed thoroughly by the Governing Body and possibly another session of the Conference. This discussion will also have to elucidate whether the adoption of such a declaration could have a negative effect on the will and motivations to ratify these core Conventions. Ratification should none the less remain our ultimate goal. We can also endorse the idea of a monitoring system similar to the one planned for Conventions Nos. 87 and 98.

In addition to these basic policy issues, from a practical point of view, we very much welcome the increased use of multidisciplinary teams to advise Members with regard to the implementation of Conventions, and in particular the Conventions on basic workers' rights.

The idea of the ILO becoming active in the field of social labelling is also something we consider highly interesting and worth examining. I agree with the Director-General that the question of social labelling requires close, careful attention.

To end, it gives me great pleasure to be able to tell you that Austria will join the International Programme on the Elimination of Child Labour.

Mr. JORDAN (representative of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions) — My congratulations to the President on her election and to the Director-General on the choice of subject for his Report. It covers much ground. But for the ICFTU the crucial issue is how the ILO can inject social justice into the heart of the process of globalization. The challenge is not new but it is becoming more urgent as uncontrolled globalization accelerates and its social deficit grows. Commitments have been made at Copenhagen and Singapore, but action has not followed. The price of continued failure to act will be a breakdown in open multilateral economic and trade relations, and in the stability of our societies.

This Conference has the opportunity and the responsibility to stop the drift, to send out the message that the moment to act is now. It must say that the three-year debate on how to strengthen the ILO's supervisory powers is complete, that the Organization will now be empowered to contribute effectively to making universal respect of human rights at work the ground rules of the global economy.

International opinion will not tolerate those who would like to see the ILO rendered powerless in the face of the gross abuse of men, women and children, those who, in the name of national sovereignty, hang the sign "Silence: Workers being exploited" at their frontiers. The wilful abuse of workers has never been a necessary stage of development. The ILO's fundamental rights Conventions are tools of progress. As such, the ICFTU can see no justification for further delay in their implementation, and there are overwhelming imperatives of social justice which demand decisive action.

The Director-General is right to look beyond the national actors to the international agents of globalization. It is not the first time that he has pointed to the need for the ILO to adopt new approaches to the activities of multinational enterprises. Twenty years of experience with the ILO's tripartite declaration, and recent attempts to use its follow-up mechanisms, are proof enough of the need for new steps.

The ICFTU welcomes the job-creating potential of successful multinationals. Our interest is in working with them to ensure that their activities and their tremendous power and influence contribute to the goals of the ILO, and we detect a growing willingness from enterprises to work with us on codes of conduct and labelling schemes.

The ILO must become involved as a leader in this area which is uniting its tripartite constituents and other actors in civil society in numerous important activities. Certainly, it would ill behove those who historically have resisted the legal regulation of multinationals in favour of the voluntarist approach, to close the door now to ILO work which is framed in just those voluntarist terms.

For these reasons the ICFTU welcomes the major proposal made by the Director-General in respect of an overall social label. We believe that it merits further attention, with particular emphasis on the monitoring function, which is crucial to the effectiveness of any code or labelling scheme.

I have spoken positively of the many elements that Mr. Hansenne has put before this Conference. This is because the ICFTU recognizes in them a serious attempt to take up the challenges of Copenhagen and Singapore and to give life to the commitments that were made there. The ICFTU went to Singapore with the aim of having the WTO address the link between trade and labour standards in its work and with a commitment to the insertion of a social clause into the WTO treaty. That aim and that commitment remain. The measures proposed by the Director-General are complementary to them and not substitutes.

In his Report Mr. Hansenne has chosen to remain silent on the social clause. That silence should not be read as implying that the ILO no longer has a role to play in the continuing and difficult debate on this subject. The ILO does have a role.

The dominant issue in the debate at Singapore was the link between trade and labour standards, and the central argument of those countries which said that the WTO was not the place to deal with labour standards was that the ILO could deliver the social dimension that the globalization of trade so desperately needs.

I challenge those countries to honour the words they said in Singapore. The ILO must have made substantial progress on the application of standards by the time of the next WTO meeting. The opportunity is here, action must start now. If the ILO fails in this task it will be judged harshly, and rightly so. And the ICFTU will take its argument back to the WTO, and those who have here opposed the measures needed to create an effective ILO will have significantly strengthened our case.

Original French: Mgr. BERTELLO (Apostolic Nuncio, The Holy See) — The delegation of The Holy See would first of all like to join previous speakers in congratulating the President on her election.

In his Report the Director-General provides us with a clear picture of the role that the ILO is called upon to play, adapting its action to changes in the world situation in order to ensure that social progress goes hand in hand with economic and trade development, thus enabling the social partners to benefit equitably from the fruits of globalization. The future does not belong to those who neglect social factors in the quest for purely economic results or to those who support social policies which are neither realistic nor viable.

Thirty years ago Pope Paul VI wrote in his Encyclical Letter "Populorum Progressio" on the development of peoples, that, "An economy of exchange can no longer be based solely on the law of free competition, a law which, in its turn, too often creates an economic dictatorship — freedom of trade is fair only if it is subject to the demands of social justice."

The Declaration of Philadelphia and the ILO Constitution with their solemn endorsements of the dignity of the human person and of labour have inspired the standards of this Organization. They constitute the essential means for protecting, and if necessary, for reinterpreting the fundamental rights of workers in a world which is ever more complex and changing and which requires fresh thinking and the ability of governments, employers and workers to project themselves into the future in a spirit of constructive dialogue.

In this connection the social doctrine of the Catholic Church is quite clear. The economy is to serve man, and not the reverse, and the rights of workers come before the rights of capital. The upheaval in the political and economic situation which has taken place in the last few years with a tendency towards market deregulation and trade liberalization, marked by increased competition, inevitably have serious repercussions on the human race which further underlines the importance of the primordial right of each man to have a job which fulfils him and allows him to live with his family.

As the Pope said recently to the members of the Pontifical Academy of Social Sciences, this does not condemn market liberalization, but it means that we should view and implement it with respect for the primacy of the human being to which economic systems should be subject. It is the equality in this dignity that all standards should develop, promote and protect, because we cannot passively develop economic mechanisms without taking account of the true nature of man.

In a society which is increasingly globalized, can we envisage solving problems in isolation, or within the limited confines of national borders? The idea of the common good today goes beyond the interests, even though they are legitimate, of individual countries, and extends to the boundaries of the international community. The spirit of solidarity therefore inevitably takes on a universal dimension which requires concerted action and the cooperation of all.

My delegation would like to stress two aspects of this solidarity. First, the respect for national and regional communities with their wealth of peoples and cultures, cultures which shape them and which promote authentic values. One of the dangers of liberalization may very well be that of imposing, even if indirectly, a single world culture and levelling down the specifities which constitute the wealth of humanity.

Secondly, my delegation cannot fail to think of developing countries. Developing countries are expecting new possibilities from the liberalization of trade in order to ensure their development, not just at the economic level, but more particularly, their social development. A new international economic order, which would condemn part of the world's population to a permanent state of poverty would be fundamentally unjust. If we hope to achieve the common good at the planetary level, all countries should be able to participate actively in the global economy and receive the fruits of their commitment.

The developing countries expect from the ILO all necessary assistance, both through financial assistance and technical cooperation programmes, and also through a humane understanding of their difficulties, and a demonstration of real solidarity towards their populations, which seek to be understood and respected.

Original French: Mr. DELHOMENIE (Workers' delegate, France) — After congratulating the President and Vice-Presidents on their election, I should like to congratulate the Director-General for the excellent Report submitted to us for our consideration, while nevertheless reproaching him with the fact that the intensity of his comments and proposals combined with the brevity of our statements, oblige us to give mere excerpts and approximations of our points of view given the time constraints.

Before coming back to the various points mentioned, we can say that we fully agree with his diagnosis concerning globalization. Nowhere is it stated or written that globalization a priori will be detrimental to populations in general, and to workers in particular. If we make good use of globalization, it holds out more promises than threats. It will be what we can make of it with the instruments available to us. Indeed, in this respect the ILO should play a major role.

We also fully agree with the philosophy expressed in the first part of this Report concerning economic interdependence, the promotion of rights rather than sanctions, on stimulating the setting on limitations of codes of conduct. The respect for universal rules, the adoption of a solemn declaration, the evaluation of social progress, the idea of a global social label, are all paths which are worth exploring. All of these ideas are not, and indeed should not be envisaged or implemented as instruments for the protectionism of industrialized countries to the detriment of others. As workers in industrialized countries, countries which still show many inequalities, the most important of which is unemployment, we hope that the world population as a whole can benefit progressively from the fundamental rights which is the raison d'être of our tripartite organization.

However, I should like to make two further observations. As far as we are concerned, the ILO is not sufficiently grounded in public opinion. While its role is indispensable, and, indeed inevitable, it cannot do everything alone. The Report very rightly highlights the role of consumer organizations, for example. How can we work with them without calling into question the tripartite nature of the ILO? Should we not compare our viewpoints with them in order, for example, to enlighten our views concerning codes of conduct and the prospect of global social labelling? If not, this movement may very well continue and also expand and one day turn against us, given all the defects rightly mentioned in the Report.

My second comment is, that we have to go further in implementing standards. Technical cooperation which has made major progress in the course of the last few years has to be strengthened. The ILO must not only draft standards and monitor their implementation; increasingly it must help States to implement them. In this connection, we wish to appeal at this tribune for a strengthening of the tripartite aspect of that technical cooperation which, in our view, is still very insufficient.

In the second part of the Report, the Director-General examines standards. Undeniably, his diagnosis is also marked by common sense. Indeed, we should not be indifferent to the slow down, if not stagnation, in my own country over the last few years concerning ratification of Conventions. After legitimate protest, we should begin asking ourselves questions.

After giving this question due thought, we consider that the guidelines for work suggested are all worthy of further study. Of course, we are concerned about the strengthening of the role of Recommendations, while bearing in mind the difficulties encountered in drafting Conventions. It seems to us that in order to overcome this fear, we should dig deeper into some of the ideas contained in this part of the Report concerning the overhaul of Conventions, as well as the subjects and contents thereof. Otherwise, the bitter struggle against any Convention may very well be followed by a bitter struggle against all Recommendations. It is thus up to the Governing Body to continue to give thought to this matter and to relaunch, and renew, the ILO's standard-setting role.

We are convinced that it is time for our Organization to ask itself more than it has done in the past about its modus operandi, its means and its results. Without renouncing our objectives, we must accept calling ourselves into question in order better to bounce back and to tackle the twenty-first century, in the hope of making even more effective contributions to the ideals of those who founded our Organization.

Original Arabic: Mr. GHOCHEH (representative of Palestine) — First of all, I would like to express my sincere congratulations to the President of the Conference as well as to the Vice-Presidents for the confidence placed in them by the Conference. We hope that the Conference will be a success and we hope that it will lead to appropriate recommendations and decisions which serve the noble objectives of the Conference.

The International Labour Conference has always been an important forum for the exchange of experiences and views and continues to be an ideal framework for studying the various problems we confront, and through our joint action, dialogue and mutual understanding, we seek adequate solutions to these problems.

I would like to refer to the problems related to economic and social development and the strengthening of respect for the fundamental human right to work, since the respect for these rights is a prerequisite for social progress. Man and the improvement of his standard of living have always been the object of efforts to secure progress and development.

We have always stressed this fact and will continue to do so especially since the Palestinian people have been the victims of great injustice. Through years of occupation and expulsion, their fundamental rights have been violated, and they have been prevented from leading a life of dignity and freedom in their own country and within the framework of an independent State with the holy city of Jerusalem as its capital.

We have fought for years to consolidate the fundamental rights of our workers and we have supported all measures aimed at guaranteeing these rights. We firmly believe that workers should profit equally from the benefits of globalization, so that economic progress resulting from international trade liberalization is reflected at the social level and should lead to direct advantages for workers.

For many communities, such as ours, which are suffering from a very high level of unemployment, the first of these advantages is employment creation to reduce unemployment and to provide an income and decent life for a large number of persons.

A few months ago we hosted in Palestine members of the twentieth fact-finding mission sent by the Director-General to the Palestinian territories and other occupied Arab territories and to Israel. You will no doubt have noted in the mission report the indescribable suffering that the Palestinian people continue to endure in the Golan and in southern Lebanon as a result of the continued Israeli occupation and non-observance, by the Israeli Government, of all agreements concluded with the PLO and the Palestinian Authority as well as the legitimate international decisions and the "land for peace" principle.

The escalation of Israeli practices in particular with regard to its continued policy of imposing an embargo, the closing off of Palestinian territories which is throttling our economy by preventing workers for long periods from reaching their place of work and by restricting the free circulation of goods, products and individuals between the West Bank, the Gaza Strip and Israel and also within the Palestinian territories themselves. This has caused much damage and great harm to our economy and employers, and has also further increased unemployment in the West Bank and Gaza to levels unparalleled since the beginning of last year.

In spite of all the measures related to the occupation taken by the Israeli authorities, the efforts made by the Palestinian Minister of Labour to find solutions to the chronic problems of the labour market in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, demonstrate our willingness to reconstruct and develop our society with the help of a number of our Arab brothers and our friends throughout the world.

With this in mind, the Minister of Labour is seeking to improve the performance of the economy and restructure the services available to the citizens. This has been noted by the members of the fact-finding mission who visited a number of offices and held meetings with leaders of various administrations.

The Minister of Labour, together with other ministries, and in close cooperation with the workers' and employers' representatives, is seeking to formulate programmes and projects in order to absorb more labour into the local labour market since more than 15 per cent of Palestinian workers have lost their jobs in Israel.

Within this framework, the Minister is devoting particular attention to the Palestinian job-creation programme which is being implemented in conjunction with the ILO and with the laudable assistance of the Government of the United Arab Emirates. Preparations are under way for an international conference on development and employment in Palestine, with the assistance of the Swedish Government, before the end of the year.

We hope to be able to count on your support and to ensure the success of this conference. These programmes which our Minister is trying to implement, in cooperation with the ILO, is aimed at finding solutions to a number of very acute problems particularly in the West Bank and Gaza, and to mitigate the effects of the policy of embargo and stifling of the economy pursued by the Israeli Government, in particular an end to the worsening of unemployment and the implementation of policies to fight unemployment and to reduce it to an acceptable level.

Our peoples wish to reaffirm their attachment to peace and reject the resort to violence and all forms of belligerence. However, if we do not put a definite end to Israel's policy of embargo and cordoning of territory, if we do not put an end to the problem of unbridled unemployment and guarantee the rights to work and to social protection for all disadvantaged groups, if the establishment of settlements, confiscation of land and imposition of Judaism in Jerusalem are not ended, and if the peace process is not accelerated in all areas in Palestine, in the Syrian Arab Republic and in southern Lebanon, our region will not know stability and security, and social and political violence which are likely to threaten peace and security throughout the world, will be impossible to contain.

Mr. JARIKOV (representative of the World Federation of Trade Unions) — The WFTU congratulates the President on her election and appreciates the comprehensive manner in which the Director-General, in his Report, has submitted vital issues for discussion.

The establishment of the ILO in 1919 to examine and deal with the social consequences of a global system of exploitation was in many ways stimulated by the rising working people's struggles worldwide early this century.

The latest United Nations human development report draws attention to a world that is today more polarized than in the past economically, both between and within countries. In over 100 countries, per capita income is lower than it was 15 years ago. In 70 developing countries it is lower than it was in the 1960s and the 1970s. Many governments have repealed laws favouring workers. The situation is no longer simply unacceptable; it has become intolerable.

The trade union movement is shocked at the lack of political will to implement the solemn commitments undertaken at the Copenhagen World Summit for Social Development and at the maintenance of policies which further worsened the social crisis. Since the Summit the big companies have been competing to eliminate jobs to impress speculators on the stock exchange. The trade union movement is alarmed at the current priority of the monetary fundamentalists to eliminate all the union gains achieved during this century. While public assets are run down and misappropriated in the name of privatization, budgets for health care, social security, education and training of young people are mercilessly cut.

Recent political shifts in Europe and elsewhere have revealed the extent of opposition to the current economic model, which has clearly ignored the social dimension.

We consider that the adoption of the proposed solemn declaration by this Conference should go hand in hand with the strengthening of existing Conventions and new monitoring mechanisms to help secure the effective implementation of labour standards.

The ILO should urge governments to enact and implement progressive and not regressive legislation, and adopt laws whereby all enterprises, the multinationals included, declare in their annual reports the state of compliance with international labour standards. The tendency of certain big companies and employers to organize and finance a campaign for a union-free environment, even by physical liquidation of trade union leaders, should be strongly deplored. We suggest that the tripartite declaration on multinational enterprises be upgraded as an ILO Convention.

The WFTU stands for united action, always exploring possibilities and remaining open to active cooperation at all levels in order to find solutions to the acute economic and social problems, in the workers' interests. We regret to note that such a spirit does not exist while governments nominate delegations to this Conference. We deplore the policy of exclusion, which amounts to discrimination, on ideological grounds, against representative national trade union centres, and strongly urge governments to respect the pluralism and diversity in the trade union movement.

We note that certain double standards seem to prevail also when we discuss universal compliance with core Conventions. Regimes which do not recognize trade union rights and human rights, and particularly the rights of women, are welcomed as most favoured trading partners by certain big trading nations, while they draw up a selective list of countries for boycotts and sanctions.

The social agenda cannot be shelved, distorted or turned against itself as a form of protectionism, as some people would wish. The trade unions reject high-handed policies of blockades or sanctions, and seek to dismantle economic barriers that destroy national agriculture and industry and hamper real trade between countries, thereby provoking unemployment, famine and poverty worldwide.

International trade cannot and should not be used to enforce dependence of countries and their submission to global cartels and multinational enterprises.

To follow the previous speaker, I wish to draw the attention of the Conference to the continuing difficult situation of the Arab working people in the Syrian Golan Heights, southern Lebanon and the Arab Palestinian territories occupied by Israel. The Israeli policy of confiscating Arab lands to build new settlements, the arbitrary bans and interference in the movement of Arab workers to their workplaces, the continuing repression and collective punishments are creating an explosive situation and are threatening the peace process. The situation calls for effective intervention in the international community, including the ILO, to protect the Arab workers and workers everywhere, to ensure full Israeli withdrawal from all occupied territories, and to achieve a comprehensive and just peace in this region.

Original Russian: Mr. STOYAN (Workers' delegate, Ukraine) — May I start by congratulating the President on her appointment to this high post and wish her every success in directing the work of this session of the Conference.

The Report of the Director-General on the ILO, standard setting and globalization gives a sufficiently broad description of the specific steps capable of effectively strengthening the ILO's standard-setting activities and making them more relevant in the coming years. I agree with the Director-General's remark that "all these measures may be taken within the framework of constitutional provisions in force". But it is also beyond any doubt that new developments will make it necessary to reinterpret the ILO's values on the eve of the twenty-first century. This will require much more than a simple "new reading" of the Constitution. We must answer the question of whether, for social development, economic growth can remain an end in itself.

Today, because of the growth of the world capital market and financial services, there are fewer and fewer people who have any doubt that globalization is irreversible. But at the same time, an increasing number of people are beginning to realize that the unfettered international competition which is often referred to as the "new jungle" carries with it some very serious dangers.

The new Ukrainian State is encountering difficulties in finding its place in world processes and structures. Most of the problems stem from its own inconsistent economic policies. As a result, last year was yet another year of disappointment for Ukraine. The drop in gross domestic product came to 10 per cent, as against the forecast of 1.8 per cent. Yet, the Ukrainian Government and a number of international institutions had said that 1996 would be a year of stabilization of production.

The Government managed to deal with only one problem: inflation. In 1996 we had an inflation rate of 139 per cent, as opposed to 10,256 per cent in 1993. None the less, money continues to be attracted to speculation, and remains outside the real economy. For the time being the Government cannot come to grips with the underground economy and has increasingly demonstrated its inability to meet its financial obligations to cover government orders and wage payments for its workers. Enterprises too have withheld payment to their suppliers and have stopped paying wages, which is a violation of the citizen's constitutional right to timely remuneration of work. In May of this year the debt amounted to nearly US$2.6 billion. It would appear that the non-payment of wages has become a new "macroeconomic variable" which is being used to control inflation and other macroeconomic trends.

Barter is being used on a massive scale. In many regions, large enterprises are paying for natural gas with their production, or are paying workers' salaries in kind.

This situation is costly for the Government, as most enterprises are unable — or do what they can to make sure they are unable — to pay tax. Tax receipts amount to scarcely 72 per cent of the amount budgeted. The population's real income fell by 12 per cent just in the last year; since 1990 it has fallen by 65 per cent.

Today some 70 per cent of the population lives below the poverty line, which this year was set at US$38. It is estimated that 35 million Ukrainians now live on one dollar per day. The already large gap between the "haves" and "have nots" is still growing.

And yet the plans for implementation of the economic stabilization plan will further impoverish the population. To please the International Monetary Fund, the Government intends to abolish a good many social guarantees and withhold still more from wages. It has disregarded the principle of social partnership and unilaterally submitted the draft laws required for such steps to the Supreme Soviet, despite the fact that many of these texts are unconstitutional.

The situation is exacerbated by the fact that there is still no definition of a minimum subsistence level, even though the country's constitution provides for one. The Government, taking advantage of this, offered to set the minimum wage at 35 griven, or US$19, per month. We have fought to ensure that the minimum wage is based on the minimum subsistence level.

Unemployment, which is officially at 1.2 per cent, is estimated in actual fact by various sources at around 20 per cent, owing to hidden unemployment. The trade union federation has thus demanded that partial employment and partial unemployment should be defined and legally recognized. All of this should be included in the new version of the Employment Act and the Partial Unemployment Act, both of which are now being considered by the Supreme Soviet of Ukraine, with our participation.

The Government has not only intensified its attacks on workers, but also on their trade unions. For example, the state property fund of Ukraine has tried by any means possible to illegally nationalize trade union property belonging to the union members' fund. We should like to recall that in the opinion of the Committee of Experts, the transfer of union property many only be effected by legislative means, pursuant to the provisions of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87). We were thus forced to bring a case before the High Arbitration Court of Ukraine with a view to defending union property. The Court upheld the legality of the administration by the union members' fund of all health and tourism establishments. None the less, more government claims are still being made on union property.

On the eve of a new millennium, the ILO has a wonderful opportunity to extend its standard-setting activities and create a basis for a future mechanism to foster the universal observance of basic rights. The ILO must develop a doctrine on the social measures which accompany the globalization process. In my opinion, the adoption of a declaration on fundamental rights, which the Director-General has proposed, is an indispensable step along this path.

Original Russian: Ms. DEGUTIENE (Minister of Social Security and Labour, Lithuania) — First of all, on behalf of the Lithuanian delegation let me extend to the President, my warmest congratulations on the occasion of this meeting, and wish her constructive and productive work.

Appraising the current situation and determining the guidelines for the future, the ILO is ready to reach an objective to sustain and develop the universality of using fundamental standards. It was clearly reflected in the Report of the Director-General to this Conference, containing a far-reaching overview of measures stipulating a greater relevance for standard-setting action of the ILO in forthcoming years.

Globalization of the economy takes place in countries in transition to a market economy such as Lithuania. This complex process of the creation of a market economy is a complicated one. It has brought to Lithuania, as to other similar countries, not only the democratization of society and encouraging signs of macroeconomic stabilization, but also the marginalization of a number of social groups as well as job and income insecurity.

There was certainly a sharp drop in gross domestic product during the transition, but there has been a rise in the last two years. Inflation has been drastically reduced and is now stable. The unemployment rate was 5.9 per cent in May 1997 and it is going down. The main shift in the labour force has been some from the state sector to the private sector. Increasing employment was particularly evident in the rural private sector, where land was returned to its previous owners and private property restored.

The extension of foreign trade and the participation of foreign capital are increasing quickly in Lithuania. International competitiveness and activity of national companies face the same process.

The economic recovery has started and seems to be a long process. Nevertheless, today Lithuania has the prospect of favourable trends with regard to living standards, health, employment and education. Social protection will yield the best results when it becomes part of a development strategy based on the main human development objectives, such as equal opportunities for everyone, freedom of choice and empowerment.

The national labour and social law system has been created in Lithuania taking into account relevant ILO instruments. The national legal system gives workers certain basic rights, and labour relations in the legal system are being regulated following principles laid down by law, such as equal rights of workers regardless of their sex, race, nationality, citizenship, political beliefs, attitudes towards religion and other circumstances.

The Law on Collective Agreements of Lithuania provides for social dialogue for employers and professional organizations. The bipartite and tripartite social dialogue is carried out on the basis of the principle of equality. The established Tripartite Council has a whole range of responsibilities. It has the right to discuss draft laws and other standards in the social, economic and labour areas, to draw conclusions and to present proposals either to Parliament or to Government. The Council has the right to discuss the draft annual tripartite agreement on social, economic and labour activities, to analyse draft projects on the other collective agreements and to present recommendations on their improvement.

It is clear that these and other national legal acts take into account provisions of instruments of the International Labour Organization, as well as of the European Union, the Council of Europe and others.

At the present time we have ratified 30 ILO Conventions, and four new Conventions have been submitted to Parliament. I am sure this process will continue in the future. Nevertheless, making decisions on new ratifications, we try to evaluate carefully and approximate our legislation to these international standards and also examine the possibilities we have to supervise their application.

We would like to agree with the idea of the Director-General that it will be necessary in the future to draft new instruments more precisely and at the same time attach a greater role to recommendations as such.

The outcome of this Conference should be geared towards human beings irrespective of race, borders or continents. The principle of social justice does not recognize the conditional division. It recognizes justice. I call upon everybody to follow that principle in discussing the standard-setting functions of the International Labour Organization.

I am grateful for the honour to participate in this Conference and wish everybody good luck.

Original German: Mr. ARBESSER-RASTBURG (Employers' delegate, Austria) — First of all, on behalf of the Austrian Employers I would like to congratulate the President most sincerely on her election. I am convinced that she and the Officers, thanks to their vast international experience, will succeed in playing a decisive role in the solving of difficult problems.

The World Social Summit in Copenhagen, which I had the honour of attending, and the declaration of the Ministerial Conference of the WTO in Singapore, have emphasized the decisive role of our Organization within the framework of the United Nations family. It was stated clearly, amongst other things, that the promotion of ILO core Conventions is particularly important. We are referring to Conventions Nos. 87 and 98, freedom of association and collective bargaining, Nos. 29 and 105, prohibition of forced labour and child labour, Nos. 100 and 111, equal treatment and non-discrimination, and No. 138, minimum age.

Since Copenhagen, progress has been made with regard to the ratification of these Conventions. Singapore clearly stated that the International Labour Organization is the competent body for the formulation and treatment of these standards. The Director-General pointed out unequivocally in his Report that this should be our joint endeavour in future years. If one looks at how Conventions have been decided on in recent years one notes that many governments voted in favour of Conventions without the intention to ratify them. We have seen that for numerous reasons a whole series of Conventions were only ratified by a few countries, in sharp contrast to government attitudes and positions during voting procedures in Geneva.

Furthermore, I feel that close attention should be paid to Recommendations and that not all problems should be dealt with through Conventions, which are frequently not ratified. We should not forget that adopted Recommendations can also set the course for social development in a number of countries.

This year, once again, I would point out the importance of assistance granted to former COMECON States, in particular by multidisciplinary teams. In cases where the latter are not yet complete we should search for top-ranking experts to complete them.

A major topic of the Conference is small and medium-sized enterprises. Attention should be paid to the promotion of new SMEs. Developments on the labour market worldwide have shown that SMEs in particular play a crucial role in successfully combating unemployment. One of the specific aims of our Organization is to find ways and means to make a useful contribution in this area and to come to grips with unemployment.

Original Spanish: Mr. CIFUENTES MENDOZA (Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, Guatemala) — Madam President, this Conference is a successful one. I believe that this success is largely due to your able guidance and thus would like to associate myself with those who have expressed their pleasure at your appointment. I also extend these congratulations to the other Officers of the Conference.

As I have said on other occasions, on the 29 December 1996 the Agreement on a Firm and Lasting Peace was signed in Guatemala City between the Government of the Republic and the URNG. This gave greater tranquillity to all Guatemalans and put an end to many years of armed internal conflict. In Guatemala a new era is now beginning which opens up the door to hope, to a new way of settling our problems to a stage of dialogue and tolerance in which great hopes have been placed, and which would take shape in the strengthening of our institutions. In order to implement the Agreement on a Firm and Lasting Peace we, as Guatemalans, count upon the cooperation of the international community and various international organizations. With their help it will no doubt be easier to implement the Agreement. The International Labour Organization has always been present at our side, and for this reason, on behalf of the Government of Guatemala, I should now like to express my thanks for the support received.

These Peace Agreements confer on the Ministry of Labour a series of mandates such as modernizing the Ministry itself, strengthening and decentralizing the realm of labour inspection for compliance with labour laws, above all concerning occupational safety and health, and a new design for standards of labour relations. We are also committed to disseminating labour laws in the Mayan languages, amending labour legislation, training 200,000 workers, and making use of dialogue as a tool for solving conflicts. I wish to state here, before the distinguished delegates, that we have begun to carry out these commitments in accordance with the flow chart established in the Peace Agreements themselves. We hope to see as a result of this process that in the short term there will be an improvement in labour relations.

The use of dialogue as a labour instrument is worthy of special attention. It is for this purpose that we have strengthened the tripartite body in which periodically workers and employers meet to discuss and settle the various problems which occur in the labour field.

As has been recognized on several occasions already, times have changed in Guatemala and are continuing to change most radically. Our Government is committed to building a new State which pays greater attention to the question of respect for human rights and to peaceful coexistence. In this connection a process of cleaning out and reorganizing of the security forces is taking place. In the opinion of specialists, this process is unprecedented in Latin America. All of this is beneficial for the furtherance of labour relations and creates a new framework within which freedom of association and the freedom to exercise the rights inherent to the worker acquire very special significance.

We express our thanks to the Director-General for his detailed Report. We believe in the role being played by the Organization in developing and promoting labour standards, as also in seeking to make fundamental rights more universal. These rights ensure that the worker will receive the fruits of economic progress created by the liberalization of trade. Nevertheless, we do note with concern that some of the ideas expressed therein may be used as a pretext for masking protectionist measures. For this reason we consider that the Director-General's Report requires more in-depth analysis and examination before relaunching the standard-setting activities of this Organization.

As to trade union freedoms, it is only fair to recognize that my country has received considerable support from the ILO. That support has taken a variety of forms, and we hope that we can continue to count upon it. For this reason, as a gesture of gratitude for what we have received, I should like to take this opportunity, before this podium, to offer the premises of the Ministry of Labour in Guatemala City to a permanent ILO team which, no doubt, would be most beneficial for the entire region, but more particularly for Guatemala.

Original Arabic: Mr. ALQDSEY (Employers' delegate, Iraq) — I would like to congratulate Ms. Keltošová for her election and to congratulate the Organization for their wise choice in appointing her as President of this Conference.

At the time when we are talking about the globalization of the economy and international trade and seeking out ways to improve the flows of products, production units, capital and employment and when we are calling upon governments and international organizations to reduce obstacles to international trade, we see that Iraq is still subject to an embargo that was imposed upon it seven years ago. This prevents it from responding to the needs of globalization and trade with the entire world.

I should like to show you that the embargo imposed upon Iraq prevents us from importing raw materials, intermediate materials and all other materials necessary for production of raw materials, capital equipment and machines. That embargo also prevents us from exporting our industrial, agricultural and other products.

As chairman of the Iraqi Union of Industries, which covers more than 24,000 industrial enterprises and establishments in the private sector, I am duty-bound to show you that 75 per cent of these industrial enterprises and establishments have been obliged to close down. The owners have lost their means of subsistence, and more than 1 million workers who formerly worked in these industries have been dismissed. Other enterprises which are still working can only continue to exist at a quarter of their capacity, at best.

A large number of companies in Iraq have had to close down because of a lack of raw materials and intermediate materials, a lack of spare parts, or irregular supply of electricity. This has had a serious impact on employers and workers. A large number as I have said have lost their means of subsistence.

The embargo imposed upon Iraqi people goes beyond the economic realm. It also affects health, the environment, education, culture and all fields of daily life, in violation of the fundamental human rights of the partners in production — workers and employers — rights defended and protected by our Organization are prohibited to them.

I would like to call upon this august assembly, on representatives of all countries, whether from the government sector or the private sector, whether from the employers' sector or the workers' sector, to shoulder the moral responsibilities in all honesty, and to take steps to remove this unfair embargo which is contrary to the respect of the fundamental human rights, so that the Iraqi people may progress and reassume their place within the international community.

The Iraqi people calls upon you to remove this unjust embargo which has been imposed upon it, and not to allow the world economy to depend upon pernicious policies which know nothing of the interests of people or the welfare of the human race.

The Iraqi people request your help to rebuild their country and to reopen their factories and their production units, in the interest of all parties concerned.

To restate our position as employers in Iraq with regard to the Palestinian people, we denounce the oppression, terrorism, killings and torture endured by this people. This has been affirmed already by the mission of the International Labour Organization. We also appeal in favour of lifting the embargo imposed on the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya. We denounce all the plots made against Sudan. We are on their side and demand respect for territorial integrity.

Original Russian: Mr. SHMAKOV (Workers' delegate, Russian Federation) — The Russian trade unions consider the Director-General's Report a topical contribution, which raises timely questions for both the Organization and its national constituents.

Now that it has embarked on a path of democratic change, Russia is becoming a dynamic and responsible member of the international community. The workers of my country welcome this process and are attentively watching to see how in this role Russia relates to economic globalization and its effect on the social and labour sphere. It is important that expectations for globalization should not be let down. In order to prevent that, the ILO must, as is mentioned in the Report, "guarantee a greater universality in the application of its fundamental standards".

In the time of the Soviet Union, that idea of universal application stopped, at least according to its leaders, at the borders of the USSR. Today, the extent to which that universality is acknowledged in practice is a yardstick by which we can measure the democratic commitment of Russia's new leadership.

As a result of active cooperation with the International Labour Office, the workers of Russia are aware that the rights enshrined in ILO Conventions permit them to demand their fair share of economic growth. In those instruments they see an opportunity to take stock of the efforts made to turn the fruits of globalization into real social benefits.

In that context, we are interested in the discussion surrounding the introduction of a social label for countries which observe all the fundamental rights of workers. However, I am afraid that in the case of Russia that kind of label can hardly be put on 80 per cent of our products, for in our country one of the main elements of workers' rights — and human rights — is being violated. I am referring to the timely and full payment of wages for work which has been done.

Fifty-two trillion rubles is the amount of back pay currently owed to Russian workers. Does that sound like a lot? To give you an idea of just how much that is, I should point out that it comes to 30 per cent more than the monthly wage bill of our enormous country.

The measures taken by the State in response to the largest protest by Russian workers in this century — a protest against the non-payment of wages — have merely frozen this enormous debt where it stands.

The Cabinet of Ministers is now concocting a new law aimed at "setting right" the payment of social benefits. As a result the Government hopes to "save" some 30 trillion more rubles by cutting back benefits.

It is enough to give you the impression that the Russian Government and the state Duma are not so much concerned about sharing the fruits of democracy and progress with the overwhelming majority of the people, but rather about how to place the financial burden of the failure of their own economic policy on their shoulders.

To use an expression from the Director-General's Report, this "new form of the ideology of progress" will not only lead to disillusionment among our 150 million people, but is rife with the threat of a social explosion which cannot fail to have repercussions all over our "globalized" world.

The commitment made by the Russian Federation as early as 1995 at the World Summit for Social Development to provide every man and woman with the opportunity to have reliable and stable means of existence through freely chosen and productive work now sounds like a grotesque joke. It is as if the principle enshrined in the ILO Constitution has been reinterpreted by the neo-liberals as "no pay for equal work".

That is why it is so important to us that the Director-General refers to the need to observe the universally applicable rules of the game. These rules presuppose respect for fundamental rights, which, among other things, must be guaranteed by all the partners engaged in the system of multilateral trade. This is an extremely important issue at this time as both the World Trade Organization and the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development are now considering whether to extend their membership. We support the idea of adopting a new declaration bringing together the universally acknowledged fundamental rights. We also support the establishment of a supervisory machinery to monitor its application, for instance in the form of a periodic report by the Director-General on social progress in the world, with a subsequent tripartite discussion.

The supervisory machinery is in serious need of strengthening and improvement. In this connection, I would like to ask the Director-General how, with any common sense, it can logically be explained that the lodging of a new complaint can block consideration by the Conference of a complaint submitted much earlier on the same subject, and under a different procedure, and which has already been the subject of much deliberation? In circumstances of trade union pluralism this leads to discrimination against those organizations that are quicker to act on a given subject. It also makes it possible to use stalling tactics to draw out the consideration of complaints.

We are told that this question is not governed by any legal documents, but rather by well-known "usual practice". I should like to ask the legal experts of the International Labour Office whether the Conference is not a sovereign body which is capable of changing obsolete practices that no longer correspond with today's reality? Obviously, ILO Conventions are not the only things which may become obsolete — this can happen to a number of ILO formal procedures. When this occurs it does nothing to enhance the Organization's standing in the eyes of millions of people who expect it to take effective decisions and not become bogged down in philosophical prevarication.

This situation is by no means improved when some people hide behind pseudo-legal pedantics to eschew their responsibility to their peoples and the international community.

To conclude, I would like to sum up my assessment of the Report by quoting a well-known phrase from the Preamble to the ILO Constitution: "the failure of any nation to adopt humane conditions of labour is an obstacle in the way of other nations which desire to improve the conditions in their own countries".

A genuine awareness of this home truth on the part of all the social partners will make it possible to answer a question that many people are now asking: Is there a future for the ILO? The workers of Russia sincerely hope that the answer will be a resounding "yes".

Mr. DETCHEV (Employers' adviser, Bulgaria) — Allow me first of all to congratulate the President and Vice-Presidents on their election to chair this responsible and important session of the International Labour Conference.

Undoubtedly, the acceleration of innovation processes worldwide strongly influences both interaction in the economic field and cooperation in the elaboration of, and compliance with, the principles and criteria underlying the fundamental ILO standards.

Analysing our own experience of a seven-year transition to a market economy and pluralistic democracy, we are convinced that the underrating of any one of these factors either leads to a limitation of potential opportunities provided by globalization or puts to a test the proper functioning of the democratic institutions. This conclusion has been emphasized with good reason in the Director-General's Report.

The pace of reform in Bulgaria has been largely limited by the disintegration of the CMEA markets, as well as by the several years long Yugoembargo. The strict observance of the sanctions, however, has damaged our own economic development.

As to international labour standards, we are convinced of the need for further action for their consistent and flexible implementation and in the approximation of Bulgarian legislation to the European Union and other international standards, all the more so since, under the Bulgarian Constitution of 1991, Conventions, once ratified are self-executing and become part of the national law and take priority over conflicting standards of domestic legislation.

Bulgaria has opted for fast and resolute integration with the European structures and the prerequisites for this are now more favourable than ever before.

At the beginning of this year, Bulgaria started to emerge from a grave political and economic crisis triggered by an ambivalent and inconsistent strategy which had led to mounting insecurity and mistrust of institutions.

Efforts are now focused on political stability and broad public support for the essential principles of the reforms: removal of obstacles to the development of market mechanisms and to the inflow of foreign investments, introduction of a currency board arrangement and curtailment of the budget deficit.

The structural reform is intended, basically, to carry out an accelerated and transparent cash privatization, provide concessions for foreign investors and liquidate loss-making state-owned enterprises.

This turn of events lives up to the expectations of the private sector and especially of small entrepreneurs, who would like to see stabilization of institutions and consistency in medium and long-term measures.

The institutionalization of social partnership, dialogue and participation have practically strengthened the basic principles of civil society: recognition of freedom of association, freedom of negotiation and autonomy of non-governmental organizations. These principles are clearly outlined by the ILO mandate.

The new umbrella organization, the Association of the Organizations of Bulgarian Employers, came into being to satisfy a need for a collective action in the emerging market environment, for a common strategy to encourage structural adjustment and privatization and, last but not least, for social peace.

On this basis, the concerted efforts and initiative of Bulgarian employers are targeted mainly at more and varied consulting services, information and forms of training for entrepreneurs so that they can survive, achieve economic growth, make profits and invest.

Referring to the problems set forth in Mr. Hansenne's Report, we are apprehensive that within the framework of social partnership, we have not been able to shift the emphasis to innovation in the choice of topics and policies, to promotion of productive employment and the establishment of clear criteria of competitiveness of enterprises and efficiency of public institutions. We expect and try to get the upper hand in the search for a specific economic effect of consultation, in overcoming the show of disregard for some partners or others, which we see as a manifestation of paternalistic behaviour in the actions of the administration.

We are therefore called upon by developments in our country and also pressured by economic globalization to assume new and added responsibilities, in particular vis-à-vis the ILO instruments and their application in national policies.

We do hope that the employers' organizations in Bulgaria will continue to receive technical cooperation support from the International Labour Office. This implies our ability to share effectively in the activity of international institutions on the basis of respect for the principles contained in international standards.

In this connection, we would like to express our sincere appreciation for the assistance provided by the International Labour Office and its Central and Eastern European Team in Budapest vis-à-vis the reforms implemented in Bulgaria, in social security, labour remuneration, and productivity management.

Mr. KEARNEY (representative of the International Textile, Garment and Leather Workers' Federation) — It is surely ironic that just when the world at large is rediscovering the merits of the International Labour Organization, the ILO itself should be so powerless to uphold and enforce the labour standards it has established. It is equally ironic that the less effective the ILO has become in delivering justice to its core client group — workers, increasingly young and increasingly women — the more obvious has become the need for its existence and acceptance of its unique role.

It is thus encouraging that the Director-General in his review of the ILO, standard setting and globalization finally recognizes the necessity of making the Organization more relevant. Relevance is surely the key to the future.

How relevant is the ILO today to the thousands of young women — many less than 16 — stitching shirts for export in Nicaraguan factories, working a standard 13-hour day for 35 cents in plants with locked toilets, without drinking water and where physical punishment is commonplace?

How relevant is the ILO to exploited and abused woman workers in Viet Nam making Nike sports shoes? Recently 56 such women were forced to run twice around their factory's perimeter in the blazing sun as punishment for turning up for work not wearing the company's regulation slippers. Many collapsed and 12 were hospitalized. Another group faced similar punishment for talking during working hours.

How relevant is the ILO to workers making Disney licenced toys in southern China with mandatory 14-15 hours work shifts, seven days a week in unsafe and unhealthy conditions including exposure to chemical poisoning?

How relevant was the ILO to Carmelita Alonzo, a sewing machine operator in the Cavite Export Processing Zone in the Philippines, who died of overwork on 8 March this year — International Women's Day? She and her colleagues were forced to work 14 hours on weekdays, 12 hours on Saturdays and eight hours on Sundays without respite.

How relevant was the ILO to the 98 trade unionists murdered in Colombia last year? These and millions of other workers across the world feel let down. They should be beneficiaries of the globalization process but instead have become victims of unregulated exploitation. And where the ILO should be their champion it is increasingly powerless, unable even to enforce its rulings on core standards.

The recent popularity of Company Codes of Conduct and Social Labelling are a direct reflection of the failure of governments and the ILO alike to hold exploitation in check. No wonder an American commentator recently advised workers and their unions to save time, "forget governments and the ILO" he said, "put your case directly to consumers whose teeth bite much sharper".

Governments which ignore international labour standards and grant exemption from labour legislation in the hope of attracting investment or undercutting competitors impoverish workers, retard their economies and block development. Nor is this approach a safety-belt for retaining investment or employment. Note how jobs are now shifting from economies such as Indonesia and even Bangladesh to Viet Nam and China in search of greater and swifter profits.

The responsibility for making globalization socially beneficial rests with governments. They should begin by ratifying and implementing effectively the Conventions adopted by the ILO and particularly its core Conventions. It is shameful that governments come to Geneva every year, participate in the International Labour Conference, support the adoption of new ILO instruments, then completely ignore their existence. The ILO must contribute to this process by regaining its self-confidence and ambition, by being more aggressive in condemning exploitation and abuse of workers' rights. It must insist more firmly that member States ratify and implement Conventions and it must be merciless in hounding violaters of key Conventions such as those relating to freedom of association and collective bargaining.

In a global economy the Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy takes on a new significance. Unfortunately, experience with this mechanism has been particularly frustrating. All recent attempts to use the Declaration have been blocked by an alliance of the Employers' group and most governments. Attitudes have been determined not by the merits of the cases brought but by a politically motivated decision to block the mechanism in all circumstances and hence have it fall into disuse. The current ineffectiveness of the Declaration is highly damaging to the credibility of the ILO. The Tripartite Declaration must be urgently reactivated and promoted.

There exist, however, considerable doubts whether the ILO, relying solely on persuasion, can really be effective. If the exploitation accompanying the globalization process continues unabated, pressure for other remedies will grow. Perhaps the impact of such remedies, which necessarily may be protectionist in nature, will force member States to recognize that the ILO must be given real teeth to restore its bite and recover the multilateral initiative. Linking the protection of workers' rights to trade — an issue that is not going to go away — would provide such teeth.

Across the world the general public is rejecting unbridled globalization. The time is right for change. The ILO must grasp the opportunity to saddle economic advance to social progress. If it fails, exploited workers everywhere, such as those in the textiles, garment and shoe industries will surely be forgiven if their eyes simply glaze over at the mention of the words "International Labour Organization".

Mr. GRAY (Workers' delegate, United States) — I would like to express my appreciation for the chance to share with the many governments, workers' and employers' organizations that are taking part in this Conference, the perspective of the American labour movement, the American Federation of Labor-Congress of Industrial Organizations, on the challenges as well as the opportunities facing the ILO today.

This year the ILO Conference is meeting at a crossroads. The time has come where it must make a decision of equal importance to the challenge confronting it now. The question is will the ILO move forward in its promise to advance social justice and dignity for the world's workers, or will it hesitate?

It is clear that the global market is no longer an aspiration, or even a point of contention, but a here and now reality. The global economy frames tremendous new opportunities and it poses the most important historic challenges of our time. It is not whether we make the watershed transition to a global economy, but how we make it. And here at the ILO it is not whether we are internationalists, but what values our internationalism serves.

For the American labour movement, raising living standards around the world has been and will continue to be central to our mission, and through the years we have worked to increase trade and aid, seeking to spread the blessings of democracy and prosperity. Yet the fundamental human labour rights, the ILO's core Conventions, the keys to ensuring sustainable and economic progress, continue to be denied, sometimes brutally in all too many countries.

Many governments have by now come to recognize both the opportunities and challenges of the global economy, and have committed themselves to the principle that economic globalization must go hand in hand with social progress. Simply put, it is the fundamental respect and values of human dignity that underpin any, I repeat any, sustainable advancement.

That commitment was made clear to the UN World Summit for Social Development two years ago. An unprecedented number of governments, in confirming the worldwide goal of full employment, agreed that there must be respect for the core ILO Conventions on freedom of association, the right to organize and bargain collectively, the prohibition of forced and child labour, and the principle of non-discrimination.

And that commitment was reiterated late last year at the first Ministerial Meeting of the World Trade Organization. While not as strong a pledge as it should have been, some governments and employers have since implied that the issue of any linkage between trade and fundamental human labour rights is closed. My brothers and sisters, this issue, like a book, is not closed, only a new chapter has been opened.

The challenge facing this Conference of the ILO is clear. Following the WTO Ministerial Meeting, the ball is now in the ILO's court. The decisions of this Conference will affect the ILO's credibility and effectiveness for a long time to come. The Director-General's Report importantly underscores that all partners in the multilateral trade system must ensure that the fundamental rights of workers are respected, and with two apologies to the interpreters, I would like to digress from my prepared text for just a moment to congratulate most sincerely the Director-General for having the courage and the conviction to address a political and emotionally-driven issue. I think his Report is an excellent one and it should at least engender a serious discussion. It merits that. It does not merit anything that smacks of hysteria or deserve any kind of distortion.

That is why it is vital for the Conference that this session should now agree to commit to new mechanisms which will strengthen the ILO's ability to effectively supervise all governments on their respect for the relevant Conventions, regardless of whether they have been ratified or not.

To hesitate at this juncture would only weaken or do worse to the ILO's purpose and credibility as well as to that of the whole multilateral system. All governments and employers need to recognize this, as far too much is at stake. We must together develop the consensus to move forward with conviction.

The global economy requires a new progressive internationalism, an internationalism dedicated to making the economy work for working people. For example, we need to elevate the rights of workers to at least the same importance as the protection of property in trade agreements, in the World Bank and International Monetary Fund conditionality, in the World Trade Organization's trade regulations.

All of our experience shows that allowing those who produce the wealth to share in it is essential to lasting democracy, social justice and unlocking the potential for human advancement. And that same experience shows that the most effective way to achieve that is to guarantee workers' basic rights.

We say in the United States labour movement, America needs a raise. Indeed the whole world needs a raise, and not just in wages and benefits for workers, but in basic respect for workers and the work that they do.

Original Portuguese: Mr. PEREIRA MONTOYA (Employers' delegate, Portugal) — First of all, Madam President, may I congratulate you on your election to this important function and wish you great success.

The ILO, standard setting and globalization constitutes a theme of general importance as proposed by the Director-General of the ILO.

As shown in the first paragraph on page one of the Report, this was the first one for 13 years on ILO action, since when "the economic, political and social environment has undergone a change of a magnitude that is probably unprecedented in the ILO's history". At the beginning we were able to note that in the past few years there has been a very great increase in competition between countries, economies and enterprises, which resulted in major reforms of economic activity at the national level and even in certain zones of the world.

For example, throughout the European Union, and particularly in Portugal, it has been very evidently necessary to transfer human and financial resources from declining economic sectors, because of their lack of competitiveness compared to other countries, and towards new sectors which have mushroomed over the same period. This takes for granted that sufficiently flexible legal frameworks exist, which would allow enterprises to give an effective and timely response to industrial changes.

The same phenomenon of increasing competition shows clearly particularly in the more economically and socially developed countries European Economic Area — the need to adopt measures which will lead to the reduction of non-wage labour costs; as a means to increase enterprises' competitiveness and employment, as well as the need to proceed with fundamental reforms in social security.

These two examples seem to show the fact that the social and economic reality today demands that a standard-setting position which is open to change must be taken up, otherwise standards will be completely inadequate and inappropriate to the needs felt at every moment. It is therefore natural that questions are now being asked about the adaptations that it will be necessary to carry out within the framework of the International Labour Organization in order to answer to the realities of economic globalization.

The Director-General's Report gives several suggestions on directions that could be taken on the problematics of standard setting, in particular the following: the introduction of new and topical themes as subjects for ILO standard-setting activities; the reinforcement of follow-up work on the implementation of Recommendations; an appreciation of the number of ratifications and the degree of implementation of Conventions; the rationalization of instruments of the ILO; and the role that Recommendations can play in the standard-setting action of the ILO.

In my intervention I shall concentrate essentially on the last three main aspects mentioned above, namely the ratification and implementation of Conventions, the rationalization of ILO instruments, and the role of Recommendations, which are the themes on which employers have insisted for some years now.

With regard to the first aspect, I cannot prevent myself from paraphrasing page 50, where the Director-General talks about "The ease with which the Conference opts to adopt instruments in the form of a Convention may be primarily attributed to the fact that many governments are prepared to vote for a Convention without seriously envisaging pressing for its ratification by the competent authorities."

Indeed, it is not desirable that the International Labour Conference continues to approve certain Conventions very often against an unfavourable and realistic vote from the employers, and realistics, when they know very well a substantial number of countries defend the adoption and approval of standards which are too demanding, while the same countries, in the final analysis do not bother about ratifying such Conventions. Or, worse still, they ratify them but then do not fulfil the obligations that ratification implies.

Still within the framework of this problematic, it seems impossible for the ILO to postpone making greater use of the machinery it already possesses, with respect to monitoring the implementation of ratified Conventions and following through the evolution of this problematic, so as to ensure that the rights emerging from the Conference should effectively produce laws which are real and will come into force.

A second aspect to remember concerns the need for a new analysis of the foundations of the legal instruments so far produced within the ILO's framework some of which have fallen into disuse, having finished their useful life, because they have been overtaken by reality and by social, economic and political dangers experienced over the past few decades. You have to be realistic and to abrogate Conventions and Recommendations which no longer have any effective use in the framework of the ILO objectives. In reality, just as has happened for Recommendations that have fallen into disuse, the Conventions are also prone to call the ILO's legal credit into question.

For the third aspect it is important to underline the role that Recommendations can play in the framework of the ILO, and I must mention my concern about the analysis presented in the report with regard to the progressive reduction in the adoption of autonomous Recommendations, that is to say ones which do not accompany a Convention, and we are concerned about this. This is referred to in the last paragraph on page 49 of the Report in the English version.

Indeed, of the Recommendations adopted by the Conference between 1985 and 1996, not one of them was autonomous, whereas from 1951 to 1970 about 55 per cent of Recommendations were. The dynamic action of the ILO would have everything to gain from reversing in that trend.

In closing, I would also like to draw your attention to an aspect which is becoming more widespread, particularly in the European Union, at least as an indisputable trend, namely that prior to any presentation of a legislative initiative being made, there has to be a study on the economic impact which the initiative might have, particularly on the competitiveness of enterprises and thus on employment. The ILO must also introduce such practice into its methods of action, so that its standard-setting activities can be compatible with reality.

To conclude, it is imperative that the ILO should use the means at its disposal as judiciously as possible, rationalizing the existing instruments (that is, in abrogating those which are outdated, if that is the case). In sharpening the supervisory machinery on the implementation of Conventions, and giving greater weight to Recommendations and autonomous Recommendations in particular, in the intervention of the ILO to promote progress, freedom and social peace.

Original French: Mr. MBILA (Minister of Labour, Cameroon) — Mr. President, allow me first of all to congratulate you on your election to the presidency of this important assembly, as well as the other Officers.

We would like to congratulate the Director-General of the ILO for his Report which has enabled us today, in this tripartite gathering, to hear your views on the new orientation of the world economy. Paragraph III(a) of the Declaration of Philadelphia proclaims the Organization's commitment to furthering programmes which will achieve full employment and the raising of standards of living, along with the extension of social security measures.

The role of the ILO through its standard-setting activities is clearly defined here and we can but support the ILO team, which has done an excellent job. Allow me to make a few observations. The majority of Third World countries were unknown at the time of the Declaration of Philadelphia, and their problems could therefore not have been appreciated. This Universal Declaration, however is still very relevant, which is why the Director-General's Report paves the way for a very exciting discussion. The countries of the third world are still struggling for survival.

Unless we are mistaken, poverty is gaining ground even in developed countries. In our countries, where most of the population is looking for a first job right up to requirement age, unemployment can not be construed in the same way from one country to another. Aid is fully appreciated in all areas, and we would like to take this opportunity to thank all those countries which have given life to those who would otherwise have disappeared. The transfer of technology was successful initially, but unfortunately has not managed to influence significantly the situation in the majority of our countries. Scientific progress nowadays is so rapid that all segments of the population in the developed countries are liable to find themselves quite unprepared. So, you can imagine the panic that this creates in developing countries.

The globalization of the economy has already started in air and maritime transport, telecommunications, etc. Multinationals will no doubt not have any problems with this, which will just extend their borders even further. We wonder whether a tripartism was in the forefront of these changes.

Social justice should be achieved within each State. Globalization encourages comparisons between workers in the same industrial group or trade throughout the world. Here trade unions should extend their sphere of action, and we hope that as a result wage inequalities will be removed. Will the globalization of the economy attain this objective in the long term? We think it will. All it takes is a minimum of good will.

Updating standards seems to be indispensable in view of the rapid changes that are taking place. We agree with the Director-General of the ILO that globalization is probably an unparalleled potential source of peace and progress. But it cannot be left to its own devices, as it were. It has already begun, and we shall have to adapt. That is why developing countries, crushed by their debt burden and afflicted by all kinds of disasters, place their confidence in the ILO which uses a tripartite approach in its work.

The introduction of globalization should take into account the possible role of the Third World. Present inequalities are a fact. In the face of such unfettered competition, the basic values of the ILO need to be safeguarded, especially social justice.

The social clause is controversial. It could stem from a desire to protect future interests, and it could also risk excluding certain products in the world. We are in favour of protecting children and promoting their training, which should be a priority everywhere. Our best legacy to future generations is the health and education of our youth.

A number of developed countries today have known for centuries how to organize themselves. We would like to pay tribute to the Marshall Plan of the postwar era that relaunched a war- shattered economy. To enable developing countries to prepare for fuller participation in globalization, we feel that a Marshall-style plan would be beneficial for our fragile economies. As you can imagine, if our crushing debt burden were to disappear in one fell swoop, social problems would find miraculous solutions, and economic recovery would be guaranteed. This is one weapon against poverty that is worth trying.

Our countries are responsible for their future. We are well aware of that. International solidarity will bind together the liberalization of trade and the objectives of the ILO.

Mr. MALLIA MILANES (Employers' delegate, Malta) — The underlying message in this year's Report by the Director-General focuses on the need to ensure that the benefits of trade liberalization should be reflected in improved workers' rights. To attain this goal, the ILO's standards policy must be responsive to the requirements of the modern economy. International labour conventions need to be adopted to the requirements of today and in particular, to the ILO's essential priority, which is the creation of productive employment. There is, therefore, a dire need for a new standards policy aimed at strengthening the efficiency of the ILO in the field of fundamental human rights and at modernising instruments — which more often than not are too rigid to be universally applicable or hamper economic growth.

New standards must be judiciously selected and subjected to the test of "subsidiarity" in the sense that new Conventions should only be launched if it is absolutely clear that this is the only, or best, solution. In this context, we oppose any suggestion of drawing up a universal code of labour law. The ILO should recognize the sovereign right of nations to enact laws which reflect their national conditions and stage of economic development.

We, as employers, favour the adoption of a solemn declaration by the Conference, incorporating a set of principles of fundamental rights which are already recognized by the Constitution and contained in the ILO's fundamental Conventions. At the same time, the programme of revising, where necessary, Conventions in force should proceed apace. It is imperative that all Conventions should be adopted to new conditions.

Turning now to Recommendations, we should stop considering them solely as a supplement to Conventions. Because they are flexible by nature, Recommendations are assuming greater relevance and importance. We should move away from the erroneous position we have held for so many years — that standards are synonymous with Conventions.

The present practice of sending questionnaires to member States to prepare for the work of the Conference is not conducive to attaining the Organization's objective. This system all too often fails to reflect the differences and difficulties that invariably arise during the stage when solutions are being discussed or proposed, which are likely to lead to an acceptable consensus. A better way would be to hold consultations with group secretariats to identify and address the many problems which are bound to arise.

The new standards policy which is being proposed, imposes on each one of us a new approach with a new frame of mind. Government representatives should refrain from voting for a Convention if they do not expect it to be ratified by their own Government. The present ludicrous system of playing for the gallery should be stopped. A positive vote should amount to a commitment to ratify.

The ILO needs to look deeply into the conditions under which Conventions may be denounced. The present system is too restrictive. Denunciation of Conventions should be made easier. This would help governments commit themselves to ratify Conventions. Over the years, new Conventions have been attracting less and less ratifications. We need to ask ourselves why.

We, as employers, fully support the introduction of a mechanism whereby Conventions, which are no longer relevant, may be abrogated.

In concluding, let me emphasize that globalization is today's reality. Globalization means competition for trade and jobs. Globalization has cast aside the debate between the North and South. Globalization has brought to an end the confrontation of ideology between state economy and market economy. Only a market economy creates wealth and prosperity. The ILO's standards policy cannot remain indifferent to this development. The writing is on the wall for everyone to see. What remains to emerge is the political will to cross the thorny path from words to action.

Original Spanish: Mr. GARZON (Workers' delegate, Colombia) — On behalf of the Workers' delegations, I would like to express my congratulations to the President on her well-deserved election to the post.

It has been a source of constant concern to us that, in the name of unity, governments and employers have time and again insisted that the ILO should substantially modify its structures, policies and practices with a view to ending tripartism and turning this Organization into a mere advisory body.

For this reason Colombian workers are very pleased to draw attention to the Report of the Director-General which we consider to be timely and bold in its initiatives and approach. How can we fail to consider timely a Report which is based on a complex and dramatic diagnosis of a social situation which shows that so-called globalization of the economy has had serious repercussions on the quality of life of workers throughout the world.

The data provided by the specialized bodies of the United Nations are telling in this respect. Per capita income of more than 100 countries is lower than it was 15 years ago. Three-fifths of the human race live in poverty and the net assets of the 358 wealthiest persons in the world are equal to the income of 2,300 million people, or 45 per cent of the human race. In 1994, 35,000 children died daily from illness and malnutrition. There are 100 million street children 40 million of whom are in Latin America, 25 million in Asia and 10 million in Africa.

Today, the unemployment rate in Latin America is the highest it has been in the last 20 years. Since it is a region rich in natural resources, as in the case of Colombia — the fourth largest banana producer in the world, second largest producer of flowers, the largest in emeralds, 16th in oil, sixth in coal, the fifth in water resources and exporters of ferronickel.

Nevertheless, 53 per cent of the population live in poverty, 17 per cent of whom live in absolute poverty; 20 per cent of the population suffer from acute malnutrition, 43 per cent have no access to health care, 50 per cent have no drinking water, 42 per cent are without sewerage systems and 15,000 children live in the streets. Unemployment stands at 12.7 per cent but 56 per cent of the population is underemployed or working in the informal economy.

It is rather contradictory that governments and employers of developing countries call into question, object to and criticize the Director-General's Report when precisely they should be able to appreciate the boldness with which he has presented alternatives, to establish a social supervisory mechanism from the ILO aimed at protecting those very same developing countries as confirmed by the impact of the current model on these countries. Without endorsing the claims of the developed countries, their position may very well appear more logical, but this is not the case with the developing countries.

We do not hesitate to endorse the proposals made by the Director-General. Over the last six years we have noted the need to add a social dimension to regional integration processes. In the case of the Andean region, it has not been worthy of attention from the governments and employers. We have placed great expectations on the World Summit for Social Development because of the various initiatives taken. Even now, when it was clearly established at the Singapore meeting of the WTO that the ILO is the competent body to establish and deal with standards regulating labour rights, it is vital to recognize that, at the international level and through various interpretations, attempts are being made to postpone or snuff at efforts to set standards, to regulate or control the process of trade liberalization as it relates to social guarantees.

In this context, we feel that the suggestion, made by the Director-General, of a periodic report on social progress in the world to be followed by a tripartite discussion to facilitate systematic evaluation is a good one. However, we shall also add the need for a certain amount of pressure to be exerted through Recommendations obliging governments to assume commitments, in order to overcome this social situation, as opposed to what now happens with the failure to ratify Conventions, or through declarations, the avoidance of responsibility for compliance.

For this reason, the so-called social label is relevant, but I hasten to warn that it should not become a tool of protectionist manipulation or of political interference by powerful States, to the detriment of weaker States. Nevertheless, this argument cannot justify the paranoia of many governments which try to avoid making commitments on compliance with agreements.

If the Conventions, especially the core Conventions, are observed, there is no need for any form of supervision. In other words he who owes nothing, fears nothing.

People are not only victims of the social and economic effects of unbridled trade liberalization, but also of the effects of political violence. This has materialized in Colombia in the internal displacement of a million persons, 10 per cent of the population have had to leave the country, 2,300 trade unionists have been killed in ten years, with a 99.5 per cent rate of impunity, plus the constant death threats against trade unionists, restrictions on the part of successive Colombian governments on political and trade union freedoms recognized by the ILO, and the absurd application to trade union action of a justice system which uses the pretext of combating drug trafficking and guerrilla movements to criminalize and penalize social protest. We are nevertheless optimistic that in the immediate future, after this meeting, positive measures will be adopted to reduce the sufferings of workers throughout the world and in Colombia in particular.

Original Spanish: Mr. GONZALEZ RODRIGUEZ (Employers' delegate, Cuba) — We wish first of all to express our congratulations to the President on her election and to wish her success in her work. The Director-General's Report entitled The ILO, standard setting and globalization raises enumerable ideas aimed at increasing the role of the ILO in the standard-setting field to meet the challenges of today's world.

The employers' group from Cuba supports the upgrading of these standards and their monitoring within a context in which due respect is given to the various levels of economic development and the will of countries to their own self-determination.

The changes which have been suggested must protect the developing countries from all kinds of protectionism, and at the same time the rich countries must collaborate in ways to ensure the eradication of the causes of unemployment, low standards of living and poverty. Economic development is inconceivable if it does not play its role in raising people's standards of living.

We, the Cuban employers, have been subjected for more than 35 years to a cruel blockade which has prevented us from having access to many sources of financing, has limited foreign investments in our country and has raised obstacles to our trade. Therefore we believe that on the threshold of the third millennium it is imperative to put an end to these prehistoric practices by those who, given their power, do not heed international protests.

How can we struggle against poverty, unemployment and social rights when faced with such practices. The ILO must condemn such conduct.

What concerns us about the Report of the Director-General is not the defence of the appropriate implementation of international labour standards, which is only legitimate and fair and which is advocated in the Declaration of Philadelphia, but the interference in the affairs of individual countries. It is up to each State to carry out inspection in the labour field. To condition the market and trade by international labour standards is a new form of protectionism by the powerful, by the developed countries against our peoples, against our entrepreneurial activities.

We share the view expressed here by many delegates that the focus of the Report goes beyond the Singapore mandate which rejected the linkage of international labour standards to trade.

Finally, the Cuban employers would like to stress our disagreement with the social label and to warn of possible negative repercussions on developing countries.

We should all work together, united, in order to guarantee the basic rights of workers, but we must be aware that in conjunction with standard-setting activities and their monitoring this will only be possible once we eliminate the true causes, and it is to achieve this goal that the ILO should dedicate all its efforts.

Mr. HRDINA (Employers' adviser, Slovakia) — It is a great honour for me, on behalf of the Federation of Employers' Unions and Associations of the Slovak Republic, to have the opportunity to take the floor at the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference.

Allow me to briefly introduce our Employers' Federation. It is an employers' organization, which consists of 35 employers' and entrepreneurs' unions. This association enjoys legal status and was established in 1991 to create favourable conditions for the dynamic development of entrepreneurship in the Slovak Republic. It also seeks to protect and enforce the common interests of employers and entrepreneurs and the business interests of its members in tripartite negotiations of the Council of Economic and Social Agreement of the Slovak Republic with the central apparatus of the civil service, and with trade union members on issues of economic and social policy, and those relating to collective bargaining, the General Agreement, among others.

It liaises with the Parliament, Government, civil service and local governments, trade unions and international organizations such as IOE, ILO (UNICE, ICIE) and engages in public relations promotion abroad. Membership is voluntary, and any organization that deals with employers' issues, employs representatives who are officially recognized and competent to conclude collective agreements may become a member of the Federation. The Council was inspired by the former CSFR model of 1990. The Council consists of 21 members, each party having an equal number of representatives of the Slovak Government, trade unions and the Employers' Federation. It is headed by the Deputy Prime Minister and the two vice-presidents represent the trade unions and the employers, respectively. A fundamental framework agreement on social dialogue is expected to be signed soon by these three parties to social dialogue who are bound by an unwritten agreement to meet regularly in order to discuss and solve the most urgent issues of social dialogue.

Allow me, on behalf of the Slovak Federation of Employers, to express my warm greetings and wish that the Conference will be successful and will attain all the goals, ambitions and efforts of the International Labour Organization, which we also want to enforce and support.

Original French: Mr. DJIDDA (Minister of Public Service and Labour, Chad) — It is for me both an honour and a pleasure to take part in the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference, and I would like to take this opportunity on behalf of my delegation, and in my personal capacity, to associate myself with those distinguished delegates who have preceded me here on the speakers' rostrum in congratulating the President on her brilliant election to the presidency of this Conference. This election is a reflection of the confidence and the trust which the participants at this session of the Conference have in her, in the light of her skills and her wealth of experience. My congratulations are also offered to the other Officers on their competence.

I take this opportunity to express my satisfaction on the appropriateness of the theme of the Report of the Director-General of the International Labour Organization which is before us. This Report is most timely in the light of the difficulties facing the majority of our countries, and which initially might lead us to think erroneously that the present economic and social context renders inoperative the international labour standards.

Do we need to recall that liberalization of trade for the developing countries in general and, more particularly, for my country, Chad, involves certain risks for workers because of the constraints which it imposes? We wonder about the future of our texts, and what we can do to maintain social peace. When we recognize the importance of the application of international labour standards we recognize that they, far from being an obstacle, have made it possible for my Government to maintain social peace by favouring dialogue with the social partners. Thanks to the effectiveness of this instrument, Chad has proceeded to reform its labour legislation and strengthen the mechanism of consultation and social dialogue. Moreover, it has also looked at the ways and means to make more effective the application of the Convention on discrimination, particularly in relation to employment and professional trade. One major concern is the fight against poverty by emphasizing standard-setting activities through the development of activities which generate employment. These activities have been effective because of the democracy which now prevails in my country. After the presidential and legislative elections, the concern of the current leaders was to lay special emphasis on economic development based on trade liberalization and social progress. This has actually been advocated by the International Labour Organization in the selection of new standards and it is in this context that Chad intends to apply the appropriate recommendations which will be based on the present Report.

Chad is convinced that ILO standards will make it possible to effectively attain the objectives and values which are enshrined in its Constitution and in the Philadelphia Declaration, that is to say, dignity of the individual and an affirmation and recognition of this dignity both at work and through work, in the recognition that work is not a commodity. It is along these lines that the Government of Chad is reacting against the increasing number of children on the labour market. The Government is translating into action the Convention relating to the rights of the child and, to this end, a two-pronged sectoral programme has been developed to improve the living conditions of women and children particularly in the poorest and most disadvantaged strata of the population. This is an urban programme for children who find themselves in particularly difficult situations. Project No. 1 is on the urban development for the city of N'Djaména, and the second project concerns training and reinsertion of children in particularly difficult situations. This programme has the support of UNICEF and my Government would like to call on the International Labour Office and the International Programme for the Elimination of Child Labour (IPEC) to contribute to ensuring that we are more efficient and more successful in this sphere.

In conclusion, I must reiterate the readiness and willingness of my Government to contribute to the improvement of the normative and standard-setting activities while, at the same time, asking for technical assistance in the area of standards and in the elaboration of a national employment policy.

Mr. HOSKINS (representative of the International Social Security Association) — Last year, when I had the privilege to address this distinguished body on behalf of the International Social Security Association, I drew your attention to the growing worldwide debate on the future of national social security systems both in industrialized countries and in the developing societies of the world. This debate has focused particularly on old-age pensions because the countries of the world are adapting to rapidly ageing populations.

At that time I expressed concern about this debate because in fact it is a debate which is becoming more confused rather than becoming more rational. This debate has been taking on more ideological overtones and has begun to resemble a struggle between free market advocates and those supporting a more active role for the public sector. In this environment, rational discussion about the advantages or disadvantages of different pension and social security arrangements is in fact, and unfortunately, becoming much more difficult.

What then has the International Social Security Association decided to do in the face of this rapidly rising tide of doubts about the future of our public social security systems and pension programmes? The answer which has been put forward by our some 300 organizations in 135 countries is that we need a new consensus about the future of social security. We need a more complete understanding of the range of acceptable approaches for balancing economic and social policies. We need to have a better understanding of why certain models of social security have worked well in some countries but have not worked very well in others. We need to cut through the political rhetoric and the ideological posturing to examine in a much more objective and neutral way what works and what does not work.

We have also developed a very strong conviction within the International Social Security Association that we need to bring people together to sit at the same table who do not often speak to each other about social security issues. I am referring to those persons who are concerned primarily with national economic performance who do not have much contact with those persons who are concerned primarily with social protection issues. We need to reach out to the experts in the international financial organizations, such as the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund who for the moment are primarily concerned with promoting macroeconomic development. The leadership of the International Social Security Association is convinced that our Association is uniquely situated to serve as a catalyst for this kind of effort and it is for that very reason that the ILO created the ISSA some 70 years ago.

Let me insert one word of caution, at this point because this search for a consensus is not a search for a unique model of social security. We recognize from the very outset that there are going to be very many different models to ensure adequate social protection. So what are we doing with this initiative? I will give you a few examples. We have compiled a list of the world's best experts on social security and economic issues and we have given them a set of questions to answer and the answers to those questions are now coming forward. We asked them such questions as: How much should workers get back from their contributions? What is the interrelationship between social security arrangements and the labour market? What is the interrelationship between international competition and globalization and the level of social security expenses? What are the advantages and disadvantages of public pension programmes? What are the strengths and weaknesses of private pension systems? How can governments ensure that both public and private pension systems actually pay the benefits which were promised to the workers?

The answers to these kinds of questions are now coming forward and I want to assure you that we will be informing you of those answers through our publications and through our activities. But most of all we want to get the messages and the answers out to people who are not social security specialists, because social security is not an issue just for social security specialists, it is an issue also for all citizens and the purpose of this initiative is to provide the stakeholders in society with the information which will allow them to make useful and informative judgements.

We anticipate that our colleagues at the ILO will provide their unique perspective to this initiative and I am convinced that this initiative will represent not only an important contribution to the debate on the future of social security but it will also be a very good example of how international organizations can cooperate together to clarify issues affecting all the countries who are Members of the ILO. I look forward to bringing you more news on this important initiative at the next session of the International Labour Conference.

Original Portuguese: Mr. LANÇA (Workers' delegate, Portugal) — The Portuguese workers highly praise the ILO's standard-setting role, particularly the set of relevant standards which today constitute an important reference for the rights attained by a large number of workers throughout the world. It is indispensable to extend that set of standards to a larger group of countries, namely the more industrialized ones, for we cannot see the reason why many of these countries still have not ratified some of the ILO's most important Conventions.

We therefore support the adoption of a declaration which will progressively create the conditions so that all ILO member States, regardless of having ratified or not the appropriate Conventions, abide by the principles of the ILO's core Conventions concerning freedom of association, collective bargaining, prohibition of forced labour, non-discrimination, minimum age for employment and trade union organization at the workplace.

The Portuguese workers also consider it important to guarantee that the World Trade Organization applies a set of standards based on the ILO's most relevant standards in order to guarantee a profound change in the framework of worldwide economic, social and political relations, so that the workers can participate as much as possible in the benefits arising from the development of international trade and the globalization of economies, countries, regions and companies.

Experience has shown that it is not enough to define standards and ensure that they are ratified by most countries. The most important thing is to strengthen the control mechanisms and actions that contribute to the enforcement of those standards in order to lead to their practical application by governments and companies and their incorporation into their policies and strategies and into the everyday practices of State and employer bodies, at both the national and international levels.

It is therefore particularly relevant to state that all workers from a given country, and not only those producing for the international market, should equitably reap the fruits of globalization and that those policies, far from being utopian or impossible, can be implemented through transparency and dialogue. Without them, globalization will inevitably be perceived as a threat to the conditions of workers.

It is also relevant to underline that it has been acknowledged as indispensable to review the workings of international enterprises in order to achieve the goal of full employment given the situation of unemployment and growing poverty in large sectors of the population, especially in the more developed countries, thus making it imperative for policies of economic growth to incorporate public and private investment to make them productive and generators of employment.

The same is happening at the European level. If the focus continues to be exclusively on single currency markets, we will not be able to guarantee the sustainable development which is so necessary if we want to guarantee jobs in view of the unprecedented massive unemployment we are currently experiencing. Social cohesion is absolutely fundamental, considering the inequalities which are increasing day by day. The building of Europe should be reviewed in order to meet social requirements and, more particularly, employment needs. The democratic functioning and decision-making of its institutions should be strengthened. Europe must also lay the groundwork for a broader implementation of its employment strategy and enable its institutions to go beyond simple coordination and to actively promote employment policies.

Respect for ILO standards is the best way of ensuring respect for the fundamental human rights which are violated in so many countries. There are numerous examples to illustrate this point, one being that of the people of East Timor and the continued detention of the trade union leader Muchtar Packpahan, whose release we demand from this platform.

Mr. HAGHBAYAN (Employers' delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran) — In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful! I would like to congratulate you for being appointed as the President of the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference.

I am eager to share with you some thoughts on the ILO Director-General's viewpoint on fundamental rights contained in his Report and discussed at so many official and unofficial meetings. Even the employers' groups have submitted their ideas on the matter to their respective chairpersons within the Committees. However, more time will be needed in the future to analyse the replies of the member States to the Director-General's Report. Meanwhile in accordance with section 131 of the new Labour Code of the Islamic Republic of Iran, all workers and employers covered by this Code have the right to improve their economic situation, to establish and take part in their own associations.

Moreover, employers' associations have taken some effective steps towards the establishment of the Employers' Confederation in the Islamic Republic of Iran.

Last year, the participation of the Iranian delegation at the International Labour Conference taught us many valuable experiences which were useful in the establishment of the Confederation in Iran. Fortunately, as a result of some necessary measures and the adjustment of sections 3, 4 and 5 of the Labour Code, the Employers' Confederation in Iran is going to be established — and its governing body and Constitution set up.

It is important to mention that there is still a need for the ILO's assistance as well as expertise in order to have a better employers' confederation in the Islamic Republic of Iran.

We are confident that with the help of the ILO, the achievement of the objectives laid down in the Constitution of the confederation are not out of reach.

Furthermore, about two months' ago, an expert delegation from the ILO paid a visit to Tehran. During their stay meetings were held which highlighted useful information for employers and made us more familiar with the ILO system.

However, it is hoped that this kind of assistance will continue and the information obtained will serve to solve the problems of employers.

President: Mr. Khalil

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT (Mr. KHALIL) — In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! We shall now resume our discussion of the Reports of the Chairperson of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Mr. SALIMIAN (Workers' delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran) — Proud of representing the workers of the Islamic Republic of Iran, I wish to express my views, as well as the views of my colleagues and the workers' organization of my country, concerning the Report of the Director-General to the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference. I hope that this session of the Conference will be able to set specific and concrete guidelines to create a favourable environment suitable for the world of work.

First of all, I would like to extend my warm and sincere congratulations to the President on her election to preside over the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference. I would also like to congratulate Mr. Hansenne and all his staff on the work which they have accomplished over the past year.

The theme of the Director-General's Report is The ILO, standard setting and globalization which is a vast one, and as it would not be possible to cover each area within this limited period of time I will restrict my observations to only a few of them which are of critical interest to us.

In Islam, work is not only honourable but is also worshipped. The Holy Prophet Mohammed, Peace be Upon Him, said, "Try your best to earn for yourself and your family honestly, since such an effort has, in the eyes of God, a rank equal to jihad." In relation to employers' and workers' relations the Holy Prophet, Peace be Upon Him, said to his companions that, "Your employees are your brothers whom God has made your subordinates, so he who has his brother under him, let him feed him with what he feeds himself, and clothe him with what he clothes himself, and not burden him with what overpowers him."

The Constitution of the ILO and the Declaration of Philadelphia ensure the dignity of human beings at work and through work; in other words, it solemnly affirms the principle that labour is not a commodity.

Globalization raises problems which affect the concept of social justice. It destroys the principle of equal remuneration for work of equal value. The Director-General has admitted in the Report that globalization destroys this framework by placing greater emphasis on comparison between workers in the same trade or industrial groups and not only within the same country. The OECD has insisted on the need to heed the social dimensions of globalization, particularly the discrepancies in wages which were tending to increase far too much and risked undermining social ability. Recently, Ministers from 29 OECD countries issued a united message regarding the economic benefits of global trade but acknowledged that they had to work hard to sell globalization to the public. The communiqué said that the challenge for governments was to pursue policies whereby the benefits of globalization are fully realized and widely shared by all the groups. The OECD has admitted that the gaps between the "haves" and the "have nots" within some member countries may have widened.

We know that the logic of economic globalization is that the dollar should prevail over all else, which is not compatible with equality. It is for this reason that governments must be warned so that they are not misled by empty and crisis-waging slogans. Through their timely intervention and the participation of the other social partners (workers' and employers') they will be able to create equitable opportunities for all groups of society.

The main objective of standard setting is to create an environment favouring development and technical projects which lay the foundation for the application of standards. We believe that having fine theories, principles and ratifications of international Conventions is not sufficient. There must also be application in practice, by bringing labour codes into line with the Conventions.

There is no empirical evidence to support the view that there is a link between liberalization and labour standards. The thesis that low wages in developing countries are responsible for the loss of jobs and low wages in developed countries has been refuted by many authoritative analysts, including ILO and IMF experts.

The promotion of the concept of social labelling would foster protectionism so we believe that the ILO should play a more active role in helping workers as well as countries to protect themselves against protectionist measures.

We extend our full support and solidarity to the Palestinian workers in the occupied territories and the workers of southern Lebanon in their struggle against the Zionist regime.

To conclude, I would like to mention that the Iranian nation's unprecedented participation in the seventh presidential election was an historic event. The people's vote for the President was another vote of confidence in the Islamic system, the leadership and the revolution and is a sign of the alertness of the people and their involvement in decisions concerning their future. We hope that the President will leave no stone unturned in solving the pending labour problems.

Original Arabic: Mr. BEKHEET (Employers' adviser, Egypt) — In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! It gives me pleasure, on behalf of the Federation of Egyptian Industries, to congratulate the President on her election to preside over the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference.

Most countries of the world are, in one way or another, facing a difficult economic situation; they are suffering from insufficient economic growth, high unemployment and alarming deficits in their balance of payments and budgets.

This situation is often accompanied by harsh austerity measures. At the same time inflation is increasing at unprecedented rates in many countries; some countries have been able to control inflation, but that does not mean that they are immune to inflationary pressures. We also note that the economic environment is characterized by instability; this instability has an important effect, especially when it coincides with economic globalization which acts upon all countries, and is attributed mainly to liberalization, which led to an increase in the exchange of goods, services, and capital flows. Among the adverse effects we would mention is the increasingly fierce international competition which has accompanied the access of a number of countries to international markets. This led many countries to adopt harsh structural adjustment programmes, which necessitated assistance from international organizations and acceptance of harsh conditionalities. Among the effects of economic globalization is the predominant role played by multinationals.

In this forum, we are discussing the Report of the Director-General entitled The ILO, standard setting and globalization. Allow me to observe that economic globalization, and the social pressures that have accompanied it, is not the only element to be accounted for. There are other variables that also influence the economic picture: the conventional production methods known as Taylorism or Fordism, that are based on the production by semi-skilled workers of large quantities of standardized goods, have been replaced by a system which we call flexible specialization. This is characterized by great adaptability and more varied production. The new technologies and the development of micro-electronics have had specific social effects, for example the spreading of different forms of subcontracting work.

To this we add another phenomenon, the growing diversity of the labour market, translated in the appearance of new forms of labour relationships like temporary work, subcontracting and part-time work, which are often more precarious forms than the traditional ones. It translates also into the lack of interest of different partners, be they new or old categories of workers, public or private sector — all have had to face considerable changes over the past few years, which has led to a growth in conflicting interests which are becoming more and more acute, as the economic situation deteriorates and resources become scarcer.

In view of the foregoing, the social situation in the developing countries is characterized by the weakness of centralization and the conflicting interests among the members of the different social categories, accompanied by high rates of unemployment, falling living standards and wage claims to keep pace with the rising cost of living in a context of inflationary pressure. We should also note that governments have a very small margin for manoeuvre in facing this difficult situation.

In this bleak image we are surprised by the announcement of social labelling that would guarantee the manufacturing conditions of articles or products, which we consider to be "social globalization". The consequences of social globalization are difficult to predict because a preliminary study showed that the situation was bleaker than before. Globalization is in its preliminary phase and can only result in austerity, heightened pressures and a growth in the public deficit. The promotion of social globalization at this stage would lead to instability, and risk economic set-backs, because it will hinder the developing countries from enjoying the fruits of economic transformation and benefiting from the opportunities provided by the GATT agreements, which represent the only way to get out of the economic crisis. In addition, this will open the door to blackmail and international legal disputes.

The Federation of Egyptian Industries supports the social clause, but we should not overlook the social realities and economic perspectives. If there are attempts to create social justice, we will support them, but we should be careful to check that social justice is fairly spread around the world.

The Federation of Egyptian Industries supports the principles and objectives of the Organization, as laid down in the Constitution. In the past, the international community previously rejected any attempt to impose conditionality or linkage between international trade and international labour standards, and this was crystal clear at the WTO Conference in Singapore in December 1996.

Our organization has made considerable efforts in order to develop international labour standards, but there are still disparities and differences of opinion concerning the application of standards. For our part, we support the work of the Organization in this field, and in particular its action with a view to abrogating any obsolete Conventions, and we support the ILO's efforts to encourage ratification of international labour standards.

The Federation of Egyptian Industries in this regard stresses that energizing the economic recovery by the transfer of technologies, exchange of information, vocational training, technical and scientific research, which are the basis of social progress will have a favourable impact. However, the social label initiative, which obliges member States to comply with a set of fundamental workers' rights or principles, to leave all production of goods made on their territory open to an on-the-spot international inspection, is just a back-door way of going back to what the Conference rejected in 1994, i.e. the establishment of a link between international labour standards and the liberalization of trade. We are totally opposed to the introduction of a social clause to the international trade system, just like the international community at the Singapore Meeting. We also reject coercive measures with regard to international labour standards. The ILO should not be an instrument of persuasion to impose new protectionist measures on the pretext of respecting labour standards. Thus the ILO would become the instrument of the industrialized countries and would serve the interests of multinationals from those countries, with a view to prohibiting the entry of products from developing countries suffering from poverty and child labour. These measures are designed to protect the industrialized countries' products, which are very expensive for developing countries, and would take away the latter's comparative advantage.

The situation of workers and employers in the occupied Arab territories is deteriorating under Israeli occupation and I would like to refer to the resolution of the General Assembly of the United Nations of 25 April 1997. I would like to call for the reinforcement of ILO activities to guarantee the rights of workers and employers in Palestine. I would like to say that we call for a commitment from the ILO that it will not establish a linkage between international trade and international labour standards.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL-LOUZY (Workers' adviser, Syrian Arab Republic) — May I start by congratulating Mrs. Keltošová on her election as President of this session of the International Labour Conference, as well as the Vice-Presidents and the other Officers of the Conference.

It is a pleasure for me, on behalf of the General Federation of Trade Unions of Syria, and on behalf of the workers of my country, to express our considerable appreciation for the tireless and constant work done by the ILO to protect the rights of workers throughout the world and to guarantee them a decent standard of living by promoting the ratification of and respect for ILO Conventions.

We also congratulate the Director-General on his Report The ILO, standard setting and globalization. The emphasis he placed on respecting the fundamental rights of workers and on guaranteeing freedom of association, the prohibition of forced labour, equality of treatment and non-discrimination between men and women, and the prohibition of child labour were of particular interest to us.

We draw the attention of the Conference to the fact that the move towards globalization and the liberalization of commercial and economic exchanges, the growth in production, the reduction in costs in order to flood the market are not in the interests of the workers or of the rights they have long since acquired, because they cause a reduction in the number of workers in enterprises, factories and companies and in the benefits acquired by these workers in respect of social security and health insurance. Economic globalization which does not take the interests of workers into account can only lead to an increase in unemployment, as can be seen very clearly in the statistics of the industrialized countries; the unremitting rise in unemployment turns into demonstrations and protests which can even lead to confrontation with the authorities. The pleas made by workers throughout the world are the result of the loss of their benefits and rights. An end must be put to this unfettered globalization and to the fierce competition which is constantly eroding the rights of workers.

The privatization programmes of the 1980s did not lead to a society in which workers can look forward to a prosperous future, but they did enable the owners of the large enterprises to increase their turnovers, to the detriment of the workers. The social welfare programmes were unable to achieve the prosperity so much hoped for. We therefore think that the prosperity sought cannot be achieved through hegemony or fierce competition which both have disastrous results on the rights of workers. The ferocity of capitalism, the destruction of the traditional market economy system can only be alleviated by broadening the circle of workers who have retained their rights within productive institutions as a result of balanced policies. Economic liberalism must be restricted, workers' rights must be protected and extended by way of social welfare programmes and health protection schemes; consumers' rights must be protected, otherwise unemployment will rise, there will be more widespread unrest, purchasing power will diminish, recession will be the order of the day and bankruptcy will become commonplace.

It is our duty, through the ILO, to confront this grave danger which threatens us all as a result of globalization.

The economic policy of the Syrian Arab Republic has as its strategic objective stable global development. As there are multiple facets to the economy, we encourage initiatives from the private and public sectors and both combined to work towards stable economic development at the same time as pursuing social progress in order to maintain stable relations and, within society, among other means by the redistribution of income and wealth on the basis of fairness and equality, to promote work and better standards of living and to reduce inequalities among the various categories of society.

The working class and the Syrian unions are participating in an effective manner in economic, social and political life, exercising their trade union rights and freedoms and defending workers' interests by way of collective bargaining and the representation of their constituents in all economic sectors and within the public authorities.

The Syrian Arab Republic, under the aegis of Mr. Hafez al-Assad, the militant President, has set itself as a strategic objective growth and economic and social development in order to attain fair, global and lasting peace throughout the region. But Israel is refusing this peace and refusing to withdraw from the Golan Heights and the other occupied Arab territories; it is also refusing to observe the resolutions handed down by the Security Council and other related resolutions, and this is interfering with the development process in the Syrian Arab Republic.

The President of the Republic has said that our position is clear and that it remains unchanged. We believe in peace, we want peace, and we shall work tirelessly to achieve peace. We want peace to allow us to develop all our potential and to use it for the prosperity of our people and our nation, but we refuse a false peace, we refuse a peace which is built on injustice and aggression. The world is witnessing all the actions of the current Government of Israel, which are a far cry from being conducive to equitable and global peace or to the return of land to those who are entitled to it.

Peace cannot be achieved using a bulldozer policy and by establishing settlements. The Israeli policy of establishing settlements in Jerusalem, the Golan Heights, southern Lebanon and the other occupied Arab territories is a scandalous attack on the peace process which was initiated on the basis of the Conference held in Madrid and the resolutions of the United Nations.

The report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories, like previous such reports, describes the suffering of these workers as well as the economic and social injustice caused by the Israeli occupation. These practices have been condemned by the ILO, the United Nations agencies and the international community. The injustice and suffering are everyday realities for the Syrian citizens of the Golan, they are not allegations by the Syrian authorities as the report indicates.

I appeal to this Conference to help to build solidarity with all the workers of the Golan Heights, southern Lebanon and the occupied Arab territories. We also ask it to condemn Israeli repressive practices and Israeli violations of the most fundamental human rights and of international Conventions.

Original Spanish: Mr. PARRA GAONA (Workers' delegate, Paraguay) — May I extend to you, Madam President, and to the international community of the ILO as a whole, cordial greetings from the Paraguayan workers. I would like also to congratulate the Director-General for his Report entitled The ILO, standard setting and globalization.

Within the policy of economic globalization, competition is becoming a necessary goal for sustenance and development of all of our countries. Any discussion of the economy and the labour market has to address political, social and cultural themes, in order for it to be possible to have any detailed understanding or illustration of the implications of this field. Since 1989, in Paraguay, we have been going through a period of transition. We have, despite a great many obstacles laid on our path, been reinstating certain now widely accepted principles that make for a just and civilized coexistence between all people. With the fall of the dictatorship we have managed to achieve, in spite of set-backs, the projection of a new image before the international community in order to obtain credibility and support for our process of institutional normalization.

Among the major achievements we have made, I should point to the 1992 constitutional reform, the new administrative and monitoring system for elections and fairer elections themselves.

However, the ingrained flaws in our society, the lack of any serious economic policy, the failure to distribute wealth, the absence of any comprehensive legislation or incentives in the economic and social field, and barely credible administration of justice, are all still a sorry yardstick that holds little promise for growth or development in Paraguay.

Official information from the Government admits to being quite unable to generate the necessary jobs to occupy the workforce of the country. Twenty per cent of the economically active population has no steady job. Open unemployment is growing, while underemployment is increasing as well. This of course leads to misery, poverty and marginalization for the greater part of the Paraguayan people.

Incentives to diversify production are not receiving the attention they deserve from the government authorities. Nor do they promote small and medium-scale industries with sufficient seriousness. If the prospects do not improve, then Paraguay is going to undergo an acute and perhaps uncontrollable crisis in the labour market in the coming years. Along with this, there is urban growth due to the unceasing rural exodus, which is particularly strong in the major cities, and the problem of landless peasants who suffer from repression rather than being offered any effective solution to their problems, and these problems are becoming worse day by day.

One of the hardest factors for the working class to have to deal with is the almost total absence of training among a large proportion of workers. For this reason, many of them cannot find a job that would give them a decent wage. About 49 per cent of the economically active population has not even completed its primary school studies.

For the workers, the permanent increase of the informal sector is a matter of great concern. There is no protection here when it comes to social security, and the situation is being compounded by the absence of any serious employment programmes.

In these years of transition towards democracy we, the workers, have made enormous effort to ensure that the right to organize is respected. Trade union activities have greatly increased in scope. However, a blinkered and worthless interpretation by the Constitutional Tribunal of my country's Supreme Court has blemished the entirely worthy character of trade unions. Slowly, gradually and systematically the labour market is becoming a kind of graveyard of labour rights. The introduction of stability in employment seems to elicit complete antipathy from most of the judiciary. Basically, economic liberalization is being imposed along with increasing precarity of employment, job insecurity and enormous emotional instability, both personal and within the family, among workers. Using twisted arguments and capricious interpretations that trample upon the technical rules of legal precedent, they avoid unacceptable judgements so as to protect large enterprises to the detriment of the workers, whose rights that are recognized in the Constitution and in our country's laws, are becoming a dead letter when verdicts are given, especially in the labour tribunal. Proof of the aggressive attitude of justice towards workers' rights is given in the dreadful sentence handed down against the strongly unionized workers of the Pelar Manufacturing Company. We are very concerned about the Bill to amend Law 200 in Parliament and we hope that public sector workers' rights will not be damaged by that.

Now, when globalization is in fashion, we hope that MERCOSUR will contribute effectively to bolstering the productive and complementary economies of all its member countries, with fair distribution of profits, more strengthening of our cultural identities, and greater sovereignty for our countries. As far as we are concerned, it is very important that this idea should convert itself into a human space in which all of us who live in Argentina, Brazil, Uruguay and Paraguay can enjoy justice, solidarity, respect for human dignity and effective participation.

We hope that the Ministry of Justice and Labour will find the right ways to enforce our labour legislation and Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 of the ILO, against such powerful employers as San Antonio Refrigeration Enterprise, Inca Soap Manufacturing Plant, Transport Enterprises and others, all of which are permanently violating labour laws and refuse to respect court orders which demand that union leaders — who have been dismissed through discrimination against workers' representatives — should be reinstated in their previous workplaces.

We set much store by technical cooperation from the ILO and we hope that such cooperation with Paraguay will increase.

Finally, we Paraguayan workers have opted for peace and democracy. Consequently, the globalization and modernization that are taking place at the moment must develop in a way that recognizes the merit of specific solutions to social problems, and that always respects fully the rights and interests of workers and indeed of the people as a whole.

Original French: Mr. GADO (Minister of Public Service, Work and Employment, Niger) — Allow me first of all, on behalf of the delegation of Niger, to congratulate the President and the Officers of the Conference on their election.

In this period of far-reaching change and uncertainty, the entire world, and in particular the developing countries, are placing great hopes in the ILO's new dynamic approach to its future activities.

I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the Director-General on his excellent Report that is before us at a time when far-reaching technological, economic, political and social changes are taking place.

Apart from the main theme which is devoted to the ILO's standard-setting activities and globalization, this session is also examining the following items on its agenda: the revision of Convention. No. 96; job creation in small and medium-sized enterprises; and contract labour. And my country is taking into account these major themes, that require political commitment on the part of member States, to help it define better its national labour and employment policies.

The Director-General in his Report calls upon us to reflect clearly on the terms of reference to be given to the Organization at this time of globalization and liberalization. We are urged to address the following questions: how to curb the adverse effects of globalization, that is to say strive for globalization that truly takes social considerations into account; and how to ensure that globalization benefits one and all, from the richest to the poorest countries.

Aware of this situation and in view of the unflagging efforts undertaken by the Organization, the participants at the World Summit for Social Development reaffirmed the ILO's importance and gave it a mandate to pursue the objectives entrusted to it by its founders; indeed, the conditions that prevailed on the eve of the Organization's creation are still with us today in the form of poverty, social exclusion, discrimination, arduous working conditions, non-compliance with freedom of association and human rights, unprotected work of women and children, etc.

In these conditions, the ILO must pursue its main objectives and create conditions for peace and stability in the world. Other objectives also include: the respect of human dignity at the workplace, the promotion of social democracy through the recognition of freedom of association and dialogue among the social partners and governments, employment promotion and vocational training, measures to combat unemployment and underemployment and, finally, the elimination of discrimination in all its forms.

The pursuance of these objectives shows how relevant and crucial the ILO standard-setting and technical cooperation activities are in a world that is in the throes of change.

My country supports the proposals made by the Director-General in his Report, that are designed to protect the world from the social dangers that may ensue from economic globalization.

As regards the new proposal for an overall social label, Niger takes note. However, as this would undoubtedly be very complicated to implement, I would urge all constituents to reflect carefully on this and to take into account our social and economic situations. Finally, convinced that the topics chosen for discussion are sensitive and extremely relevant, we hope that under the able guidance of the President the results of the Conference will live up to our expectations.

Original Italian: Mr. VANNI (Workers' delegate, Italy) — The Report of the Director-General rightly claims that although globalization of the economy is undoubtedly an unequalled factor of progress and peace, it cannot be left entirely to its own devices. Trade liberalization, and the related growing interdependence of economies, sustained only by uncurbed competition, far from creating new jobs, is indeed likely to lead to social conflicts and, in the long run, to new forms of protectionism.

Competition amongst major economic areas, which has become necessary due to the inadequacies of national economies, will lead to a marginalization of the weakest countries and peoples. To achieve balanced economic growth and overall development, economic development must be linked to social progress, both in industrialized countries and even more so in developing ones.

The introduction of a social clause into international trade was wrongly seen in the past as a means of introducing new forms of discrimination. Today, after Singapore and Copenhagen, everyone realizes that respect for basic human rights at work is the very foundation of peaceful social coexistence and as such comes under the mandate of the ILO.

The Director-General's proposed idea that ILO membership presupposes respect for the principles underlying the seven core Conventions, and that this respect should be embodied in a solemn declaration to be adopted in 1998 which would be binding on all member States, has the wholehearted support of the Italian workers.

Only the right to freedom of association and collective bargaining can eventually increase consumption in all countries and transform free trade into social progress and full employment. It is only in this perspective that the citizens of developed countries can accept through solidarity and social cohesion the temporary unemployment, low wages and precarious conditions that currently characterize the economies of the European countries during this reconstruction phase. It is against this background that there seems to be particular justification for a periodic report by the ILO on social progress and the introduction of an overall social label for countries that accept reliable and legally autonomous international inspection.

The problems of full employment, the changing nature of work, sustainable social security cannot be solved by deregulating employment relationships at the national level or through a weakening of ILO regulations or rules in other international institutions. Unless monetary union is capable of uniting an economic Europe with a social Europe, the European Union will not bring about the social cohesion that was the driving force behind growth achieved to date. It is social dialogue, tripartite dialogue, not a standstill in standard-setting activities that is therefore the appropriate instrument for the introduction of new rules for new forms of work in order to decide what amendments must be made to international standards. The collective interests of workers must be defended through these standards. A society composed only of individuals struggling to survive and to gain a larger share of wealth is a society where large numbers of people are likely to be marginalized.

Italian workers, who firmly believe in solidarity and social cohesion, are making considerable sacrifices, and this applies to other European workers as well, in the hope of establishing through wage policy and tripartite consultation, a new framework for economic stability in accordance with the commitments of the European Union and with economic globalization. Only evidence that the new international division of labour produces wealth which leads to broader development, and to broader participation, can lend meaning to the radical changes in production and trade that have been triggered by globalization. And all this must serve the interests of enterprises as well as of workers. The central role of the enterprise in the market economy cannot be supplanted by the central role of capital, for enterprises are composed as much of capital as of labour.

Original Spanish: Mr. VELOZ CUEVA (Workers' delegate, Ecuador) — In the name of the delegation of workers of Ecuador, may I start by congratulating the President on her election to preside over the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference. We are sure that under her leadership this session will have positive results.

I would like to congratulate the Chairman of the Governing Body and the Director-General on their reports, and particularly the Director-General's Report entitled The ILO, standard setting and globalization.

Since its inception, the ILO has proven to be a specialized seed-bed for international labour standards which have been drawn up on an equitable basis and with a view to social justice, and, at the same time, which are pertinent to the social and economic reality of the times.

The Director-General aptly and intelligently points out the phenomena underlying what has come to be called globalization or internationalization. With these processes, we witness increasing unemployment in the world, a reality which is affecting the most developed countries, and is also becoming a real cause for alarm in the developing countries.

So-called international competition produces a painful reality, as even those workers who still have work are now being deprived of it. Therefore, we agree with the Director-General when he says that ILO standards are an important means for the Organization to achieve its objectives and give effect to its values, which include human dignity, a dignity that we believe is achieved through the right to work, the right to privacy and the right to an identity as part of human fulfilment.

Now more than ever, in spite of certain prophets of doom who talk about the disappearance of the ILO, our Organization must enhance its role as a source of protective standards for the most important resource on earth — people.

Our delegation cannot help but to briefly mention the reality which we workers in Ecuador have faced since the last session of the Conference.

Since 1996 we have so far had three governments: first, the neo-conservative Government of Mr. Sixto Duran Ballen, which left a legacy of some 60,000 public sector employees who were put out of work. With these lay-offs came the de facto disappearance of various unions and also the termination of numerous collective agreements.

On 10 August 1996 the populist Government of Mr. Abdala Bucaram came to power. It continued the economic plans and programmes of its predecessor, carrying out massive lay-offs in the public sector. From the very start this Government consistently insulted the leaders of the trade unions in general, and specifically attacked the union organizations and leaders in the petroleum sector. For these excesses and other acts of corruption, the Ecuadorean public responded massively in favour of the general strike which was called by the patriotic front, driven by the four trade union confederations which formed the FUT workers' united front, and other social organizations. The days of 5 and 6 February will go down in history, as that is when the Congress revoked the powers of the President and nominated Dr. Fabian Alarcon Rivera as interim President.

The workers of Ecuador are concerned because the successive governments have disregarded the comments repeatedly made by the Committee of experts with regard to the fulfilment of Conventions relating to freedom of association, the right to unionize and to collectively bargain, the Convention on employment policy and Conventions on nationalities and indigenous workers, among others.

And yet the workers, with a dedicated sense of patriotism, are helping to find solutions to the severe social problems which Ecuador now faces: 25 per cent inflation, 14 per cent unemployment and 65 per cent underemployment, plus 80 per cent of the population of Ecuador living at the poverty line and the minimum monthly wage at 30 dollars, which does not even cover the bare necessities.

By developing a dialogue with the employers, we were able to reach a consultation agreement and eventually conclude a social pact, which was signed on 9 September 1996 with the Government. The agreement was ratified by the present Government on 19 March of this year. At the moment, there are five working groups operating on a tripartite basis in the following fields: wage policy and standardization; social security; employment; training and vocational skill enhancement; and the modernization of labour relations.

We hope that with the common efforts of the workers, employers and governments, and with the effective help and supervision of the ILO, it will be possible quickly to achieve concrete results towards making the social pact a reality and ensuring that the world of work offers full social justice and freedom.

Original Spanish: Mr. BROWN YOUNG (Workers' delegate, Costa Rica) — It has been correctly said that we are not living in a period of change, but in a change of period. This is the period of globalization, of the construction of a world village.

Globalization proposes unique new scenarios to delegates to this Conference. To understand this globalization process is a task for everybody. We can only find appropriate solutions to the problems which have been posed if we place them within a general questioning about the reasons why human beings live in societies.

We cannot accept that technological development and the accumulation of wealth become ends in themselves. This disregard of the importance of people and in favour of things, this fatal submission to social forces denying people their capacity to lead their own lives, is without doubt the greatest folly ever conceived. This is not the way towards progress, but is actually moving backwards.

We now have sufficient information to be unable to pretend ignorance of the extent to which the gap between the comfort of the rich and the misery of the poor have brought the world to the brink of collapse. This unworthy dualism must cease. We cannot, as human beings, feel satisfied with ourselves for what we are doing. Africa is bleeding in excess, extinguishing itself, and its abhorrent afflictions continue, but such things sometimes do not even make the news anymore. Latin Americans can no longer talk about a wasted decade, but two wasted decades. We are not only straying far from social progress, we are also beginning to lose hope.

In most Latin American countries there is a real conspiracy against the development of trade unionism. The powerful sectors within society have converted the right to organize into a "foreign body", unwelcome in our country. Our most serious challenge as trade union leaders in such an inhospitable atmosphere is to obtain the necessary legitimacy to be able to represent workers and to defend democracy and the right of everyone to have opportunities for progress. The above factors make our continent one where it is very easy to demonstrate why the ILO needs to exist.

The modern theories of administration call for the importance of human resources and an imperious need to adopt methods of management based on the participation of all employees in order to ensure quality and increase productivity. Within that spirit, it is essential that employers should accept the right of workers to organize and to freely express their wishes. This is a development opportunity for enterprises, not a threat. The employers must retrain in their responsibilities as administrators of social property and understand that productivity and efficiency are explained to a large extent by the social, political and institutional context, and not only by technical measures that are micro-economic in nature. They must care about social and democratic development, including freedom of association, and feel confident that this makes good business sense.

Governments must once and for all turn their backs on absurd economistic orthodoxy. Stubborn reality has shown that the market generates antibodies which cancel out its virtues in fulfilling its function of promoting efficiency and a fairer distribution of resources. These antibodies transform the undeniable qualities of the market into authentic dramas, for which it is imperative to establish institutional regulations that will guarantee that the market of underdeveloped countries functions to benefit society, and not the other way round.

The unions reject social dumping, without mincing words. It is the wrong road towards development because it perpetuates our chronic structural inequalities. Our struggle is for the progress of all humanity, not for a part of it alone. Therefore, we do not accept that the levelling of working conditions should be downwards. Neither do we pretend that artificial leaps can be made, ignoring the historical development of our contexts, but we do claim our right to advance, and we cannot tolerate stagnation nor, even worse, moving backwards.

We believe that the Director-General's proposals go in the right direction. The social label would be a good initiative. In that sense, we believe that it would be appropriate to ask the corresponding body of the United Nations to include within its annual human development index a consideration of labour aspects.

Central America has finally managed to put military war behind it. We have achieved peace in our lands. Now everything gives the impression of progress, which we are making the most of. But solidarity for Central America must not be withdrawn, we must now defeat the social problems that cause fratricidal struggles, if not, peace could appear to be devoid of any content.

With regard to my country, Costa Rica, it is with bitterness and pain that we have to recognize that we continue to suffer from the repression of trade unionism. We have not had the right to organize nor to negotiate in the private sector, and now these rights no longer exist even in the public sector. It was a few years ago now since they prohibited collective agreements in the public sector, and now they are using a reform of the State as a pretext for dismissing trade union leaders from their posts. Legal verdicts for the reinstatement of trade union officials are not being fulfilled, and this is a very dangerous symptom of the formal character that our 100 year-old democracy is manifesting.

Mr. OWUOR (Employers' delegate, Kenya) — On behalf of my delegation, may I congratulate the President on her unanimous election to lead the 85th Session of the ILO's General Conference, as well as on the excellent manner in which she has been conducting the proceedings of the Conference.

The Director-General also deserves our congratulations on choosing the ILO's standard setting and globalization as the theme of his Report.

Since the ILO labour standards have been adopted on the premise of their universal applicability in a global market, as there are no regional standards, the preoccupation of the ILO constituents should therefore be to adopt standards that are flexible, effective in protecting workers' rights, and which can easily be implemented by all countries depending on their conditions and stage of development.

The problem facing the ILO is not so much the ineffectiveness of the current supervisory machinery but the inflexibility of most of its standards and costly adjustments that countries are required to make so as to bring some of their laws and practice into conformity with these standards.

The solution seems to lie in the ILO revisiting those of its standards that have received the least of ratifications and revising them to bring them up to date, in conformity with the imperatives of globalization.

It is for this reason that my delegation does not share the Director-General's proposal for the ILO to codify its core Conventions in the form of a charter with its own means of supervisory provisions spelled out in the instrument itself, with follow-up taking the form of regular reports to the Director-General and discussed, by an ad hoc committee of the Conference.

In this respect, the Director-General furthermore proposes that this special machinery will be followed by the adoption of codes of practice of products and of labels guaranteeing the conditions under which consumer articles are manufactured, or the so-called "social labelling". As has been noted by some of the previous speakers, "social labelling" is an attempt to introduce the social clause to the ILO debate by another name, despite the rejection by the December 1996 WTO Singapore Ministerial Declaration, of the use of labour standards for protectionist purposes on the ground that the comparative advantage of countries, particularly low-wage developing countries, must in no way be put into question. Just as industrialized countries have technological and managerial superiority in their modes of production, the developing countries' only comparative advantage is effective utilization of their labour force in the face of fluctuating prices of their commodities in the world market.

In this regard, conditions of workers, especially those engaged in the export trade, could be improved by the industrialized nations, providing minimum guaranteed prices for the developing countries' commodities traded in the world market, so long as the current WTO rules are amended so as to allow such subsidies.

My delegation also considers that the difference in ILO standards between the so-called "core Conventions" and "non-core Conventions" is likely to create an artificial situation where some Conventions will be regarded as second-class instruments, despite the fact that the non-observance of some of them may be harmful to the health and welfare of the affected workers, and even more so than the so-called "core Conventions".

The ILO is also currently operating on a stringent budget, therefore creating an additional supervisory machinery in addition to the current Committee of Experts, the Governing Body on Freedom of Association and the Conference Committee on Standards will only increase the cost of ILO operations without any value added whatsoever.

The ILO deserves the support of its Members in fulfilling the objectives of its IPEC programme, especially the elimination of the most abusive forms of child labour that may be harmful to the physical and moral well-being of young children and which may also interfere with their education. The programme has assisted in raising world awareness of the issue of child labour. However, some of the least developed countries, where child labour is prevalent, are also faced with mass poverty, and in some cases the bulk of their populations live below the poverty line. Therefore, unless the world community addresses the main causes of mass poverty, such as social and political upheavals, inadequate level of investment in both physical and social infrastructure, crippling external debt burden and an unsustainable level of development, then child labour will continue to be an eyesore in most of these countries, with or without an ILO Convention prohibiting the use of child labour. For some of these children the alternative is either to work so as to keep their bodies and souls together, or engage in prostitution, drug pushing and other criminal activities or to face possible starvation to death, given the fact that some of these children are either orphans or children of people displaced by social upheavals.

My delegation considers the discussion on the general conditions to stimulate job creation in small and medium-sized enterprises as a positive contribution by the ILO to address one of the most intractable social problems facing the developing countries. It also provides a strong anchor for the ILO Enterprise and Cooperative Development Department to prepare its programmes within the context of a unified ILO instrument. It is my delegation's desire that any instrument that emerges from the deliberations will be flexible, universally applicable and will lead to the creation of additional employment, especially amongst the youth. The ILO should rely more on educating its Members in fulfilling their obligations to the Organization and less on actions that may be regarded as discriminatory by some of the least developed countries, especially its determined effort to promote the social clause through social labelling.

Original Arabic: Mr. IBRAHIM (Workers' delegate, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya) — In the Name of God, the Beneficent, the Most Merciful! It is a pleasure for me to echo the foregoing speakers in addressing my congratulations to Mrs. Keltošová on being elected to preside over this 85th Session of the International Labour Conference. I am sure her abilities and skills will ensure the success of our deliberations.

It is with some caution and great care that we have noted one of the questions selected as a theme for the Director-General's Report, The ILO, standard setting and globalization. While stressing the important role of the ILO in establishing and promoting standards as a major component of social progress and development, we would like to point out that a good many questions contained in the Report have proved rather controversial for States. This is because, on the one hand, the Report stresses the need for the fundamental rights contained in the Constitution and the wide-ranging labour principles and standards which guarantee the dignity of workers, and on the other hand, it seems to invite Members to accept binding conditions and procedures that would even go as far as imposing international inspections on countries and the introduction of unjust clauses for developing countries, in violation of their sovereignty.

I would like in particular to make a link between labour standards and trade liberalization, the binding nature of Conventions, the adoption of a declaration establishing a connection between technical cooperation and state commitment to respect the standards contained in the Conventions without taking into consideration the circumstances prevailing in each individual country.

Then there is the matter of social labelling which is one of considerable concern to us, and causes us, the members of the Workers' group to wonder what advantages the workers can gain from globalization if their countries lose their sovereignty, their independence and their freedom and find themselves forced to accept conditions and systems imposed on them by the large industrialized countries, on the basis of profit, to the detriment of the developing countries, and with the aim of imposing their hegemony on the countries of the Third World.

We also wonder about the direction this Organization is taking, where it is heading. We are even within our rights to ask ourselves whether this Organization, which after all has its own very special status in comparison to the other international organizations, will go the same way as the Security Council, namely, become a tool in the hands of certain major powers, at the service of their imperialist objectives and their expansionist and hegemonic policies.

Our people have suffered an enormous amount and continue to suffer from the monopoly system that makes it possible for one single large State to dominate the international organizations and to urge them to adopt iniquitous resolutions against unfortunate populations while in fact such organizations should be striving for justice and fairness, and to safeguard the dignity of man, his independence, and his freedom throughout the world. The suffering endured by the Arab people causes us to call everything into question. Thus, the Libyan people has for years been subjected to an iniquitous embargo which has caused enormous damage to the whole population. It has also deterred from our production capacity, run down many of our economic sectors, cut down our growth leading to huge losses in almost every single sector — transport, health, agriculture, education, etc.

Despite the global support of the international community and of organizations such as the Non-Aligned Movement, the Organization of African Unity, the League of Arab States, the unions and other global and international bodies through resolutions in favour of the lifting of sanctions and the embargo against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, the fact none the less remains that the continued hegemonic attitude of one or two large States within the Security Council overturned the resolution approved by the majority of States to lift the embargo, and resulted in the continuation of the embargo and other sanctions.

Consequently, those forces that are seeking peace and freedom are questioning the impartiality and independence of the United Nations. Some now doubt its credibility. How can one otherwise justify a continuation of the iniquitous embargo against us, despite the international support offered to the Libyan people, expressed not only by Heads of State and Government, but also by the populations of those States as demonstrated by the public support shown by millions of people for our revolution under the supervision of our leader when he visits friendly countries such as Niger and Nigeria.

Furthermore, the Palestinian people continue to suffer openly and publicly. It suffers from aggression, the effects of the occupation, of the confiscation of its lands and the alienation of its legitimate rights. The occupying authorities continue to perform their terrorist and expansionist policies, trampling international agreements underfoot and completely ignoring the international position which favours the creation of a Palestinian State.

The countries that say they are fighting today for freedom in the world have done nothing to force the occupying authorities to put an end to the terrorist practices against the Palestinian people. Indeed, they provide them with weapons and funds enabling them to pursue their practices against the children of Palestine and Lebanon.

The Director-General's report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories points out the continued violations, terrorist, racist and repressive practices that the occupying authorities are continuing to perpetrate on the Palestinian people. This has led the credibility of the peace agreements to be called into question. Indeed the occupying authorities with their expansionist policies and with the setting up of new colonies are sabotaging the peace process and changing the physical characteristics of Jerusalem. This can be seen in particular with the Djebel Ben Ghanim and Raas El Amoud settlements and the ongoing occupation of the Golan and southern Lebanon.

We vigorously condemn the continued occupation of the Palestinian and other occupied Arab territories in the Golan and southern Lebanon. There can be no genuine peace in our time without the establishment of a Palestinian State, the capital of which would be Jerusalem, and without the liberation of the whole of the occupied Arab territory. We reiterate our full support to the Palestinian people in their struggle for liberation. And loud and clear we declare from this podium our solidarity with the people of southern Lebanon and the Golan, and with the people of Iraq, subjected to an embargo.

In conclusion, I would like to stress the need to strengthen the role of the ILO and the implementation of its objectives, principles and its noble values as enshrined in its Constitution, and also the need to preserve its independence as an international organization with a tripartite structure, in order to combat discrimination and hegemony in all their forms.

Mr. MHANGO (Workers' delegate, Malawi) — Once again, it is a matter of great honour that we are able to address this august body which is one of the most representative institutions within the United Nations system.

Although Malawi had by 1965 ratified key international Conventions protecting basic human and trade union rights, this was not supported by the promulgation of national laws to effect them. In addition, from a quick review of international standards ratified by Malawi, it is apparent that the country has not fared well on ratification and reporting on ILO Conventions and Recommendations.

Over the years, its submission arrears to the ILO are accumulatively very poor. In Malawi, industrial relations have therefore been governed by very retrogressive laws that made the labour movement part of the ruling party and Government.

Since the new Government came into power, labour laws were targeted for serious review. With the assistance of international organizations including the ILO, the 1996 Labour Relations Act was prepared. The Act is a major improvement over the previous Trade Union Act.

In addition, the Government, through the Ministry of Labour and Manpower Development, has encouraged trade union activities. Tripartite consultations, albeit not well structured, have also gained momentum in selected cases. Although moderate, these initiatives have been commended by workers.

Notwithstanding the above, Malawi workers' hopes keep on being dashed. The popularly applauded 1996 Labour Relations Act has up to now not been gazetted to be effective. Workers are at a loss as to what reasons cause the delay, especially after the State President had long since assented to it. Due to this, Malawi industrial relations are still regulated by the old retrogressive labour laws.

In addition, the Government's actions have not been consistent with its policy declarations. The recent public service workers' strike over pay revealed an inability on the part of the Government to properly handle an industrial dispute.

The Government's use of paramilitary police, police dogs, tear-gas, arrests and beating of trade union leaders and striking workers was reminiscent of the one-party rule of the past.

On another score, the Government does not even appreciate that Malawi workers are committed to industrial peace. Through the Malawi Congress of Trade Unions, public service workers had to call for a resumption of talks, since a six-week long strike was becoming too expensive for the economy and claiming human lives. Surprisingly, the Government was busy on its radio, issuing threats, dismissing the need for negotiations and calling the strike illegal.

Due to international protests and pressures from fraternal organizations such as the ICFTU Brussels, ICFTU-Afro and LO-Norway, the Government has returned to the negotiations. We are not sure if they are negotiating in good faith. We are closely monitoring the situation.

We have many similar cases in the private sector as well. A long outstanding issue involves the dismissal in early 1996 of 129 workers at the Malawi National Seed Company, a subsidiary of a multinational company, Cargill Inc., based in the United States of America. We would expect a multinational company with the status of Cargill Inc. to uphold international labour standards everywhere, and we appeal to all fraternal friends to assist us on this matter.

The current systems of economic and business management require laws that facilitate complex business practices. Until this is done, Malawi will not move forward. For their part, Malawi workers are prepared to play a constructive role through tripartite arrangements and maintaining industrial peace through collective bargaining processes.

Original Arabic: Mr. GAREEB (Workers' delegate, Iraq) — In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! It gives me pleasure to convey to you the greetings of the Iraqi workers and I would like to congratulate the President on her well-deserved election and wish the Officers every success in their work.

I was asked by the workers of Iraq to notify you of the extent of the suffering caused by the unjust economic blockade they are subjected to. They attach importance to the work of this august assembly for the positive influence it can exercise by defending what is right and thereby achieving justice for the oppressed.

The Iraqi people live under the threat of extermination in view of the rarity of food, medicine and other basic essentials. Work opportunities have decreased and in addition to this unemployment has increased and prices skyrocketed, while social and health conditions have greatly deteriorated.

In spite of the insufficient impact of the memorandum of understanding regarding oil for food and medicine as well as other humanitarian needs, the United States Administration is still hampering its implementation. The duration of the agreement covers six months but this period is now over and 25 per cent only of the contracts were honoured due to the insistence of the United States Administration to hinder the implementation of the memorandum in order to punish the resisting Iraqi people.

Malaria has spread widely, particularly in the north of the country, yet the United States delegate at the ad hoc committee objected to Iraq obtaining the necessary insecticides to counteract the mosquitoes which transmit the disease. He also prevented Iraq having access to vital electrical equipment which deprived 1-1.5 million people of electricity, thus affecting activities in all spheres, and hospitals, schools and universities in particular.

UNICEF has announced that over 25 per cent of Iraqi children under five years of age are suffering from chronic malnutrition. Diseases are spreading and many diseases which were not previously known in Iraq have now begun to appear. Other scourges, some of which were also previously unknown, are also spreading in agriculture and among animals. The experts blame the Americans for having polluted the environment, the agricultural resources and the animals of Iraq, as they employed all sorts of practices which could be harmful for the Iraqi people.

It has become crystal clear that the sole objective of the continuation of the blockade and the starvation and deprivation of the population is to impose political stances and opinions which are entirely out of keeping with international law. The proof of this is that the American Government rejects the extension of Iraqi sovereignty to the northern part of Iraq, and violates its air space, while it does not say a word to the invasion of the Turkish forces into northern Iraq.

The Constitution and objectives of the ILO makes it responsible for supporting the Iraqi workers, and thus we call upon the Director-General to give his attention, support and assistance to the workers of Iraq as the other international organizations do.

The agenda of this Conference is full of important subjects, in particular the activities of the Organization and the changes at the international level with the ensuing new notions and ideas. This has been confirmed by the Director-General in his Report on The ILO, standard setting and globalization.

The Report of the Director-General clearly presents the ILO's view of globalization, as well as its negative repercussions and the corresponding approach that should be taken. The International Labour Organization should strengthen its efforts to defend the rights of the Palestinian workers and of those of the occupied Arab territories. It should tackle the practices of persecution, blockade, racial discrimination, the establishment of settlements (e.g. at Iabal Ghanim) and the destruction of houses, perpetrated by the occupying authorities.

It is both timely and right for the Organization to expand its activities in the Arab region and for the Arabic language to be used in a way which corresponds to the Arab presence within the Organization. The workers of Iraq declare their support for the Libyan workers and for an end to the blockade placed upon them; they also support the workers of the Sudan and efforts to safeguard the unity of the country; lastly, they declare their support for all those striving for freedom throughout the world.

Mr. MUÇO (Workers' delegate, Albania) — It is an honour and it is indispensable for me to take the floor on behalf of the Albanian workers in this important session of the International Labour Conference, the main organ of collaboration between the social partners to protect justice, develop democracy and institutionalize labour relations.

Over these past five years, as a result of deep political, social and economic changes, Albania has entered the framework of international activities. We have experienced directly the assistance and impact of the ILO on all our activities to protect the workers' interest, in the context of a very difficult transition period.

Our participation in the annual sessions of the Conference here in Geneva, the technical assistance we have received through their specialists and representatives in conjunction with the Ministry of Labour, the involvement in different projects with great interest, the organization of training seminars here or abroad, as well as other activities organized especially by the Central and Eastern European team in Budapest, have been of concrete assistance which we appreciate very much.

We take the advantage of this occasion to thank you, to thank the ILO, its leaders, as well as the leaders and specialists of the ILO CEET, Budapest, for all these activities and everything they have done for our country.

The political pluralism and the reforms that are opening the way to the market economy have been accompanied by a profound social transformation in Albania, where the participation of the workers' organizations in the life of the nation has been of great importance. Several trade unions are active in Albania now and in spite of problems between themselves some of them are in general playing an important role in the progress of democracy and the defence of workers' interests. Their influence is apparent in several directions. For example, several democratic laws have been approved which create the conditions for human and trade union rights. A new Labour Code has also been passed which, in spite of some limitations, is an important factor in all the labour relations processes in our country.

Some time ago, the National Labour Council began functioning, with the participation of all three social partners, and this most important organism is expected to bring evident transformations not only to restore social peace, but also to improve relations among the social partners and the trade unions themselves.

At the same time a number of projects are under way, for example the project for restructuring wage policy, professional and trade union training, labour inspection, etc. As a result of the repeated requests from our Confederation and some other unions, and of the engagement of the Professional Relations Directory of the Labour Ministry, it was made possible for three international labour Conventions to be ratified during 1996, which means that Albania has now ratified 20 Conventions, while preparatory work has also been carried out to facilitate the ratification of others this year.

However, as all of you are aware, our country is facing a very difficult political, economic and social situation. The failure of some pyramid investment schemes led to a massive increase in social unrest and political fighting. As a consequence unemployment increased and it is now increasing through 30-35 per cent range, while inflation is going up every day, and these twin factors are continuously decreasing the living standards of the majority of the population.

Under conditions where the Albanian lek has been devalued by almost 50 per cent in comparison with foreign currencies, Albanian wages and other remuneration have remained unchanged, in spite of the fact that they do not fulfil even the minimum needs of life. All of this has apparently favoured the growth of so-called "black work" (or informal employment), which has involved a great number of workers, who are not covered by social and health insurance, not only for the moment, but also into the distant future.

Under these conditions, all of us are expecting numerous killings and wounding, and there has been destruction and demolition of the fabric of the country by people seemingly devoid of any logic, and everything else that has been happening, which is against the elementary norms of democracy. We sincerely hope that this is to be ended by the free and fair elections to be held soon, on 29 June, which is expected to restore the normality so much desired by all Albanians.

It is a positive sign that all the three social partners in our country are committed to contribute as much as they can do in this direction. It is a real fact that — in these efforts to defend the workers' interests without renouncing the social and economic demands of the workers — our Confederation, during the past five years, has considered itself also a partner of the Government and other state organs, expressing openly its wish to work towards the collaboration and agreements in favour of social peace and quietness. However, in these efforts we have faced and are still facing a lot of problems. The system of collective agreements is not yet functioning. This is determined by the fact that the respective articles of the Labour Code are not sufficient. The arbitrary actions of state organs and representatives are obstructing the implementation of other articles, which would have facilitated action on collective agreements, the most effective weapon of the trade unions in their efforts to defend the workers' interests. This has caused the number of collective agreements in force in our country during 1996-97 to have been very low, and to remain so now. Eleven agreements have been signed in the first level, between the trade union organs at the national or branch level and the respective ministries or other organs; the number of the workers involved in these agreements is very low, 30-35 per cent of all employed workers.

The representation on the National Labour Council was also decided in an arbitrary way, by the Government defining the number of the representatives of each union not in conformity with the real membership or other index figures, but according to the subjective judgement of some officials who are representatives of the Government.

It is a positive factor that for these problems and some other obstacles which we are faced with, there is a concrete engagement by the Labour Ministry to make some changes in the Labour Code which, if accompanied by other actions at all levels as well, would bring major improvements regarding the system of collective agreements and other issues of labour relations as well as the activities of the social partners in general.

Our Confederation is aware that the problems which we are facing in the labour relations field, and in all the social and economic activities in our country, will be solved by us ourselves collaborating better with each other, taking responsibility and acting in a democratic way. However, at the same time, according to our point of view, our country is in need of continued ILO assistance, especially regarding the implementation of projects which are under way, and seeing the possibilities to enlarge such technical assistance projects in the future in order to encourage the ratification of further ILO Conventions, reflecting them in Albanian laws as well as in several other directions.

Our participation in the annual sessions of the International Labour Conference, and especially the orientations of this year's session have been of great assistance for us in order that, together with the other social partners, we can contribute to the development and the social and economic progress of our country.

Mr. ONGABA (Workers' delegate, Uganda) — It is with great pleasure and honour that I address this august house, and would like to convey the heartfelt greetings of the Ugandan workers to all the delegates present at this session of the Conference.

The pace at which our countries are moving ahead with the process of restructuring and privatizing has put the workers in jeopardy in most developing countries. The same has, however, also sensitized the social partners to grasp the ideas that are the major topics today at this session of the Conference.

There is no doubt that the SAPs, especially in Uganda, have increased contract labour. The same has brought about a realization that more jobs have to be created if our survival is to be guaranteed in the new era of globalization. It is for these reasons that we have to thank the ILO for coming out with preparations for the protection of workers, at whose expense most developing countries, especially those in Africa, have missed out on economic growth.

It is sad to note that while it is well known that productivity is directly proportional to the peace of mind of the workers, most African countries still do not implement the Conventions and Recommendations duly and voluntarily ratified by them. They wait for their social partners to forward formal complaints to the International Labour Conference before they are tickled out of their siesta.

Peace, stability and political democracy are a prerequisite to development. The turbulence in Africa today, is retarding the progress of the continent and must be checked. We wish to extend our full support to all workers of Africa and the whole world who are fighting for peace, stability, human rights and democracy, especially those in the Great Lakes region and currently in Sierra Leone in West Africa.

We wish to finally call upon our social partners in the developing countries, especially in Africa, to follow the examples of our friends and colleagues in Europe, Asia and the Americas and begin to give labour the importance that it deserves. It is only this realization that will enhance our move towards genuine economic development.

Original Spanish: Mr. RAMIRES (Workers' delegate, Bolivia) — I would like to congratulate the Director-General on his Report, which passes judgement on today's most urgent problems with equanimity. We certainly agree with the comment that "the recognition of workers' fundamental rights [is] a condition for social progress".

The principal concern of we, the Bolivian workers, is the fact that every year there is a litany of complaints from the workers about violations of social rights. In most cases, these rights have been violated in order to impose economic measures that do not help those countries, and are even less favourable to the workers. The arguments of the victims are simply not listened to, and this evil seems to be completely inseparable from the encroaching hand of globalization.

What concerns us has indeed gained legitimacy, in spite of the statements of employers and governments. The policies are enforced coldly, while macroeconomic figures are repeated like an incantation, and the policies lead to a kind of dismantling of society, a process which denies the core principles behind the existence of the ILO. The ILO emerged in 1919 from a deep economic and social crisis around the world, proclaiming the precedence of social interests over individual ones, stating that peace should be based on social justice, overcoming economic categories generated by free market competition.

Technological changes that have occurred in the countries at the centre of the present economic system, and the structural adjustment policies that are imposed on the peripheral countries under the dictates of economic globalization, have finished by signing the death warrant of the State as an institution concerned with social problems. To transform such States, governments have invented arguments that are very often contradictory, that are designed to run down the reviled welfare state, as if welfare were some kind of crime, or as if it were solely related to centrally planned economies.

They forget that the political duty to offer protection applies not only to objects, to machines, or to the landscape; it also applies to labour relations which are, of course, intimately linked to human beings. Rights are not simply limited to the sale of labour power, which has itself become part of the commercial laws of supply and demand, as if the very notion of work could be somehow separated from human beings. In other words, when there is talk of deregulation and flexible labour markets, you have to see first how this directly affects the deepest rights of the human being, by which I mean the right to life, the right to work, the right to education. The increase in precarious employment is sapping the foundations of inherent human rights, that we should all be respecting.

The same can be said of those employer requirements — and the encouragement they receive from governments — that lead to incomprehensible restrictions of social standards; what is being sought is the end of the tripartite spirit that characterizes the ILO. It would otherwise be impossible to explain, for example in the case of Bolivia, why the armed forces intervene in industrial disputes. This happened in the case of strikes in the gold-mines of Amaya Pampa and Capacirca. In that conflict the Ministry of Labour did not participate, that ministry being the one directly responsible for such problems as the strikes I have referred to. However, the Ministry of Defence of the Government did participate, as if it were a matter of intervening in some kind of war. This shows that the tripartite spirit has been seriously undermined. Thus, in four years of government, Mr. Sánchez de Lozada has caused the death of 36 workers. Among these, we can cite the incidents that occurred when pensioners mobilized to defend the social security system, when rural workers mobilized to defend their lands, when the mining workers of Amaya Pampa went on strike to defend their jobs, and so on.

For all of these reasons, the Bolivian trade union organization calls upon the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference to stand firm in defending the Conventions and Recommendations that it has produced, and which have emanated from the principles that led to the very birth of the Organization. That is the only way we might hope that individual and collective rights will still be respected. Stable employment, governed by the Termination of Employment Convention, 1982 (No. 158), is absolutely essential. Otherwise there can be no true freedom of association, nor collective bargaining, because those who have been dismissed are not in any position to negotiate any kind of labour agreement because the enterprise has made them unemployed.

Without employment policies that will make it possible for every family to survive, without continuity of employment that gives the worker stability, without recognizing freedom of association, and without collective bargaining, the ILO, as a labour-dispute mediation body, will simply be deprived of its institutional raison d'être.

These are the urgent and pressing problems of the working class in Bolivia, and we express our vehement desire that the ILO, while working on technical and vocational promotion policies, should also exalt the very foundations of social peace rooted in social justice. By this, I mean that the changes taking place today punish the workers very hard, and we believe that the meaning of work is a humano-social process that transcends the private sphere of viewing the labour force as something that can be simply bought and sold. This is quite wrong because, through working, the employee reproduces the very life of the whole of mankind.

Mr. SIBANDA (Workers' delegate, Zimbabwe) — The globalization of world trade offers not only a number of possible opportunities for economic development, but also the greatest challenge to the developing countries, especially those in Africa. The reduction in barriers to trade, investment, information and technology has created an integrated world economy dominated by the rich multinational corporations. It is becoming clear that unrestrained free trade is magnifying the world's problems, especially in Africa. After the Singapore ministerial meeting it became abundantly clear that the ILO labour standards and its supervisory machinery have become the ground rules for liberalized world trade, so as to ensure a fair distribution of its benefits. Without this social dimension, the system will break down. Therefore the ILO's task is to ensure that globalization and liberalization of world trade promotes social justice, and that this is done through strict adherence to the core labour standards. The aim of the core labour standards is to confront the serious danger that some countries may, in an increasingly competitive and global market, seek to gain short-term advantage by abusing fundamental worker's rights. One of the primary aims of the social clause is to make it impossible for some irresponsible multinational corporations to play one potential host country against another in search of maximizing their profits. Universal adherence to the seven basic core standards would therefore prevent the most extreme forms of exploitation and cutthroat competition. The result would be to encourage a more sustainable process of foreign direct investment, which would bring increased benefits to the host country.

The success of the structural adjustment programmes which are being implemented in most African countries will depend on the ability to reduce and eliminate poverty, guarantee employment, equitably distribute growth, provide health and education for all, protect the environment, democratize decision-making, and expand human freedom.

For the ILO to stay abreast, protect the workers and remain relevant and topical in this world of growing changes in the organization of work, new technology, and globalization of economies, the ILO has to have an ongoing mechanism for examination of how the economic benefits of globalization are being translated into socially just development in all member States.

Globalization cannot be left to its own devices. Its benefits must be felt by the workers and it must not be associated in the minds of the general public with an increase in inequalities. Rather, economic progress resulting from the liberalization of trade should be accompanied by social progress, and the ILO should guarantee a greater universality in the application of its fundamental human rights labour standards. These fundamental rights are of significance in the context of globalization because they are instruments enabling workers to claim their fair share of the economic progress generated by the liberalization of trade.

The Heads of State attending the World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen agreed on the need to promote these fundamental rights Conventions, and the Singapore ministerial meeting concurred that the ILO was the competent body to deal with and strengthen the human rights Conventions. It is therefore only logical that the ILO has to move the debate a step further, and put in place a mechanism that will not only commit all member States to the core labour standard Conventions, but also monitor all member States in their implementation.

Original French: The PRESIDENT (Ms. SASSO MAZZUFFERI) — Our agenda for this morning begins with the continuation of the discussion of the Reports of the Chairperson of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Original Spanish: Mr. CASTILLO MIRANDA (Workers' delegate, Panama) — It is essential to situate the time at which this Conference is being held, because in this way we can properly assess the responsibilities we face during our deliberations. The labour world as a whole is immersed in a period of assiduous application, of the neo-liberal model which has entailed an increase in poverty and has led to a reduction in state contributions for the development of social programmes. This situation, from a labour point of view, has contributed to a variety of forms of precarious employment and an increase in contract labour and has generally further emphasized conditions of inequality and social exclusion, rendering the economic and social rights of all citizens ineffective. This is a broad outline of the gloomy outlook overshadowing the workers' representatives assembled here at this important international Conference. The dramatic living conditions in which millions of workers throughout the world, and those I represent in particular, live compel me to stress two pressing facts. It is both essential and prudent that in our countries we consolidate and institutionalize the mechanism of social consultation as an appropriate way of introducing important social changes, placing particular emphasis on those of an industrial nature. In the particular case of Panama, I denounce as a violation of the principle of social consultation the recent approval of Legislative Decree No. 3 of 7 January 1997, which regulates the export processing zones which it has made into authentic labour havens. Legislative Decree No. 3 reformulated the outline that had been approved in 1996, with the aggravating factor that all the legal instruments relating to these processing zones have been the result of extraordinary legislative powers granted to the Executive with apparent justification, at which level the public and democratic viewpoint of Parliaments is disregarded. The special labour regime established by these legislative decrees eliminates, inter alia, the concept of collective bargaining to establish general conditions of employment; it cancels out freedom of association as the only effective instrument to defend workers' interests; it impinges greatly upon the exercise of the right to strike, subjecting it to extensive and stringent procedures, and even establishes monetary penalties of up to 500 balboas or dollars payable by the trade union leaders. This set of standards, without having to list them all, are an example of how the Government of Panama flagrantly violates the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87). We request with all due respect that this denunciation of a violation which we have pointed out in all responsibility, be recorded.

We must highlight nevertheless that as regards the right to organize significant progress has been made which has been reflected in the recent affiliation of the National Federation of Civil Servants' Associations, the only organization of its kind, to the Central Workers' Organization "Trade Union Convergence" which has also recently been set up. This new affiliation did not encounter any opposition from the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare. To this clear-cut recognition we add our request that the Government of Panama recognize the unrestricted right of all civil servants to freedom of association. As greater proof of this intent we request the Government of Dr. Ernesto Pérez Balladares, represented at this Conference by its Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, to ratify as quickly as possible the Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 and to implement an administrative career system.

As far as the International Labour Organization is concerned the workers' group that I represent authorizes me to suggest that the proposed amendments to be made to the standards which are governed by the Constitution and structure of the ILO take due account of the profound changes which are occurring in the field of employer-worker relations, so as to guarantee the effectiveness of the fundamental rights of workers. Workers have been profoundly affected in all countries as unequivocal and undeniable signs of the subtle repression to which the trade union movement has been subjected as a result of deregulation and neo-liberal flexibility. We must likewise flag the need for all labour rights and guarantees to be incorporated into the regional and global conventions and treaties for integration and free trade which are introduced under the aegis of the World Trade Organization.

We wish to see the social clause become an instrument aimed at the observance of universally recognized trade union rights, connecting the main principles of the ILO to the process of trade integration.

As a representative of the Panamanian workers I categorically state that we will never tolerate that the proposals to restructure the ILO imply any negative consequences for the fundamental rights of workers.

The new century which is drawing near requires an ILO flying the flags of solidarity, social justice and the defence of workers' rights. We trust that there will be no hesitation nor undue compromise along this course from which the ILO must not waver.

Mr. ENGELBERTS (representative of Public Services International) — On Thursday last week we heard Mr. Wolfensohn say that "Unless you have sound social policies, you cannot have sound economic policies. That is crystal clear. Unless you have a solid base with the people, unless you are concerned with the rights of the individual, unless you are concerned with the elements of social responsibility and social justice you cannot have peace and you cannot have safe investing". Didn't we hear this before, two years ago, at the World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen?

Weren't we happy that 116 Heads of State and Government singled out the ILO as having a special role to play in implementing the Copenhagen Summit's conclusions in the field of employment and social development?

Weren't we encouraged to read in the Summit's programme of action, in particular in Chapter IV on Implementation and Follow-up, that "nothing short of a renewed and massive political will at the national and international level to invest in people and in their well-being will achieve the objectives of social development"?

What happened with that political will? Was it again the usual empty promises of politicians?

I am speaking here on behalf of 20 million public service workers. In our day-to-day work we contribute to the well-being of people in all corners of the world. We are nurses and fire-fighters, electricity workers and child minders, civil servants and food inspectors, judges and social workers, hundreds of professional groups who earn our living by providing and delivering public services. We have a lot in common: we have first-hand knowledge of how public services can be improved and we are the ones to take the blame when services are deteriorating, cut or badly managed. We know a lot about the needs of the citizens.

And our vision of a future society is based on our experience as public sector workers. We realize that public services in many countries must be redesigned to better respond to the needs of the people and that this will take time. It will take time because, for many years, strong political forces have tried to destroy even the basic structure of public services for the people.

We thought that the Copenhagen Summit could have turned that trend around. But I must say what has happened since then has disappointed us because not many of the commitments have been followed up. And I feel disgusted by the degree of hypocrisy that has been shown by so many governments.

Oh sure, the final declaration of the World Trade Organization Ministerial Conference in Singapore renews the commitment of member States to observe internationally recognized fundamental labour standards and recalls the ILO's major role in defining and implementing such standards.

But any initiative from the Director-General of the ILO will be stifled, as we saw last Friday when 113 governments who had committed themselves at the WTO meeting to using the ILO to enforce labour standards have now rejected the attempts of the Director-General to do exactly that.

The most hypocritical behaviour of course was that of the Government of the Republic of Korea, by promising both the ILO and the OECD that it would bring its labour legislation in line with ILO Conventions. It did not and we know the results. The workers in the Republic of Korea got mad.

Mr. Wolfensohn said it last Thursday: "when they see that people in government or in the private sector are benefiting at their expense, they get mad".

Everybody knows about the corruption in the Republic of Korea in both government and the multinationals.

It seems that some governments are more interested in protecting the property rights of kleptocratic élites and corrupt transnational corporations than in protecting their own workers. Because in many countries in that region the right of association or collective bargaining does not exist, especially in the public sector, the workers are being treated as medieval serfs.

We welcome the commitments made by Mr. Wolfensohn, but after the Copenhagen meeting I must say that we want to see the evidence in practice that the changes he heralded are really going to happen.

This year's World Development Report of the World Bank is dedicated to the role of the State. And we have made some critical contributions to that report to underscore the notion of a more effective, agile State, where governments do not run away from their responsibilities towards society and where public service workers have the same rights as other workers. The same principle of course applies to the intergovernmental institutions, and my colleague from the Federation of International Civil Servants' Associations will go into further detail.

We are in favour of strengthening the ILO supervisory system to ensure universal application of workers' fundamental rights. All those governments that made all those fine commitments in Copenhagen and in Singapore should now in practice enable the ILO to supervise effectively all governments in their application of the relevant Conventions. But again, the promises seem to be empty.

If persuasion and moral values prove ineffective, governments leave us no choice but to organize the workers, to get really mad and to start using their power as consumers and voters, boycotting those countries and transnational companies that violate human and trade union rights and voting out of office those who support them, as have the voters in the United Kingdom and France.

Mr. KHAN (Government delegate, India) — I join the distinguished delegates in congratulating the President on her election as President of this session.

I would like to thank the Director-General for his Report. We share the concern to achieve social progress alongside economic development in the context of the ongoing globalization and liberalization of trade.

The ILO standards are indeed the instruments to achieve worldwide social progress. However, it is also true that these standards alone cannot produce the desired result and achieve the ultimate goal of full and productive employment for all. Empirical evidence on the results of globalization and the liberalization of trade does not show that workers' rights, welfare and social security have improved in the recent past. However, there is clear evidence to show that the employment situation worldwide has deteriorated, as was highlighted in the ILO's World Employment Report 1996-97. We would therefore emphasize that the focus should be on creation of employment and improving the quality of employment. Moreover, in the wake of rapid progress in scientific and technological development, new terms and conditions of employment are being set between the employer and the employee. These changes are inescapable and our labour standards should be flexible enough to adjust to the needs of changing times. We therefore believe that creation of jobs should receive a very high priority.

We are also aware of the fact that the subject of social labelling on exported products, as a consumer movement, is taking place in some parts of the world. This is neither a spontaneous nor a logical movement, but it is a motivated and orchestrated one, which is aimed at denying the comparative advantages achieved by the developing countries through negotiated trade agreements. Social labelling has the potential for misuse as a protectionist device. Further, we do not see any role for the ILO in intervening in this consumer movement and enforcing international inspection.

Social labelling has recently been used as a means to reduce the incidence of child labour. However, child labour needs to be addressed as a social and economic problem and programmes to eliminate child labour should be part of the "education for all" idea, and strategies to eradicate poverty and unemployment. Legislation, regulation and measures such as social labelling cannot achieve the abolition of child labour. We are aware of the magnitude of the problem in India and are fully committed to eradicating this social evil. We have decided to adopt a progressive, gradual and sequential approach for the elimination of child labour through a prioritized and concentrated process. We have launched a major programme to withdraw children from hazardous employment and put them in school, and to eliminate child labour from hazardous employment by 2002. The judicial machinery in the country is also fully aware of the problem. The efforts of the Government in the elimination of child labour are being strengthened by the recent judicial pronouncement of the Supreme Court. We are confident of achieving quantifiable results in the near future.

In most developing countries organized labour accounts for only a small fraction of the total workforce. The majority of the workforce is in the unorganized and in the informal sector; for them, labour standards are of distant relevance. The primary problems of the labour force in these sectors, which comprises an overwhelming percentage of humanity, are problems of unemployment, underemployment and intermittent employment, inadequate income and the absence of access to the basic amenities of life. Therefore, without minimizing the aims of standard-setting activities, I believe equal or more emphasis needs to be given to operational activities with a view to maximizing employment opportunities.

There is a legitimate feeling amongst many developing countries that the proliferation of these Conventions is burdening the national governments with so many obligations and so much reporting, for which adequate machinery does not exist in many of these countries. We do not want to say that the ILO should stop enacting labour standards. Our submission is that when we consider new subjects in the International Labour Conference with a view to adopting Conventions and Recommendations we should consider and examine the existing realities. These realities are: (i) widespread unemployment all over the world, in particular in developing countries; (ii) the majority of the workforce in the developing countries being in the unorganized sector; (iii) the lack of development in developing countries to promote a social security system comparable to those found in developed countries; (iv) the current emphasis on privatization and competition in a globalized market; (v) the cutthroat competition forcing employers to reduce the cost of the workforce; and (vii) the workers' concern for their jobs and social security.

Therefore, the agenda for the future sessions of the International Labour Conference should address these problems and find solutions without unnecessarily burdening the state enforcement machinery. Therefore, subjects for the adoption of ILO Conventions in the future should be specific to governing the labour market under these conditions.

Mr. MACHUNGWA (Minister of Labour and Social Security, Zambia) — Like previous speakers, I wish to place on record my country's warm congratulations to you, Madam President, and to the other Officers elected to steer the deliberations of the Conference. No doubt your stewardship will manifest itself in a successful Conference.

I take note of the various topics being discussed at this session of the Conference, mainly concerning job stimulation in small and medium-sized enterprises, contract labour and operations of the changing employment agencies. These are important issues and should no doubt generate positive debate through active deliberations, and will culminate in conclusions that member States can look to for guidance.

I have also taken note of the theme of the plenary debate for this Conference, namely The ILO, standard setting and globalization. Standard setting in the field of labour is a matter which has been at the centre of ILO programmes and activities. The ILO has excelled in this activity. It is heartening to note that the Singapore Ministerial Meeting of the WTO stressed that the ILO is the competent body to set up and deal with labour standards, and that this activity should continue to repose in the ILO. The ILO should therefore never relent in its responsibility in this area. On the contrary, the current demand for social justice places on the ILO a much greater challenge in the light of globalization, where comparison transcends national borders. It is to the ILO that all the social partners look in establishing employment norms and standards.

The ILO has established procedures that assist in the implementation of standards. It has put in place supervisory mechanisms that go towards promoting and ensuring the effective application of standards. Whilst the formulation of standards in itself is important, I consider that the application of such standards is much more vital because the impact of the standards flows from their application. The ILO should therefore expend more energy on ensuring the application of standards, particularly those standards that bear on human rights.

Zambia recognizes the importance of the core international labour standards. It also recognizes the need for more ratifications of these standards. I therefore suggest that the ILO should strengthen its resolve to promote these Conventions and persuade member States to ratify them. I wish to take this opportunity to inform this august gathering that Zambia has ratified all the fundamental standards, namely Conventions Nos. 29, 87, 98, 100, 105, 111 and 138. This demonstrates our commitment to the standards and the importance we attach to their application.

The Director-General in his Report has made reference to the possibility of subjecting the foregoing standards to the same supervisory machinery that is applicable to freedom of association. It is acknowledged that freedom of association and its standards are relevant to all member States by virtue of the ILO Constitution and the objectives and principles of the ILO. It is also acknowledged that the other fundamental standards are equally important. Zambia, however, does not subscribe to the idea of expanding to other standards the same supervisory mechanisms as demanded of freedom of association. It is our considered view that ratification of ILO Conventions should continue to be voluntary. Perhaps what the ILO should be doing more is to intensify its efforts to get member States to continuously review their positions on the core ILO standards, with a view to getting the States to ratify those standards. I therefore endorse the suggestion for more use of the facility in article 19(5)(e) of the Constitution of the ILO, particularly in respect of the fundamental ILO standards.

I have taken note of the preoccupation of the ILO with social progress. This is as it should be. The ILO was created out of the need to promote social justice in the workplace and it has been pursuing this goal since its inception. Today it is being proposed that the ILO should be giving "social labels" as part of its standard setting! It would be a drastic departure if the ILO were to adopt an arrangement of things whereby the ILO would undertake policing activities by way of inspections in an effort to award "social labels" to countries as an identification of compliance with some set of fundamental principles. This, in our view, constitutes a categorization for purposes of discrimination and interference in the flow of free trade. Our position should not be understood to mean that the standard is of no importance, nor that we do not want to honour the fundamental rights of workers. However, we believe that the current compliance mechanisms of the ILO are adequate for this purpose. The ILO should not be drawn into problems of international trade competition.

Finally, many developing countries, particularly those in Africa, are severely constrained by international debt. In quite a number of these countries, the debt level has been classified as unsustainable. As a result of this crushing debt, attempt to attain social justice are very difficult, if not impossible. The ILO must continuously and loudly advocate a solution to the debt question through its deliberations with multilateral institutions and leading creditor nations. In this regard, I would like to commend the Director-General for bringing to this session of the ILO the President of the World Bank , who addressed this session. This is an important part of pursuing social justice, a cause which the ILO has always stood for and should continue to fight for in all its activities.

Original Polish: Mr. WIADERNY (Workers' delegate, Poland) — Speaking for the first time on behalf of Polish employees, I wish to extend my sincere greetings to you, Madam President, and to the Director-General and his colleagues, and express my profound admiration for the work of the International Labour Organization.

Poland, which today aspires to become part of the European Community, is desirous of making a significant contribution to the fulfilment of ideas, programmes and conventions which encourage cooperation between employees, employers and governments. For Poland, European integration is a major opportunity to adapt our labour legislation to the standards existing in those countries which possess the highest level of economic development and most advanced systems of employee or worker protection.

I am proud to announce that a few days ago, Poland ratified a fundamental portion of the European Social Charter, which directly draws upon the ILO's legislative achievement and is a derivative, as it were, of ILO Convention No. 102. We consider this a great success by our country and by Polish employees.

Despite the divisions inside the Polish trade union movement which, at any rate, we in our trade union movement regret, the principles of neutrality, dialogue and social partnership are gaining more and more adherents and are already becoming accepted norms in society's consciousness. This is a difficult path to establish, and yet it is nothing more than a path that leads to the future. It will be to the benefit of those in this world who have nothing to sell but their knowledge and their work, and those who, thanks to their accumulated assets, are able to finance this development. Therefore, this dialogue between the world of labour on the one hand, and politicians, entrepreneurs and financiers on the other, according to the principles of partnership, seems to be a future which must provide all sides with the anticipated results.

Polish employees wish to raise more universal issues in the ILO forum than has been the case so far. For instance, the question of unemployment which was discussed in today's session. For us, this problem arose after 1989 and immediately dominated all other problems of the Polish labour market. We found ourselves faced with the globalization of the labour market, something which our country, a bridgehead between eastern and western Europe, fears particularly keenly with our course set for the twenty-first century, we must try to master this global problem which causes the greatest distress to potential workers, but also poses a major problem for governments and employers.

As far as we are concerned, we offer our sincere thanks for the aid received from the ILO and would request further aid. The assistance from the ILO head office and the work of the centres in Turin and Budapest is of enormous value to us. We ourselves are doing a lot and have already achieved the first initial results. Just as it is stated in the Declaration of Philadelphia, we reject the view whereby work is a commodity. Instead, we believe, in accordance with the humanitarian principles of human dignity, that work is a natural component of life.

We will support those ILO activities that serve to rationalize the process of job placement. This is of major importance which we realize as a result of our own Polish experience. We support the expansion of private job placement services in as far as these are not solely of a commercial nature. Polish trade unions are engaged in this very activity, striving to offer smooth support for the work of the State. We agree that creating the prerequisites for new jobs, especially in Central and Eastern Europe, depends no longer upon the heavy industries alone but also upon the creation of small and medium-sized enterprises. Until now the introduction of modern technologies to large plants has resulted in lay-offs and increased unemployment. Today we are faced with an opportunity to expand that sector of the labour hierarchy consisting of small and medium-sized enterprises. Nevertheless, these enterprises must be granted, at least during the initial phase of their activity, certain priorities in the Polish legislation so that they may survive the competition with the firms which already exist.

Finally, the question of contract labour. In view of the globalization of the labour market, this is developing into a serious problem. This type of labour is keenly sought by various firms and employers who employ workers without affording them suitable legal and social security cover, thus creating anarchy in the labour market. It is our conviction that this is a new method of exploiting workers which should be ruthlessly opposed. We will carefully monitor and combat this phenomenon, rendering our support to the efforts of the ILO which has demonstrated through its work that it is a forum for the harmonization of interests which often only appear to be divergent at first sight.

We all live beneath a single heaven and indeed the future depends upon our harmonious joint activity.

Ms. VALKONEN (Workers' delegate, Finland) — Let me first of all congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents on their election.

I wish to take up three items from the Report of the Director-General: the strengthening of the supervisory system, the issue of social labelling, and the development of the standard-setting mechanism.

On the first one, I wish to state my support for the preparation of a declaration on the core principles. It is important now, after the Singapore Conference of Ministers of Trade, to reach agreement on the content of these principles. The point of reference should be the commitments of the Social Summit, held in Copenhagen in 1995.

Freedom of association, non-discrimination — which includes the principles of equality between women and men — and the abolition of forced labour and child labour are the core around which there seems to be universal agreement. It is important to recognize that they are an integrated set of principles. If one of them is not respected the others are seriously weakened.

However, negotiating a declaration for adoption a year from now is not enough. We have also to agree on what it would lead to. Modifications to the present system are needed so that it can cover the countries which have not yet ratified the Conventions on, or in fact against, discrimination and forced and child labour. I trust that the process can be undertaken in the Governing Body and everyone should approach it with an open mind.

It may well be in the end that no great changes in the system are needed. Improved procedures and adjustments to the present system could well be sufficient to assist all countries to meet their fundamental constitutional obligations.

I welcome the Director-General's invitation for a broad discussion on the issue of social labelling. We know from our home countries that the issue is being discussed more and more by consumers, enterprises, employers and trade unions. By reacting to the issue, the ILO shows that it is in touch with the real world.

It is clear that much confidence building has to be done and several kinds of dialogue are necessary. But there must be a starting-point. Some years ago there was no consensus in the ILO on moving ahead on child labour and, in particular, on new standard setting. The views of governments and employers have developed on that issue. There is no reason why views should not develop on the issue of labelling as well. This is a longer-term issue where all groups have a possibility to influence one another in a constructive positive way.

As to the different suggestions in Part II of the Report, I should like to say that the value of Recommendations which are independent of Conventions depends entirely on how they are followed up. They can have value if they are implemented in the different countries and if they lead to further action by the ILO. In some cases, a Recommendation could be a step towards a Convention later on, if there is not yet enough agreement or clarity on the issue. But it is to be remembered that, for instance, it has not been possible to follow up the Recommendation on tripartite cooperation with a more binding standard even though tripartism is what this Organization is about.

Consequently, I wish to warn against Recommendations which become a kind of dead-end road. But if there is a genuine will to achieve progress, and there is an understanding that each instrument will be looked at on its own merits, and will be followed-up, we will be able to look at our standard-setting mechanism in a different light than up until now.

The door to further development of the thoughts in the second part of the Report should not be closed. Still, the solution of whatever problems the standard-setting mechanism may have, is certainly not to stop making Conventions and start drafting Recommendations instead.

Original French: Mr. PARROT (Workers' delegate, Canada) — I would like to start by saying that I agree with the Director-General, when he reached the conclusion that, despite the promises and hopes that the liberalization of international trade offers, liberalization could risk grinding to a halt if the benefits of it for workers — male or female — are slow to show themselves and if it becomes associated in public opinion with growing inequalities or precariousness.

Globalization cannot be left to its own devices. As I said, I fully agree with the above statement, but I think that now it is up to the ILO to ensure that globalization and liberalization of trade promote social justice, in its deliberations and in its practices. The standards of the ILO ought to become the basic rules for world economy, in order to ensure fair distribution of benefits for workers in our economy.

Since the Copenhagen Summit and the Ministerial Meeting in Singapore last year, there have been great expectations on the part of workers and organizations throughout the world for the fundamental principles which are the base of the ILO to be regarded as top priority in all activities of the ILO.

For that, we support the idea of a declaration containing these fundamental principles, which would be adopted at one of the next sessions of the International Labour Conference.

However, we must not forget that the Declaration is not enough. We also have to think about reinforcing our monitoring system, and governments at the Summit in Copenhagen and the Meeting in Singapore very clearly indicated that the ILO must undertake that task of reinforcing the monitoring system and ensuring the application of fundamental principles of the Organization. We know that the International Labour Office and Organization would lose all credibility if we were not in a state to proceed with that. So we must not hesitate. That is also why governments spoke up using this language both in Copenhagen and Singapore and they should continue to use this language within the ILO in order to ensure a much more effective supervisory and monitoring system, so that it would be possible not only to say just some beautiful words, but equally to go beyond such words by ensuring that we will have a much more effective system for the application of all these fundamental principles.

And, of course, I would like also to emphasize that the other points stressed by the Director-General in Part I and also in the other parts of his Report are points which we, the Canadian workers, fully support and which we hope to see implemented in the very near future. Again, all these points could not of course bring all the hoped-for results if before that we didn't have a reinforced monitoring system as indeed is being discussed at present at the level of the Committee on Legal Issues and International Labour Standards of the Governing Body.

Finally, I should like also to say that although the Director-General kept his silence on the question of the social clause and decided to move back to the system of supervision and the means of implementing the standards which have been adopted, and particularly those that are fundamental, but at the moment in my country I have to say that the social clause is still an important element in getting there. We feel that this work must be continued. However, we must not forget that it is governments and employers who tell us that we have to be on a level playing-field, and I think that when they talk of a level playing-field, this must also apply to workers, male and female. We don't want to talk about competitiveness at the same level if we don't recognize the fundamental rights to which workers are entitled in all countries that are implied by international trade. We mustn't forget, once more, that it is up to us to ensure that those fundamental principles are being implemented, whether in the form of a social clause or by other means. The main element is that the competitiveness should apply also to workers on a level playing-field. As I often say, in my country we have no problem to compete with workers in other countries, so long as those workers in other countries have the same rights as we have — the right to organize, the right to negotiate, the right not to be victims of discrimination or put into forced labour or the right for child labour to be eliminated.

Putting all the above together, this is why, generally speaking, we support the Report of the Director-General, even if he doesn't talk about the social clause. We do hope very soon to see the Governments and Employers within the Governing Body and at future sessions of the Conference, coming to support strongly the development of a supervisory system of fundamental principles, as well as a declaration which would allow the recognition and explanation of these principles in an effective manner.

Original French: Mr. SUY (Secretary of State for Social Affairs, Labour and War Veterans, Cambodia) — Allow me first of all on behalf of the Royal Government of Cambodia and in my own name to extend my sincere and cordial congratulations to you, Madam President, on the occasion of your election to the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference.

I also wish to address to Mr. Michel Hansenne, Director-General of this distinguished international organization, my thanks for the highly appreciated Report on The ILO, standard setting and globalization, which is, of course, the basis for discussions at this major world Conference.

Certainly, standard-setting activities have always been the cornerstone of the ILO's activities and, as was indeed confirmed by the Governments participating in the Ministerial Conference of the World Trade Organization in Singapore in December 1996, it is the ILO which is the competent body for establishing labour standards and monitoring their observance.

We agree that it is necessary to strengthen the machinery for monitoring the observance of the core Conventions of the ILO on human rights, and we would ask the ILO to make a solemn declaration reaffirming universal respect of these fundamental rights of workers by all members, whether the corresponding Conventions have been ratified or not. Also the ILO, we feel, should revise existing standards in order to ensure that they are pertinent and effective in their application.

It is in this spirit that my country has just promulgated a revised Labour Code of 396 articles, which guarantee these fundamental rights, particularly freedom of association. Furthermore, in conformity with article 19 of the ILO's Constitution, we have submitted for examination to the Council of Ministers the following Conventions, Recommendations and Protocols: the Labour Administration Convention, 1978 (No. 150); the Safety and Health in Mines Convention, 1995 (No. 176) and Recommendation, 1978 (No. 183); the Protocol of 1995 (82nd ILC) to the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81); and the Home Work Convention, 1996 (No. 177) and Recommendation, 1996 (No. 184).

We are very satisfied that Convention No. 150 has been approved by the Council of Ministers and has already been submitted to the National Assembly for ratification.

Moreover, as we have all been able to observe, technological changes and qualitative and quantitative developments in the area of national manpower, particularly in developing countries, are quite remarkable now.

In order to meet the requirements of national and international markets, the effort expended on measures for greater social protection for these new and growing populations have allowed us to develop corresponding social measures on the same scale.

In Cambodia, in the light of this massive increase in national and international manpower and in order to guarantee rights and protection of the workers, our main priority concerns at the present moment are now the general demobilization of our army and the development of social policies in favour of single women, female heads of households and orphans.

Effective and substantial coordination and assistance provided by humanitarian associations has been remarkable, particularly in the field of vocational training and retraining.

The International Labour Office, through its Regional Office in Bangkok, has contributed its technical and professional expertise in organizing training seminars for our young executives in the field of labour inspection and labour administration. Recently a protocol of agreement between ILO-IPEC and the Ministry of Social Affairs, Labour and War Veterans of Cambodia has been signed, with a view to eliminating child labour for a period of five years, that is to say from 1997 to the year 2002. In addition, thanks to the technical assistance provided by France, we have been able to prepare the principal regulatory texts in order to be able to start the operations of our National Social Security Fund in the near future.

Our struggle against unemployment is beginning to bear fruit thanks to the publication of our investment code, which provides obvious advantages within the framework of the repatriation of capital and profits. In the area immediately around Phnom Penh, our capital, one can observe some 50 clothing factories producing garments for the world market.

Thousands of women have been able to find work, including female heads of household and single women. We now hope that we shall shortly be able to move out of this phase of economic underdevelopment, so that we may find ourselves on an equal footing with other countries in the region.

In conclusion, in the name of the Royal Government of Cambodia and on my own behalf I would like to thank you Madam President for the excellent organization of this Conference where the active cooperation and collaboration of all the participants has also played an important role.

Original Hungarian: Mr. FOCZE (Workers' delegate, Hungary) — Allow me first of all to congratulate you on your election to this important post, and also the Vice-Presidents. I am deeply convinced that, with your assistance, significant progress will be reached towards the development of labour relations.

In my homeland, the Republic of Hungary, the institutions of democracy are functioning, a market economy has been established through privatization, the tripartite reconciliation of interests has already been working for seven years. A relatively acceptable legal environment is provided to employees in the fields of employment, training, occupational safety, labour inspection and other areas.

Government bodies, however, are in many cases under pressure to recognize and control labour law regulations.

Hungary today is free, but poor. Employees are affected by unemployment, reduced social services and a high rate of inflation, but also, in several cases, by the violation of workers' rights. Trade union responses, however, are weak. An acceptable climate at the workplace is rare.

The agenda of the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference is an important one.

We are in favour of the implementation of labour rights which is an important element of human rights. We support the concluding of an agreement which improves the development of job creation in small and medium-sized enterprises. We consider, as an important issue, to draw up an agreement to improve the conditions of contract workers.

The Republic of Hungary wants to join the European Union. This intention is strongly supported by workers' representatives.

Daily, we feel and highly value the assistance given by the international trade union movement, the ILO and the ILO's Central and Eastern European Team, which is based in Budapest.

We demand that the Government of Hungary take several measures to promote jobs and to improve employees' social conditions.

We also require that the employers' associations take effective and well-organized measures against any employer who does not recognize the importance of proper industrial relations.

I am convinced that our common efforts will be fruitful.

Mr. OBEEGADOO (Minister of Labour and Industrial Relations, Mauritius) — On the threshold of the third millennium, we are indeed in a paradoxical situation. On the one hand, growing globalization characterized by more openness and greater capital mobility is offering unprecedented opportunities for economic expansion. On the other hand, stiff international competition and economic restructuring is exerting a downward pressure on wages and labour standards and entailing the downsizing of the workforce with the extension of poverty as a further consequence.

In that context, and on behalf of my delegation, allow me to congratulate the Director-General for his Report which has provided a most stimulating and thought-provoking basis for discussions at the present Conference on the ILO's role within the new international situation.

Who would disagree with the philosophical premise of the Report that globalization is not, and cannot be, an end in itself and should therefore not be left to its own devices. Indeed, if the less developed countries are not to be swept off their feet by the whirlwind of globalization, the formidable energy unleashed by the liberalization of the world economy and the globalization of markets must be harnessed to serve the needs of humanity as a whole. Fairness and equality of opportunity should be central values underpinning a new world order as reflected both in relations between nation States and within the individual States. Hence, the agreement of Mauritius to lend itself to a case-study of the social implications of globalization and trade liberalization to be conducted by the ILO.

My country, the Republic of Mauritius, has experienced continued economic growth over the last two decades. To face up to the future, Mauritius is presently engaged in a gradual process of labour market reform and in a far-reaching revision of its labour legislation which should allow for the ratification of the three outstanding ILO core Conventions in the course of next year. The ongoing process of reformulating an appropriate industrial relations framework in response to national needs in a global context is based on tripartite consultations with the social partners and also addresses the related issues of gender equality, workers' participation, and occupational safety and health.

The Government of Mauritius welcomed the conclusions of the 1995 Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen. We consider that the final Declaration of the 1996 WTO Conference of Singapore further clarified matters. Yet, the central question facing us remains how to reconcile the recognition, on the one hand, that the level of social protection within a country is a function of its economic development, with the acknowledgment, on the other hand, of the universal character of fundamental workers' rights. In other words — and this is a central point on which the consensus needs to emerge — how do we ensure that the ILO serves not as an instrument to compensate for or to even mitigate the comparative disadvantage of some countries but rather to ensure that globalization delivers on the promise of social progress.

We reaffirm, in line with the OAU position outlined by earlier speakers, our commitment to the universal adoption of the seven core Conventions and our belief in the need to strengthen the supervisory mechanism essential to attain that objective.

In March of this year, during the deliberations of the Governing Body, Mauritius suggested that a declaration embodying the fundamental principles of the core Conventions be adopted so as to give a new impetus to the drive for their ratification of implementation without contravening the principle of voluntary adherence by member States. We further suggested that regional monitoring and evaluation mechanisms be set up by member States themselves, to be coordinated by the multidisciplinary teams in collaboration with the area office. We believe that such a mechanism, by being closer to the sensitivities and specificities of a given region, would allow for a better appreciation of the obstacles to ratification while turning the multidisciplinary teams into a more supportive instrument of ILO's work in the field.

We believe that viewed in this light, the Director-General's proposal of a solemn declaration in 1998 reaffirming universal respect by ILO member States for fundamental workers' rights could be acceptable to all and should accordingly be further discussed to clear all ambiguities which have led to some reservations being expressed.

However, the idea of an overall social labour is a noble concept fraught with difficulties and risks not only for the less developed countries; this, indeed, might be premature.

Mauritius shares the view that the pace of change on the world scene and the fall in the rate of ratifications of ILO instruments lately, do call for a review of the standard-setting procedures of our Organization. We welcome the Director General's proposals in favour of a more discerning approach to standard setting so that practical relevance and enforceability are made essential criteria for selection. In a similar vein, we would support the proposed codification of instruments and most importantly, the introduction of a mode of evaluation — systematic and objective — of existing instruments.

When all is said and done, what matters most is the exercise of consensus building as to the way forward for the ILO. To that end, it is essential that all should comprehend the apprehensions of the less developed countries that their one major source of strength — their comparative advantage in specific areas of international trade — could be undermined by the universal application of labour standards if ratification is either removed from the ambit of the national decision-making process or the pace of ratification determined without consideration of national realities. In a new world economic environment made up of untold dangers, where the pitfalls are many and where the uncertainties of international competition bear heavily on the poorer nations, these affairs need to be addressed.

Yet, it is obvious to all that with the advent of globalization, never before has the ILO been more important and more relevant to the needs and aspirations of working people around the world.

May I express the wish that this Conference will serve its purpose in laying the basis for a consensual perspective enabling the ILO to pursue its historic mission in a fast-changing world — the potential of which must, of necessity, be mastered to serve the common good of mankind.

Ms. CHITAURO (Minister of the Public Service, Labour and Social Welfare, Zimbabwe) — Allow me to commence my remarks by congratulating you Madam Keltošová, upon your election as President of this session of the Conference. I am particularly gratified to note that your election is a manifestation of the ILO's commitment to its principle of non-discrimination on the basis of gender and am highly confident that you will guide the deliberations of this session to a successful conclusion as you have so far excelled exceedingly well in this regard.

I wish to register my strong appreciation for the efforts of the ILO in addressing the complex problems in the world of work since the last session of the Conference as outlined in the report of the Chairperson of the Governing Body. I am particularly happy to note that, pursuant to the mandate derived from the Copenhagen Social Summit, the ILO is making strides in carrying out country employment policy reviews from which we can all draw vital lessons from the various experiences of the countries covered. I particularly applaud the ILO's resolve to involve and liaise with other agencies in this sphere, such as the UNDP and UNESCO, in order to further enrich the outcome of this noble endeavour. Indeed, the ILO's activities in other areas such as child labour, migrant workers, enterprise development, standard setting and gender discrimination are highly commendable. I particularly welcome the lead of the ILO in the United Nations Administrative Committee on Coordination Task Force on Employment and Sustainable Livelihoods in facilitating the setting up of the Permanent Inter-Agency Committee on Women and Gender Equality. It is my hope and wish to see this Committee being accorded all the possible support by the international community to enable it to effectively accomplish its task.

The continuing liaison between the ILO and the Bretton Woods institutions is indeed most welcome, as both the Organization and the institutions seek to improve the welfare of humanity in our small world, especially in this era of globalization of the international economy and its repercussions in the world of work.

I was most impressed by the commitment of the World Bank, as intimated by its President, Mr. Wolfensohn, in his address to this Conference, to assisting in the socio-economic development of all nations. My only wish would be to see such commitment being translated into effective, concrete and practical policies aimed at alleviating the plight of the poor. In this connection, I strongly reiterate my remarks from last year that for both the ILO and the World Bank to achieve meaningful progress in this sphere, there is need to reappraise the Bretton Woods institutions' policies regarding debt, foreign direct investment and the impact of programmes such as structural adjustment programmes on socio-economic development, especially in developing countries.

In the same vein, I urge both the ILO and the Bretton Woods institutions and, indeed, all other relevant international players in this field, to lend serious thought and consideration to liaising likewise with regional actors involved in the socio-economic and labour spheres. I strongly urge the establishment of firm links with regional organizations such as the Southern African Development Community (SADC), the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) and the Economic Community of Eastern and Southern African States (COMESA), to mention but a few, with a view to assisting their member States to achieve regional economic integration and to serve as a conduit for economic development and the attainment of social justice. The ILO should focus on further strengthening the capacity of regional organizations such as the African Regional Labour Administration Centre (ARLAC), which are so instrumental in facilitating the implementation of international labour standards. I highly value and appreciate the ILO's assistance to the African region, particularly in enhancing its capacity to uphold the ILO's ideals and principles. It is in this context that I call upon the ILO to assist the African region in organizing its proposed seminar on child labour early next year. I remain hopeful that the ILO will find this appeal to be in the best interests of its constituents, especially when considering that the proposed seminar will be a vital prelude to our discussions on the Convention on child labour in 1998 and 1999.

The focus and thrust of the ILO Director-General's Report this year is indeed a point of great interest and concern. For a while now, the trend of globalization has exercised our faculties, and I share the Director-General's view that it is now time for us to appreciate the impact of globalization on the mainstay of the ILO's activities, namely standard setting and supervision. Since 1995, the ILO, through the Working Party on the Social Dimensions of the Liberalization of International Trade and the Committee on Legal Issues and International Labour Standards, has been debating this issue. From the debate various suggestions have emerged as to how we can proceed in pursuing the matter. I wish to note that there is indeed universal consensus among all social partners on the need to revamp international labour instruments to make them more effective. One acceptable way identified has been the abrogation of obsolete standards; and the other way, which I find quite appealing, is the revision of those instruments deemed essential in order to eliminate some archaic provisions contained in them. Both approaches are indeed most welcome to my delegation.

However, in the same deliberations I have cited, there was a clear rejection of linking labour standards to international trade for the obvious and simple reasons that such a linkage could very well be utilized to pursue protectionist tendencies. The suggestion by the Director-General to introduce a system of social labelling is, in my view, a tacit proposal to reintroduce the rejected social clause. I am not convinced that social labelling would be for information only, as the Director-General would want us to believe, but that some among us would want to use it to effect trade measures against others.

It is quite apparent that such a system of social labelling would be tantamount to imposing economic sanctions on those failing to secure it, while rewarding those who win it, with essential markets for their products; especially in this era of socially and economically conscious consumers. I agree with the Director-General on the need to enhance the credibility of our Organization, but I believe that this surely cannot be accepted as a way forward in this regard.

Having said that, I want to highlight the need for us to pursue other ways of enhancing the implementation of international standards. Let us, first of all, dwell on those standards which we have identified as supreme in upholding workers' rights; of course taking into account the interests and expectations of other social partners. In this connection, the most important step is to identify the reasons for member States' failure to ratify these standards, address the problem areas and establish ways of overcoming them. In doing so, we must bear in mind the different levels of development prevalent in today's world and should also realize that failure by some to ratify and implement international standards does not mean lack of political will to do so: it might very well be due to lack of administrative, technical and financial capacities to do so. It should therefore be imperative for the ILO to assist member States so incapacitated; and in so doing, as well as through a continual process of revision of standards.

Zimbabwe's commitment to the objectives and principles of the ILO is unwavering. Indeed we are making progress towards the ratification of the core Conventions. In addition to the nine Conventions we have already ratified, two of the core Conventions, namely, the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation Convention), 1958 (No. 111) and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1948 (No. 98), are now before Parliament. The other three Conventions on forced labour and freedom of association need constitutional amendments before ratification, and this is under way.

In other areas, Zimbabwe has also developed a Code of Conduct on AIDS at the Workplace seeking to protect workers with HIV against discrimination. We have also legislated a statutory instrument on child labour which seeks to protect children and young persons from labour-related abuse. However, in so far as child labour is concerned, Zimbabwe is looking forward to the discussion of a possible Convention in 1998, but we remain hopeful that in preparing for that discussion, focus should be placed on a clear and precise definition of what constitutes child labour, taking into account the different socio-cultural traits in our societies; hence the importance of the seminar on child labour.

Madam President, let me conclude my remarks by wishing you all the success in guiding us in our deliberations at this session of the Conference.

Original French: Mr. NIDELCU (Minister of Labour, Social Welfare and Family, Republic of Moldova) — Allow me on behalf of the delegation of the Republic of Moldova, to greet all the participants in the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference and to extend our best wishes for a fruitful and successful meeting.

I avail myself of this opportunity to express our satisfaction to Mr. Michel Hansenne, Director-General of the International Labour Organization, who has very wisely chosen items for the agenda of this session that are highly topical and of major importance for all the countries of the world.

The Government of my country, Moldova, is doing its best to promote and apply social policies that are appropriate to a period of transition. We are endeavouring to bring our legal framework into line with international standards and are taking effective measures to resolve our labour market problems and to guarantee social protection for the poorest segments of the population.

The Conventions and Recommendations of the ILO are very useful. Currently Moldova has ratified 13 Conventions whose provisions are part of national policy. Seven more Conventions have been submitted to Parliament and we are examining the possibilities of ratifying other ILO Conventions, specifically those concerned with workers' rights, fundamental freedoms and social protection.

To regulate the labour market and combat unemployment, the Government draws up and implements national and local manpower programmes each year which include measures to hire the unemployed.

Problems are dealt with on the basis of social tripartism, which is a civil conciliation system, but regretfully the results obtained are very modest indeed because of our economic and financial difficulties. Throughout this extremely difficult period, our country has benefited from the assistance of the European Union, through the TACIS project, the ILO and other international organizations.

The Report of the Director-General of the ILO, contains specific proposals to ensure respect for workers' fundamental rights to a decent living standard and to appropriate social guarantees in the context of the liberalization of trade and the globalization of the economy. Our delegation considers these proposals to be essential, as we are fully aware that in the current situation and with a view to fulfilling its functions and meeting the basic objectives enshrined in its Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia, the ILO must analyse and review systematically all the standards adopted until now, abrogate Conventions which do not correspond to present-day requirements and renew, draw up and adopt new standards adapted to current reality.

For countries in transition to a market economy, the Conference agenda items on the promotion of socio-economic policies and policies to regulate the labour market, including job creation in small and medium-sized enterprises and contract labour, are particularly relevant.

In the light of the above-mentioned facts, we are in favour of extending the influence of the ILO and of the promotion and implementation of social policies geared to the globalization of the economy, and the Republic of Moldova endorses the principles and measures proposed by the ILO.

To conclude, allow me to express once again all our respect for the ILO and the will of my country to promote and apply the decisions and conclusions arrived at by the present Conference.

Original Russian: Mr. CHTCHERBAKOV (representative of the General Confederation of Trade Unions) — May I start by echoing my predecessors by warmly congratulating the President on her election to her important and lofty post.

The subject of this session of the Conference is of extreme importance for the future of the ILO itself. It would be no exaggeration to say that the preparation and adoption of international standards constitute the heart of the ILO's activities. The destiny of the Organization is linked to the continuation of these activities.

We fully agree with the assessment of the world situation given in the Director-General's Report. Globalization, the liberalization of trade, and the formation of regional and economic groups all call for careful examination by States of their responsibilities vis-à-vis social progress and the protection of human rights, in particular workers' rights. But these radical transformations do not have only positive effects; there are also adverse social consequences, a lowering of living standards and a weakening of the social protection system for workers.

This is a matter of concern for the future of the ILO, which is an Organization responsible not only for defending the principles of equity, but of everything relating to the world of work. It is essential for labour standards to be adopted as internationally recognized instruments with the character of a world labour code.

That is why we fully support the idea of strengthening tripartism, especially as regards follow-up activities. As regards the preparation of a social label, we have some reservations given the major economic differences which exist throughout the world.

As regards the promotion of Recommendations, the idea is interesting, but we do not understand the reference to the fact that regional economic blocks acquire the functions and character of a federative State. We are convinced that economic integration should be above all a matter which falls within the competence of States, which must assume their responsibilities concerning social development.

We therefore believe that there are conservative groups which are trying to reduce both the role and the work of the ILO. We saw this in the attitude of the Employers regarding the proposed Convention concerning contract labour. But we shall not sit back with our arms crossed. And that is why the trade unions of the CIS fully support the position of the Workers' group; as reflected in the document entitled The ILO at the dawn of the 21st Century, which we believe reflects the position of the international trade union movement.

As regards the role of the ILO and the conclusions of the Copenhagen Summit and the WTO Ministerial Conference in Singapore, we believe that the conclusions should be implemented, particularly as regards the supervisory machinery, so that the ILO does not become merely an advisory body. We want the ILO to be a powerful organization, capable of helping the world of work so much in need today.

The ILO is embarking on the path of reforming its structures and bodies. We believe that this should be done on the basis of an active partnership, the establishment of MDTs, the determination of very clear priorities within the context of the ILO's universal character and tripartism.

We are very grateful to the ILO for its assistance which it has provided, and in particular to my trade union, but we are concerned about the problem relating to Convention No. 95. We should also like the ILO to deal with the problem of investments in the countries of our region.

We thank the ILO for its help and wish it success in the preparation of standards which are indispensable to the social and economic development of our young countries. We are counting on continued ILO assistance. Our trade unions are ready to cooperate with the ILO, of which we have so much need.

Mr. VENUGOPAL (Workers' delegate, India) — Madam President, I heartily congratulate you on your election as the President of the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference, on behalf of the people in general and workers in particular of the great country of India. The Workers' group of the Indian delegation has gone through the very valuable Report of the honourable Director-General of the ILO on The ILO, standard setting and globalization and I stand before this august audience to assess the Report on its important aspects in the light of the situation obtaining in Asian countries in general and India in particular.

This year we are meeting at a most crucial juncture. For the first time since the formation of the ILO, we are confronted with a deadlock. Every problem has its roots in psychology. Unfortunately, rightly or wrongly, the workers and the peoples of the Southern countries have become apprehensive about the ulterior motives of international financial corporations and the governments of modern developed countries supporting such corporations. They are apprehensive that the new moves brought forth by the Northern countries are only a pretext to impose their economic imperialism on the Southern countries for purposes of strengthening their own economies. We think that no further progress is possible unless this distrust is first removed, and we think that the ILO is the only international organization that can serve this purpose effectively. A new international order cannot be brought into being unless the ILO addresses itself seriously to this task. Workers of Southern countries will cooperate with the ILO for implementing any scheme which can initiate a new era without eroding the independence and sovereignty of their countries. On behalf of my country I assure you of our sincere cooperation with the ILO in this laudable objective.

It is clear from the Director-General's Report that the attempt is being made to have an instrument which "could take the form of declaration or charter adopted by the Conference ..., though it could even be a Recommendation accompanied by a follow-up procedure, to serve the promotional purpose which we are seeking to achieve". It has also stated that "there is no reason why the means of supervision should not be spelled out in the instrument itself ... and that this follow up could, for example, take the form of a regular report by the Director-General on 'social progress in the world'". On the whole, the ILO's stand on social labelling, product labelling, etc., may give rise to protectionism, and this is going to be a unilateral decision if it comes.

We feel that, in addition to several ILO standards becoming increasingly unrealistic in relation to the conditions prevailing in developing countries, this system of monitoring already adopted by the supervisory body of the ILO is unduly legalistic and rigid in approach. There is undue pressure exerted by certain over-enthusiastic international organizations of trade unions through complaints of infringement of freedom of association and non-observance of certain labour standards, without taking into consideration the relevance, the state of economic development of a country, the available infrastructure to process and facilitate the ratifications, etc. So we feel it should be left to the central trade unions of such countries who know the situations obtaining there, to bring pressure on the governments to ratify Conventions as and when necessary. For example, BMS, my own organization, had, as early as 1969, itself begun to impress upon the Indian Government the need to ratify Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 in the National Charter of Demands submitted to the President of India on 17 November 1969.

We are very much in agreement with, and also appreciate the stand of, the Director-General, that nothing short of renewed commitment to full employment is required to reverse the trends of increasing unemployment and underemployment in the world. This trend is now being seen to some extent even in some developed countries. But at the same time, we are opposed to the system of a "global social label" to be awarded "to countries which show comprehensive respect for fundamental rights and principles, which agree to submit to reliable and legally autonomous international inspections". We believe this system will, in future, subject the developing countries to fall under pressure from countries which control the WTO. We would request those who advocate such measures to reasonably and sympathetically understand the ethos and systems of the developing countries before subjecting them to any type of pressure.

Our Government and trade unions are faced with two huge tasks. One is the rehabilitation of thousands of workers who are being displaced because of the order from the Supreme Court to close polluting chemical manufacturing units. The problem of relocation of such industries, modification to reduce atmospheric pollution, and rehabilitating the workers in the new areas, are huge tasks. The next one is, of course, the question of child labour. Here also the Supreme Court has ordered payment of big lump sums by both the employer and the concerned Government per child, to be put into a corpus fund for the education of each child. Now our Government has alerted all the district officers throughout the country of the need to implement the order of the court.

Additionally, the number of NGOs and all important trade unions centres are conducting projects for the elimination of child labour under IPEC and/or other schemes, and also awareness-raising programmes through mini-projects and workshops.

Indian trade union centres are also active in the Tripartite Convention Committee set up by the Government to review the working of ratified ILO Conventions and to consider further ratifications.

Mr. EVANS (representative of the Trade Union Advisory Committee to the OECD) — I am glad to have this opportunity to address this Conference on behalf of the Trade Union Advisory Committee (TUAC) to the OECD. The OECD is a governmental organization but through the TUAC working people do have a chance to get their voice heard in governmental debates and to remind governments of the issue which is at the forefront of the Director-General's Report to this Conference — and indeed at the very heart of the vocation of the ILO itself; namely how to re-link social progress and economic development in a globalizing world.

For some the benefits of this globalizing world are very evident; corporate profits are up to record levels, executive salaries are up or rather sky rocketing. But almost all of our countries are facing a social crisis. Unemployment is at an unacceptable level of 36 million in the industrialized OECD countries. Working poverty is growing. The downsizing of corporations is destroying the bonds of trust between employers and their workers. In the developing countries more than 1 billion people still live in poverty and one-third of the world's total labour force is unemployed or underemployed. Some countries are being bypassed by economic development. And indeed world poverty is now the biggest threat to world peace. Developments in some of the most successful newly industrializing countries has also shown that the social crisis is not just a Western phenomenon. The strike movement in the Republic of Korea in January of this year showed that workers in Asia are not prepared to accept a return to the old authoritarian methods as a response to globalization.

The global economy does of course have the potential to offer the benefits of development to the whole world and all members of society. We could achieve a new global age which offers a chance of achieving growth with equity. However, this opportunity and potential will be squandered unless collectively we put in place a "social dimension" to globalization. Governments have to coordinate their policies, they must balance global markets with an evolving system of governments which can enforce basic labour rights and ensure that the more broadly defined labour standards rise in line with development.

The Secretary-General's report — and indeed the very vocation of the ILO — is a key element to this debate. However, the task is wider; we have not only to convince ourselves and labour ministers — the labour representatives here in this room. We have to convince the Finance, Economics and Trade Ministers that meeting this challenge is crucial to the well-being of both of our societies and our economies. We can no longer afford a situation in which finance ministers and central bankers create or tolerate mass unemployment as a "price worth paying" for other policy objectives and in which labour ministries are supposed to apply palliative measures, or worse roll back civilized social standards in a search for competitiveness. That is one reason why growing cooperation between the OECD as well as the Breton Woods institutions and the ILO is essential. I believe the political changes of recent weeks in the European G7 countries will make that task easier.

Cooperation between the ILO and the World Trade Organization is, of course, crucially important in the light of the important outcome of the Singapore Ministerial Meeting of the WTO last December, because trade and investment are the transmission belt of the global economy. Last year's OECD study on trade, employment and labour standards has shown that the enforcement of core labour standards is not a barrier to economic development and competitiveness. Respect for core rights does not remove the legitimate competitive advantage of developing countries. So the time has come to eradicate the appalling abuses of worker's human rights which are still appearing often in so-called "export processing zones" and "special" zones springing up around the world. We have to stop the misguided but very real "negative policy competition" between some governments to attract foreign investment through the suppression of labour rights. The OECD's Multilateral Agreement on Investments, still under negotiation, must have a binding labour clause referring to core ILO Conventions as well as the incorporation of OECD Guidelines on Multinational Enterprises.

Some speeches from this rostrum on this subject this week and indeed the report from the G118 group of "unaligned" countries, have sounded like a gramophone record which has got stuck. The OECD report found a positive two-way relationship between trade and labour standards. This should give us all scope to have a constructive dialogue on the suggestions in the Director-General's Report and on cooperation between the ILO and WTO secretariats as mandated in Singapore.

All OECD members are Members of the ILO. OECD membership is expanding as more countries apply and say that they share the common OECD features of market economy, pluralist democracy and respect for human rights. But our view is that all OECD members have to respect all of those features and notably core labour rights. It is for that reason that TUAC insisted that countries such as the Republic of Korea, which have had freedom of association violations condemned by the ILO, reform their labour legislation before they joined the OECD. The events which have occurred since then in the Republic of Korea have confirmed how right we were. For TUAC core ILO standards are not an optional extra; they are the foundation of the international economy.

I began by saying that the ILO's vocation was to relink economic development and social progress. In a more globalized economy it now has to seize the opportunity which is presented to it. I believe the ideas in the Director-General's Report begin to do that; we must all support it.

Mr. ETTY (Workers' delegate, Netherlands) — Discussions in the plenary on the Report of the Director-General never were a favourite of my delegation at the Conference. We do not see much sense in giving a speech for the record, with only a small group of friends and loyal compatriots (and of course the Director-General) taking an interest in what we have to say. It would be interesting to have a real debate and not a series of pre-prepared speeches, but obviously that is difficult to organize.

We are participating in this year's debate for two reasons: first, we feel that the subject is of importance; and, second, we are aware that it has prompted much discussion both within and outside the Conference Hall. As regards the latter, we have the impression that next to war and love there is now a third area of human activity where virtually everything is permitted, i.e., the debate about the link between international labour standards and trade. And we deeply deplore that. What may be inevitable in war and love can — and should — be avoided in a political debate, and certainly in a debate which is taking place at the ILO.

The Netherlands Workers' delegation does not hold the Director-General responsible for what has happened during the present session of the Conference in this respect.

We think that the Director-General has presented us with a document which quite adequately responds to the challenges facing the ILO, both within and outside the Organization.

The Director-General invited reactions from the ILO constituents in a frank, open and balanced way, remaining quite scrupulously within the Organization's mandate and raising questions which have already been debated for some time by governments, trade unions and employers' organizations, as well as by other interested parties outside the ILO.

Furthermore, the Director-General formulated a number of proposals in a broad and general manner, in order to give some guidance to the debate here and in the Governing Body in the very near future. There is nothing wrong with that. On the contrary, if he had failed to do so, many delegates would have called him a "bloodless bureaucrat".

Despite these efforts, which he has made in a competent and a dignified way, and which we can support in many respects, he has been misrepresented by several previous speakers. For instance, he does not introduce an untenable link between labour standards and trade; neither does he embrace protectionist approaches that link trade with labour standards, try to create a new mandate for the ILO or set out to equalize the remuneration of workers worldwide. These are just a few of the allegations made against him.

Five minutes is not enough time to counter these allegations. But I am sure that the Workers' group in the Governing Body will do so convincingly later this year. They will certainly also underpin the four theses with which I shall conclude.

First, if all the member States of the ILO had ratified the fundamental human rights Conventions of the Organization and applied them faithfully in law and practice, the whole debate about the social clause in the WTO would probably never have come up.

Second, those Governments which stated at Singapore last year that the ILO was the competent body for dealing with labour standards — and particularly those among them who said that the ILO must be strengthened — should support the principle of universality of these human rights standards and contribute positively to efforts to strengthen the supervisory system of the ILO.

Third, as regards social labelling, the Director-General rightly pointed out that a large number of related initiatives are at present being taken outside the ILO and will continue to spread — whether we like it or not. This is precisely an area in which the ILO should try to bring about some order and transparency in the debate — and the time is ripe for such action.

Fourth, and in conclusion, the Director-General's proposal to have greater recourse to Recommendations seems a little out of touch. One positive exception to this is the idea to use Recommendations as a stepping stone towards a Convention on a particularly difficult subject. But the proposal seems out of touch with the political realities which member States have created with regard to Recommendations — which will be very difficult to change.

But this comment also applies to the supervisory system and its present problems. Apparently many member States cannot even cope with the reporting obligations they have as regards the ratified Conventions. Would the Committee of Experts be able to cope with the considerable extra workload the Director-General's proposals imply for them?

As regards the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, I need only refer to the severe constraints under which it has to do its work now that the Conference has been shortened. This proposal of the Director-General is interesting but rather for further developing in a fairly academic setting rather than for coping with the realities of the ILO today.

Mr. SUNMONU (representative of the Organization of African Trade Union Unity) — I join those who spoke before me to congratulate the President and other Officers of the Conference on their well-deserved election. I also congratulate the Chairman of the Governing Body and the Director-General of the ILO for their Reports to the Conference.

African workers and trade unions of all trade union tendencies that constitute the Organization of African Trade Union Unity (OATUU) are unanimous in their desire that the ILO should be strengthened by all its tripartite members to enable it to continue to assert its moral authority worldwide, in its area of competence. As the most unique, representative and democratic among the United Nations agencies, the ILO deserves to be given all the moral, financial and diplomatic support it can, particularly by all the member States and the employers' and workers' organizations.

Globalization is bringing in its wake new economic and social problems which should be urgently addressed before the world is faced with disaster — which can be avoided. Some of these problems include: the increasing gap between the rich and the poor, both among countries and within countries; the intolerably high unemployment in most countries, rich or poor; the undermining of the role and authority of the State; the increasing absence of social and economic justice within and among countries; insatiable corporate greed; and the violation of human and trade union rights, etc.

It is against this background that I want to comment on the Report of the Director-General, The ILO, standard setting and globalization. If the ILO is to remain credible and retain its moral authority, it has to influence other United Nations agencies and international organizations, particularly the international financial institutions, and persuade them of the need to prioritize the elimination of poverty and the integration of social justice in all their economic and social programmes.

The ILO should also market its basic needs strategy of development. This is the only way to arrive at a sound social policy without which, to put it in the words of the President of the World Bank, Mr. James Wolfensohn, in his address to this Conference last week, there can be no sound economic policy. The ILO should distance itself from policies of international agencies that increase poverty, unemployment and debt, which are the main ingredients of social instability.

The OATUU notes with satisfaction the role of the ILO in the strengthening of tripartism in Africa, the invaluable assistance the Bureau for Workers Activities is giving to workers' education in our continent and the measures taken by IPEC to combat child labour. The multidisciplinary teams have also been assisting and strengthening the capacities of our members throughout Africa.

The OATUU, with the assistance and collaboration of the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) and the ILO, will start, in the next few weeks, a US$200,000 programme of entrepreneurialship and small business development within African trade unions to assist African workers and trade unions in the establishment of small and medium enterprises, job creation for their unemployed members and the provision of services for the development of their countries.

Activities geared to empowering women workers in Africa are given priority attention by the OATUU. In this regard, we need ILO assistance in the area of gender training through sensitization and training of actors involved in education, policy formulation and execution to ensure the mainstreaming of gender issues.

We attach great importance to the ILO's technical cooperation programmes in Africa because of the tremendous boost they give to capacity building in our continent. Our members need increased ILO assistance in occupational safety and health and in the area of ILO standards — especially in post-conflict situations in Africa.

I would like, therefore, before concluding my speech, to reaffirm the OATUU's support for the decision taken by the 20th Session of the Tripartite OAU Labour and Social Affairs Commission in Addis Ababa in April this year which called for: the ratification by African countries of seven basic Conventions of the ILO; the strengthening of the supervisory mechanism of the ILO Conventions; the strengthening of tripartism; and the continuation of the work of the ILO Working Party on the Social Dimensions of the Liberalization of International Trade.

We are particularly happy and proud about the role and contribution of African workers and of the OATUU and its affiliates to the struggle for the consolidation of democracy, good governance, economic integration and sustainable development in Africa. As we call for social and economic justice in Africa, we also demand them at the international level.

Original Arabic: Mr. HASSAN FULAD (Workers' delegate, Bahrain) — I am happy to have this opportunity of speaking to you on behalf of the General Committee for Bahrain Workers during this important session of the ILO Conference, which works towards the values of social justice, peace, freedom and the welfare of all humanity, eliminating discrimination and oppression.

Might I first of all be permitted to express my sincerest congratulations to Mrs. Keltošová, on the trust which has been placed with in her on her election to the presidency of this Conference. I think that this is an expression of appreciation of skills and qualities and we wish her every success in the tasks this involves. I also wish to express my appreciation to Mr. Michel Hansenne, Director-General of the ILO, for the professional and scientific efforts which he has made in selecting the theme for this session of the ILO Conference, a theme which necessitates, in our view, an in-depth study and a detailed examination by the Director-General and the Governing Body of the ILO, which must revise it through establishing an alternative strategy which would contribute to improving the conditions of workers in a period of globalization and through work to defend against, and raise awareness against, these protectionist measures that could harm the well-being of workers in developing and industrialized countries alike. Liberalization of trade cannot be linked to labour standards because of existing inequalities in international competition. This is the result of much protectionism in a large number of industrialized countries, and the existence of many very large companies, especially multinationals, which do not allow fair competition. Further, effective control over the price of raw materials, energy and technological products is in their hands, and they can impose this by force of arms if necessary. This means that there is no real chance for the developing countries to really compete fairly. We recognize the importance of respecting and complying with international labour standards and making great and equitable efforts in order to promote social justice in the developing countries.

We believe that ILO standards are not an end in themselves. They are but a means, the undoubtedly most important tool which this Organization has at its disposal. The ILO is the only competent body which can elaborate and monitor these standards with a view to achieving certain specific objectives and implementing the principles of the ILO Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia. These values are those of human dignity which, thanks to work and through work, make dignity possible. Solemnly confirming the principle that labour is not a commodity, and concentrating on the need to create standards on the social dimension and respect for fundamental workers' rights. Impelled by our faith in the principles and objectives of the International Labour Organization, as representatives of Bahraini workers, we would like to affirm the following:

First, the humanity of workers in labour legislation is an important element, which must guarantee the protection of independent trade union representatives as social partners, in conformity with the standards established by international labour laws.

Second, there must be recognition of fundamental workers' rights and Conventions as conditions representing economic and social progress resulting from the progress which has been made in the 1990s.

Third, there is a need for the revision of the values and the restructuring of the international labour standards, taking into consideration the autonomy of each party and the force of tripartite negotiation to protect the principles and values by keeping a more watchful eye on social considerations and not using labour standards for purposes of protectionism.

Fourth, the need to call the three social partners to adopt and apply the legal labour standards drawn up by the ILO so that there may be fair and balanced unity between the social partners in the interests of society at large and its progress. It is also necessary to strengthen the rights and independence of each partner at work.

Fifth, there is a need to work towards creating a practical mechanism at the International Labour Organization, which will be responsible for following up the application of international labour standards and strengthening its role, which will help the trade union organizations to achieve their goals and objectives of independence and to enjoy trade union rights in general.

The Committee of Bahrain workers is very interested in the work of the International Labour Conference, because of its deep and absolute conviction in the importance of common international efforts in order to renew the vitality of the ILO so that it may better adapt its means of work to the most recent developments in the world, basing itself of course on constructive democratic discussion within the framework of tripartite discussion between the social partners, so as to achieve the ILO's noble objectives in this regard.

From the speaker's rostrum I would like to state that workers' organizations in my country need more developed legislation, more technical and educational assistance from the ILO in order to fulfil their mission in an active and efficient manner and to fulfill their obligations, to protect, maintain and reinforce the acquired rights of workers, the development of their structures and the strengthening of their independent status and their own rules from the State, so that workers may achieve the level reflected in the international Conventions on workers' organizations, which would allow us to play a role in the development and prosperity of our country and the welfare and well-being of all its citizens.

We are workers and we find ourselves all, on the eve of the twenty-first century, witnessing violations of all kinds against international law, human rights, elementary humanitarian principles and international labour laws. These violations can be seen throughout the world. We note in particular what is happening as a result of the Israeli occupation, its destructive consequences and the violations of basic human rights both as regards Arab workers and employers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories. We therefore call upon this honourable Conference, with regard to the close correlation between the problems humanity is facing today, to study these violations and strengthen the role that the International Labour Organization should play. The ILO is the only competent organization which can create the machinery likely to ensure a follow-up of the resolutions and programmes adopted at the international level, and to ensure that the principles and the standards of the Organization are duly implemented and respected.

RATIFICATION OF CONVENTIONS BY FINLAND AND SWEDEN

Original French: The PRESIDENT (Ms. SASSO MAZZUFFERI) — I give the floor to the Clerk of the Conference to make an announcement.

Original French: The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE — I have pleasure in informing the Conference that the Director-General of the ILO has recorded the ratification by Finland of the Safety and Health in Mines Convention, 1995 (No. 176), and of the Protocol of 1995 relating to the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81). I also wish to announce that the Director-General of the ILO has recorded the ratification by Sweden of the Safety and Health in Mines Convention, 1995 (No. 176), and of the Protocol of 1995 relating to the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81). This brings the total number of ratifications of international labour Conventions to 6,433.

SECOND REPORT OF THE FINANCE COMMITTEE OF GOVERNMENT REPRESENTATIVES: SUBMISSION, DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

Original French: The PRESIDENT (Ms. SASSO MAZZUFFERI) — The next item on our agenda is the adoption of the second report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives which you will find in Provisional Record No. 14. I invite Mr. Etiang, Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, Uganda, and Chairperson and Reporter of the Committee to present the report.

Mr. ETIANG (Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, Uganda; Chairperson and Reporter of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives) — I have the honour to submit to the Conference the second and last report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives. This report is published in Provisional Record No. 14 and contains recommendations of the Committee on the matters placed before it. The resolutions, recommended for adoption by the Conference in respect of these items, appear at the end of the report.

The Committee considered recommendations concerning the assessment of contributions of the new member State, namely Saint Kitts and Nevis, which joined the Organization last year in 1996. It also considered the scales of assessment of contributions to the budget for the year 1998-99. On other matters the Committee has made recommendations concerning the management of the ILO Staff Pensions Fund and the composition of the ILO Administrative Tribunal.

The main subject considered by the Committee was the Programme and Budget proposals for 1998-99. The Director-General in introducing the proposals indicated that they were a result of a process which involved an extra stage of consultations compared with the previous budgets. This had given Government, Employer and Worker members of the Governing Body a better opportunity to voice their principal concerns. While pursuing the broad strategy of promoting democracy, assisting member States in their efforts to create employment and combat poverty in improving the protection of workers, priority was given to four major challenges. Namely, revitalization of the ILO standard-setting activities; the fight against child labour; the follow-up to the World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen and the follow-up to the Fourth World Conference on Women in Beijing.

The Programme and Budget also contained a considerable number of innovations including new programmes of action that the Governing Body had identified during its most recent discussions. Furthermore, the proposals respected the Governing Body's wish to reduce the Organization's budget; there were cuts in all major sectors. In real terms, the proposals were 5.9 per cent lower than the programme adopted by the Conference for the current biennium. In nominal terms they showed a reduction of 3.75 per cent at an exchange rate of 1.16 Swiss francs to the dollar. The Director-General outlined the objectives and results of the reforms which the Office had been implementing over the past six years. He recommended that the Office should explore every possible opportunity to achieve productivity gains in the future. However, further cuts at this stage would mean reducing the Office's activities in the regions.

The Committee had statements on the Programme and Budget proposals from Mr. Oechslin, the Employer Vice-Chairman of the Governing Body and Mr. Gray on behalf of the Worker Vice-Chairman of the Governing Body. Their statements are included in the report of the Committee in paragraphs 31-39 and 40-42 respectively.

In the debate there was general support for the Programme and Budget proposals. Members welcomed the additional stage in the consultation process as well as the increased transparency in the presentation. They encouraged the Director-General to continue his development of strategic budgeting. However, some Members had hoped for a large allocation of resources to regions and one Member believed that there was still scope for further reductions in the budget.

The total budget amounts to US$481,050,000. At the exchange rate of 1.46 Swiss francs to the dollar, this comes to 702,333,000 Swiss francs. The summary of the budget of expenditure and income is in Appendix II. You will find in Appendix III a summary of proposed expenditure by the major programmes. Finally, in Appendix IV a table showing the contributions due from member States for the year 1998.

I would like to express my thanks to the Vice-Chairman of the Committee, Minister Ducreux, Government delegate of Panama, and to all the members of the Committee and to the members of the secretariat, all of whom helped in one way or another in my task as Chairman.

Finally, in recommending all the resolutions to the Conference for adoption, I would make a special appeal in respect of the resolution concerning the Programme and Budget proposals for 1998-99 — Governments, Employers and Workers alike must give it their unanimous support.

Original French: The PRESIDENT (Ms. SASSO MAZZUFFERI) — The floor is now open for discussion of the report. Are there any speakers who wish to comment on the report we just heard? If not, we shall proceed with the adoption of the body of the report — paragraphs 1 to 77 — and of Appendices I to IV. May I take it that paragraphs 1 to 77 and Appendices I, II, III and IV are adopted.

(The report is adopted, paragraphs 1 to 77, together with Appendices I, II, III and IV.)

We shall now move on to the adoption of the resolutions submitted by the Committee. We shall begin with the resolution concerning the assessment of contributions of member States. May I take it that this resolution is adopted?

(The resolution is adopted.)

Next, may I take it that the resolution concerning the scales of assessment of contributions to the budget for 1998-99 is adopted?

(The resolution is adopted.)

May I also take it that the resolution concerning the management of the ILO Staff Pensions Fund is adopted?

(The resolution is adopted.)

And may I take it that the resolution concerning the composition of the Administrative Tribunal of the International Labour Organization is adopted?

(The resolution is adopted.)

As regards the adoption of the resolution concerning the adoption of the Programme and Budget for 1998-99 and the allocation of the budget of income among member States, this resolution will be the object of a record vote which will take place on 17 June, tomorrow morning.

I would like to take this opportunity of thanking the Chairperson and Vice-Chairperson of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives, as well as all members of that Committee, for the excellent work they have done.

Original French: The PRESIDENT (Ms. SASSO MAZZUFFERI) — With that we can return to our discussion of the Reports of the Chairperson of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Original Portuguese: Mr. D'ARAUJO MARTINS (Employers' delegate, Brazil) — First, I would like to join all the speakers who have congratulated Madam President on her election to conduct this meeting of the Conference and wish her much success in her task.

I would also like to congratulate the Director-General for his excellent report in which he analysed the fears of the social consequences springing from the globalization of the economy and proposes the revitalizing of the system of international standards, particularly as regards the universal compliance with human rights in the workplace.

In this document we find outlined in detail the principles for the greater universality in the promotion of essential conditions for dynamic social progress. As the Director-General has aptly pointed out on page 20 of his Report, "There are many other rights which, without being termed 'fundamental', are nevertheless of fundamental — one might even day vital — importance for workers".

The Brazilian employers, being aware of social issues, 50 years ago held the First Conference of the Productive Classes, when we drew up and signed the so-called "Charter for Social Peace". In 1946, the National Commercial Confederation, observing the principles of the above-mentioned Charter and fulfilling its social mission and civil duties, created the Social Service for Trade (SESC) and the National Service for Trade Apprenticeship (SENAC). The SESC, with the objective of providing better living conditions to wage earners, offers them extensive social attention; the SENAC, provides vocational training and prepares qualified manpower for commercial and service activities.

It is worth while indicating that these bodies never received government resources. The income of these bodies comes from the contribution of commercial enterprises amounting to, respectively, 1.5 per cent and 1 per cent of their payroll. Due to the integrity and honesty of the management of these bodies, they have grown and been perfected. Today they enjoy the trust of the whole Brazilian population which hopes to continue to receive their benefits.

Consequently, 50 years after its creation, SENAC has 2,300 health, training and recreation units throughout the country, always available for workers in commerce and their families.

During the same period, SENAC trained 24 million young people; 1,550,000 in 1996 alone. It may be considered the greatest establishment of its type in Latin America. Today the institution maintains 720 schools strategically distributed throughout the country, being in the vanguard of vocational teaching. In the area of computer sciences, it has trained more students than all the public schools put together.

In 1996, when it celebrated its 50th anniversary, SENAC merited a special mention in a publication of CINTERFOR, a technical service of the ILO, aimed at the promotion of vocational training in the Americas, because of the excellency of the organization and high quality of their vocational training.

The investment of the enterprises amounting to a total of 2.5 per cent of their payroll always achieved a high social return, expressively reflecting on the economic evolution of the country.

The recording of these efforts before this international plenary is appropriate, timely and important since the ILO is interested in everything that occurs in each member State in favour of the worker. The Ss, as we call these two services, are vigorous service agencies for social care and vocational training created and run by employer or collegiate bodies and maintained with the contribution of enterprises. Social peace is achieved through a constant and growing solidarity between capital and labour.

We take it as given that, for the ILO, for everything that these agencies represent and achieve, it would be desirable that these services devoted to Brazilian workers could continue with their achievements, serving as an example for other countries which, like Brazil, are fighting to improve living conditions of their peoples.

Finally, we must point out that the SESC and SENAC have been visited by various countries who tried to adopt a similar or equivalent system.

For this reason we believe that the ILO is the appropriate place to inform the member States, especially developing countries, about our model of social care and vocational training available for all and that we would be pleased to receive anyone who is interested in this, showing them what we are doing and revealing the know-how that we have accumulated throughout half a century of devotion and work.

Original Arabic: Mr. TABANI (Employers' delegate, Pakistan) — In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! Let me begin by conveying to you, Madam President, and to the Vice-Presidents, the very warm greetings of the Employers of Pakistan and our heartiest felicitations on your election as President of the Conference. We have full confidence in your leadership and in your abilities to guide this Conference to a successful conclusion.

Madam President, as we prepared to come to this Conference, we did so with the full realization that the comprehensive Report prepared by the Director-General — controversial as it is — will be debated quite at length. This is so because of the need to make the standard-setting activities and procedures of the ILO more relevant to the socio-economic realities confronted by the developing world on whose progress the destiny of the majority of the world's growing population in the next century depends.

In his statement to the Conference on 3 June, the Director-General justified his Report on the basis that the time has come to sum up and draw conclusions from the three years of debate that have taken place in the Governing Body and in its various committees on the social dimension of the liberalization of trade.

We feel that the proper forum to draw conclusions is the Governing Body itself. The Governing Body is fully seized of the work being done by the Working Party and of the distribution of work in the different committees based on the consensus decisions of the Working Party. This is a continuing process and a closure cannot be applied to draw conclusions from ongoing but incomplete work.

The ILO is in the process of conducting in a few selected countries special studies on the social implications of globalization and trade liberalization. It is also conducting some research on the positive impact of implementing core labour standards in developing countries.

We have time and again emphasized that the tripartite character of the ILO, its methodology of using persuasion for the ratification of standards, including core standards, and the technical cooperation and expert assistance provided by the ILO to member countries in order to enable them to ratify standards, are still preferable. The principle objective of the ILO's work related to labour standards is to secure the dignity and welfare of workers in accordance with the objectives, aims and purposes enshrined in the ILO Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia, giving due regard to the stage of social and economic development reached by each country.

We are therefore compelled to state in unequivocal terms that the idea of a declaration and that of the overall social label are not acceptable. Such proposals tend to legitimize the use of labour standards for protectionism, and thus by implication endorse the social clause.

The Employers' group in the Governing Body and in the Conference has constantly emphasized the need for strict supervision of the application of Conventions and for the revision of Conventions which are not being fully ratified or which create difficulties in implementation. They have also advocated change in conditions for denunciation and the introduction of a mechanism for the abrogation of Conventions. We therefore welcome the second part of the Director-General's Report, which contains some of the proposals I have just voiced.

In conclusion, let us admit that the ratification of standards per se does not create or increase employment. While the ILO must devote itself to the worldwide protection of the fundamental rights of workers in conformity with the constitutional mandate of the Organization, we cannot lose sight of the issues of priority for developing countries. According to an ILO report, almost 40 million people will have to find new jobs every year until the end of the century if the world as a whole is to keep up with the growth in the labour force. More than 36 million of these jobs will have to be created in developing countries, of which the majority will be in Asia.

I leave it to you to judge what should be the priorities of the ILO and of this Conference.

Original Chinese: Mr. PAN (Employers' delegate, China) — Madam President, please allow me first of all, on behalf of the business leaders of China, to congratulate you on your election to the presidency of this session of the International Labour Conference. My congratulations also go to the Vice-Presidents. I am confident that under your leadership this session will surely be a great success.

The Director-General submitted his Report The ILO, standard setting and globalization as the main theme of this session. We think that this issue is very important per se. It concerns the protection of workers' basic rights. As for companies, if these standards can take into consideration the benefits of both the employees and employers, then they will not only motivate the initiatives of employees but will also promote the production, development and economic performance of the companies concerned. Therefore, they will also be accepted by the employers.

So the crucial issue concerning these standards is whether they can really bring benefits to the governments, employers and employees of different countries. This is the crux of the issue and it determines whether these standards can be accepted and implemented by each country.

As the globalization trend is picking up speed in the 1990s, diversification and differences in levels of economic development in different countries are becoming more and more obvious. The gap between the North and South is also widening. This is the reality of the world in which we live. When setting rules for a game, the basic consideration is whether they can be implemented; the same applies when setting labour standards. That is to say, there should be both unity and flexibility. The greater the lack of flexibility, the harder implementation becomes. How could a country accept and approve a labour standard which is unacceptable and unenforceable in that country. Even if it were approved, it would remain no more than a piece of paper.

A few countries seek to exert pressure on a large number of developing countries to try to force them to accept those labour standards that only benefit those few countries. This practice is entirely contrary opposite to the general trend in the world nowadays.

There is an interesting ancient saying in China that instructs "Cut your toes to fit the shoe". It means that someone thinks that the size of his shoes is the best for everybody. It therefore should be the standard size which everybody should wear. If your foot is too large and cannot fit into the shoe, then the shoemaker does not think the problem is with the size of the shoe, but rather with the customer who should cut his toes in order to fit the shoe. What can we say to this?

Under globalization and trade liberalization the number of multinational enterprises is growing. The experience of the last half century since the Second World War has shown that to manage your companies in other countries well you cannot just copy your successful headquarters management model, but should take into consideration the real situation of the country and people where your company is located, since the cultural backgrounds of different countries vary.

More and more large companies in the world have been focusing on the training of cross-culture managers. This experience in cross-culture management may give us some enlightenment in setting labour standards. Now developing countries constitute the majority of the membership of the International Labour Organization. In setting labour standards, the priority should be given to the stage of development and acceptability of these developing countries. To use the social label on export products in order to identify whether the producer country accepts the labour standards or not is just a living example of cutting your toes to fit the shoe.

The Employers' delegation of China hopes that the Government, Employer and Worker delegates of each member State can use this rostrum to fully and freely express their individual viewpoints. We also hope that the ILO will pay due consideration, objectively and justly, to all these different views on setting labour standards that will really benefit the majority of member States so as to make a real contribution to social progress.

Ms. BUVERUD PEDERSEN (Workers' delegate, Norway) — "The ILO's standard-setting function has always been — and, to my mind, still is — the very backbone of the International Labour Organization. It is standard setting that underlies and imbues all our activities and it is the ILO's standards that will determine the place that the Organization occupies in the coming century, because it is through them that the ILO can make its most valuable contribution to a world economic system based on the liberalization of trade and genuine multilateralism. Unless that function is strengthened, the promises of progress in the world economy are liable to be jeopardized or to remain a dead letter for all too many workers." These were the words used by the Director-General when he introduced his Report at the opening of this year's session of the Conference. I fully agree with him. This is why his Report is so particularly important this year.

It is the first Report in 13 years which discusses the elaboration of the ILO's regulatory framework. We have, throughout this period, witnessed developments towards ever more rapid globalization and, unfortunately, also towards the brutalising legislation of the world economy. This situation makes it highly urgent for the ILO to discuss existing standards, the development of new standards, ratification, application and supervision, a discussion which is highly relevant if the ILO is to ensure a just distribution of the advantages related to the globalization of the economy and to furnish it with a social dimension.

The Norwegian Confederation of Trade Unions has recently held its 29th Statutory Congress. Our Congress statement on international affairs underlines, with reference to the ILO, the importance of having an international regulatory framework capable of protecting workers, their organizations and elected officers against infringements.

The participants at the Social Summit in Copenhagen expressed agreement concerning the need to respect the ILO's core Conventions. This should imply that all participating governments ratify the existing core Conventions. The World Trade Organization's Ministerial Conference in Singapore also referred to the ILO as the competent body for establishing and discussing standards for working life. The central place devoted to work on a social clause in international trade agreements at the Singapore Conference is an immediate consequence of the fact that a number of ILO member States do not respect the core Conventions.

We have seen attempts to interpret the Ministerial Declaration on the relationship with the ILO differently from what the wording indicates. This is certainly out of the question. The personal statement made by the Chair of the Conference was not based on an informal decision. The international trade union movement and an ever-increasing number of governments will continue to work for increased cooperation between the ILO and the WTO and for the incorporation of a social dimension into the activities of the World Bank, the IMF and the World Trade Organization.

Part I of the Report of the Director-General raises the question whether the supervisory machinery of the ILO on the application of Conventions should also include States which have not ratified the core Conventions. In my opinion, the answer must be yes. The Constitution of the ILO to which all member States have expressed adherence establishes the principles on which the ILO is based and does, in my opinion, commit the States on matters concerning the most fundamental workers' rights.

The statement made by the representative of the Colombian Government stating that he speaks on behalf of 113 governments causes me deep concern. I have difficulty believing that such a great number of countries refuse to strengthen the supervisory mechanisms aimed at upholding the fundamental principles of the ILO. As a consequence of the views expressed, trade unions everywhere must further intensify their efforts. We cannot, and will not, accept that workers — men, women and children — must sacrifice their freedom, health and even their lives on the altar of trade liberalization. This also means that the proposal concerning the ILO overall social label deserves support and follow-up.

I would like to conclude these few remarks with some words concerning the appendix to the Report of the Director-General, namely the Report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories. The report shows that the situation has not improved — on the contrary. Time does not permit me to go more thoroughly into this topic here, so let me just repeat what I said last year about the need to put international pressure on the Israeli Government with a view to ensuring resumed and continued peace negotiations. A special sitting of the International Labour Conference could form part of such pressure. I am convinced that the people in general, both in Israel and in Palestine, want peace and positive development for themselves and for their neighbouring countries.

Original French: Mr. PIERRE (Workers' delegate, Haiti) — Madam President, I associate myself with other members of the Haitian delegation in congratulating you on your commitment to the responsible mission entrusted to you.

On behalf of the Haitian workers I would like to express our gratitude to the Director-General for his excellent Report which demonstrates his commitment to make our Organization equal to the considerable changes taking place in this century. If, historically speaking, globalization is not a recent phenomenon, there is no doubt that with the end of the Cold War, it is one that has considerably increased, in particular with an acceleration of capital flows, the opening up of economies and the monopolization of production at the global level. Do we need to recall here that approximately 200 multinational companies are responsible for one third of world production.

It is said that globalization, with its dominant paradigm of liberalism, stimulates growth and employment. In this context, a large number of developing countries, including mine, are obliged to undertake major economic reform programmes in order to enter the world economy. In this regard, the Haitian Government has adopted a neo-liberal policy since its return to constitutionality and this neo-liberal policy is far from inspiring hope, as some would have us believe. This reform has thrown the Haitian workers into a desperate situation. This is illustrated by the act concerning the reform of the public administration which makes provision for the dismissal and compulsory early retirement of some 18,000 officials in a country where the unemployment rate is in the order of 70 per cent of the working population. Moreover, the application of these economic reforms is carried out without consultation of the social partners and in opposition to standards in respect of freedom of association. This, I think, explains the exclusion of the trade union movement from the Council for the Modernization of Public Enterprises (CMEP) — the body set up to manage the implementation of the programme of modernization of certain public enterprises. Add to this the dismissal of numerous trade union leaders from enterprises such as telecommunications, electricity and the national port authority and we see what this represents.

Even if it is too soon to take stock of the social cost to the workers of these economic measures, one can nevertheless say that their situation is being increasingly exacerbated since the country is now facing true economic paralysis characterized by galloping inflation which brings in its wake cost of living hikes, representing a serious handicap for a Haitian worker whose minimum daily wage is around 36 gourdes, that is to say $US2.11.

The outlook is poor. Globalization creates a paradox — at the same time as one is speaking of growth, one is also witnessing rising poverty. The World Bank in its World Development Report 1995, noted that the world economic prospects were good, but recognized also that poverty was growing.

As a result of this situation, we wish to show that globalization is a two-edged sword which will lead to most serious disasters because increased inequality, precarious employment and lack of respect for fundamental human rights and trade union rights are causing the social fabric to disintegrate. Indeed, we have to ensure, as the economist Brender said, that trade liberalization does not destroy the links of solidarity within nations.

It is here that our Organization has an important role to play and the Haitian workers have high hopes in the ILO which is the organization per excellence in the sphere of international labour standards. The need to promote the ILO's international Conventions within the context of globalization becomes imperative. This need was recognized at the World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen. The Ministerial Conference in Singapore also made a declaration to this effect.

Together with the Director-General, we believe that globalization cannot be given free rein. That is why we support his suggestion to the Conference to recapitulate, in a text or possibly a Recommendation, the essential principles, and to create a follow-up mechanism in the form of periodic reports on social progress in the world, followed by a policy discussion.

Original Russian: Mr. KOLMOGOROV (Employers' delegate, Russian Federation) — ILO standard setting, to which the Director-General's Report is devoted this year, has been and will continue to be one of our Organization's basic activities for the fulfilment of the aims and objectives set out in its Constitution and in the Declaration of Philadelphia. In this sense, the ideas contained in the Report warrant our support: the fundamental ILO standards should be more universally applied in conditions of economic globalization, and the subjects of future international labour instruments should be more carefully selected.

Globalization, as the Report says, must not be left to its own devices. If we expect the liberalization of international trade to lead to produce economic and social benefits, then we must, when developing standard-setting activities, take account of the particularities and special features of groups of ILO member States, including those with transitional economies. For it is precisely in the concrete application of the ILO's standard-setting activities that we feel the Organization can improve and develop.

Now that Russia is on the path of transformation, we are endeavouring, in drawing up our national legislation, to make use of the wealth of international experience concentrated in ILO Conventions and Recommendations, and specifically in the fundamental standards. Russian employers are lobbying and taking part actively in the drafting of federal acts on employers' associations and on the establishment of a Russian tripartite committee for the settlement of social and labour disputes, as well as other bills in the social and labour field.

At the same time we highly value the technical assistance provided by the ILO in helping to solve the most urgent problems. As in the past, one of the most serious of these is employment. An example of the success of this cooperation can be seen in the international conference held in May this year on the "Development of enterprises and job creation in Russia". We should like sincerely to thank the ILO's leadership for organizing this conference. Furthermore, we hope that the establishment of a multidisciplinary team in Moscow will make it possible to increase the effectiveness of such events still more, by exposing them to the real needs of the CIS States for enterprise reform and for the development of small and medium-sized business. One of the most important aspects of the multidisciplinary team's work may thus lie in drawing up a model and a mechanism for tripartite cooperation at the regional level and for ensuring communications between all levels of the social partnership.

I would like to draw your attention to a question which has not yet received as much attention as it should from our Organization. I have often mentioned this in the past as well. I am referring to the possible strategic use of the ILO to stimulate investment in countries embarking on the path of market transformations, with a view to ensuring full employment. This does not exclusively mean attracting foreign investment per se; it would rather mean making use of foreign investment more strategically, as a way of stimulating more extensive domestic investment where it is needed.

Once again, we would like to point out that the ILO is capable of strengthening its role and improving the situation on the world labour market if it works with the World Bank, the IMF and other international and regional agencies.

Sixteenth sitting

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT (Mr. KHALIL) — In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! We shall continue our discussion of the reports of the Chairperson of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Mr. NOAKES (Employers' delegate, Australia) — I would like to extend my congratulations to Madam President on her election, and to extend to the Director-General my thanks for the Report which is now under discussion.

I want to address three issues, and they correspond to those raised in the Director-General's Report. The possibilities for the adoption of a declaration of fundamental principles, the possibilities for the adoption of a consumer-labelling system and the changes necessary in the standard-setting system.

In debates which have taken place within the Governing Body and its committees, the Employers have proposed that consideration should be given to the adoption by this Conference of a declaration of fundamental principles which would contain the essence of what have been recognized as the core Conventions. This proposal was put forward in an attempt to enable the International Labour Organization to respond effectively to the challenges which have arisen from globalization and trade liberalization and to demonstrate its continuing relevance in a changing world. This proposal was not and has not been fully developed. Indeed it would not have been desirable to seek to avoid the discussions which needed to take place if the necessary degree of consensus to support it were to be obtained. The detail of such a declaration, the follow-up mechanisms and the supervisory machinery to be applied needed to be fully discussed. At this stage of that discussion we can say that a certain degree of consensus exists on this concept and that this corresponds in general terms to the ideas put forward in the Report. The task now is to seek to extend that consensus, to seek to satisfy any concerns or reservations and to elaborate the necessary detail. I want to express my personal commitment to ensuring that this proposal is transformed into reality. I believe that adoption of the proposal will be in the interests of this Organization and its constituents.

It was therefore with some dismay that I read the proposals in the Report concerning the possible adoption of a system of labelling consumer goods with a so-called social label. This is a concept on which there is no consensus and on which, in my judgement, there can be no consensus in the foreseeable future. Certainly it is strongly opposed by employers and certainly it will be divisive for this Organization. In the context of the debate about a declaration of fundamental principles and the delicate stage which has been reached in that debate, the introduction of the notion of social labels is a diversion and a particularly unfortunate diversion. I appeal to the constituents of the Organization not to be diverted in this way and not to be misled by the attempts which have been made in some quarters to mix the concepts together in order to reject both.

One of these concepts has validity, the other has no validity. One has a growing and substantial basis of support, the other has little support. But if they are not separated from each other they will both become divisive, and the lack of appreciation of this basic truth in the Director-General's Report is difficult to understand.

In section II of the Report, the Director-General addresses the subject of standard setting and puts forward some interesting ideas for improving that process and making it more relevant. I welcome this thoughtful attempt to bring together the problems which exist in this area, and to raise for our consideration a number of ways in which those problems might be addressed.

It is clear from the events of recent years that support for the current approach to standard setting has been steadily diminishing. The Employers' group has repeatedly expressed its concerns about the process, sometimes in forceful terms. It has put forward some proposals for change, a number of which are reflected in the Report. Many governments have expressed their dissatisfaction, sometimes by debate, sometimes by simply refusing to ratify the Conventions produced in recent years. The Workers' group has maintained its attachment to Conventions and to more Conventions as the principal means of securing greater protection for workers through the activities of the Organization. But there are, I believe, growing doubts on all sides as to whether a continuation of past approaches is the best way of achieving the aims of the Organization in a world which will never be the same as it was in the past and in which change is more rapid than it has ever been in the past.

I particularly welcome the remarks of the Director-General concerning the need for greater selectivity in standard setting, the need to improve the preparatory process, the need to upgrade the status of Recommendations, the need to reconsider the content of standards and the need for a systematic and ongoing process for the evaluation of standards so that their relevance and effect might be assessed on a continuing basis.

In conclusion, I want to return to the issue of a declaration of principles, and to express the hope that at the end of this debate it will be clear that there is sufficient support for the concept to justify the continuation of work to develop the necessary detail. If the proposal can be brought to fruition, hopefully at the next session of the Conference, then an important contribution will have been made towards achieving the ideals of the Organization. There will also have been a demonstration of the capacity of the Organization to respond in new and different ways to new and different challenges. At a time when the very relevance of the Organization is being questioned in many quarters this would be a considerable achievement.

Original French: Mr. LUANGVILAY (Workers' delegate, Lao People's Democratic Republic) — Madam President, allow me to join previous speakers in congratulating you on your election to preside over this session of the International Labour Conference. This session is a very important one as it focuses on ILO standard setting and globalization, providing governments, employers and workers with the opportunity to work together for the good of the workers.

The ILO, which is the nerve centre of tripartism, has always sought to broaden its activities to provide better worker protection.

In the Lao People's Democratic Republic the economic and social situation is evolving reasonably well, thanks to the priority our Government has placed on promoting investment. At present the national labour force is not able to meet the needs of the national economy, neither from a quantitative nor a qualitative point of view. Given this situation, we have no other solution but to seek outside help and assistance. We therefore believe that the ILO should increase its assistance to us in the sphere of human resources development, and in that of technical and vocational training, to enable our workers to participate effectively in our national development.

The application of international labour standards, as elaborated by the International Labour Organization, is in our view absolutely necessary for the protection of workers' legitimate interests. The effective implementation of these standards depends on the specific socio-economic circumstances of individual countries. Moreover, the less developed and the developing countries require time to raise their levels of economic and social development to bring them into line with those of the industrialized countries before they will really be able to apply certain standards. The Lao Government has given high priority to human resources development, vocational training and to job creation, with a view to gradually improving the living conditions of the population.

The Lao Trade Union Federation has played its role in articulating and protecting workers' interests and has participated in the preparation of Lao legislation. We are currently concentrating our efforts on the training of federation officials, and of workers in general to help them to acquire technical, scientific and vocational skills. We are convinced that the international organizations, such as the International Labour Organization in particular, as well as friendly countries, will help and support us in this undertaking.

I should like to conclude by wishing every success to the Conference.

Mr. LUCHMUN ROY (Workers' delegate, Mauritius) — I have had the opportunity of going through the brilliant Report you have prepared on the subject of globalization, which is a topic that is now most appropriate for workers, governments and employers. The points mentioned in the Report aim mostly at ensuring good understanding and justice. My organization is particularly happy that there is mention of basic Conventions, which in the given context are indispensable instruments for the protection, and furthermore the interest, of workers.

More than ever, the ILO's role will become more important and challenging in addressing the problems of globalization and trade liberalization. We are confident that the ILO will play a leading role to ensure peace and stability in our societies.

I am particularly happy to bring to the attention of this Conference the fact that the trade union movement in Mauritius has lately debated fundamental issues like globalization, trade liberalization and privatization. These issues have been debated at a national conference under the aegis of a national organization grouping all trade union organizations which we call the "All Workers' Conference". For the first time in its history, the trade union movement in the country has overtaken the Government in producing White Papers on national issues like privatization, fiscal policy, etc. Last year, the All Workers' Conference succeeded in convincing the Government to reduce sales tax from 10 per cent to 8 per cent and taking other measures to safeguard the interests of workers and the vulnerable sections of the population. Trade union unity in the country was never as strong as it is today with the creation of the All Workers' Conference.

The trade union movement in Mauritius today notes with pleasure the initiative taken by the new Minister of Labour and Industrial Relations to organize regular meetings with the trade union representatives, which he has named as the "Permanent Forum for Dialogue". This initiative is enabling the trade union movement to raise all problems relating to workers each month, at a meeting which is presided by the Minister himself. We have taken note of the fact that there is a follow-up to almost all issues that are raised by the unions. We hope that this laudable initiative will last for long, as it is in the interests of workers in the country.

Government has lately announced the decision to reconsider salary structures and conditions of work in various sectors through remuneration orders. The trade union movement expects that there will be improvement in various sectors like the sugar industry, the catering industry, the transport industry, banks, fisheries, etc. With respect to public officers, there is discontent about the fact that the institution that is responsible for carrying out a revision exercise on pay and grading structures has not yet taken the decision to convene unions.

The trade union movement was disappointed last week when the Minister declared that the Government was not in favour of referring the case of EPZ workers to the National Remuneration Board. There has been no salary revision exercise in the export processing zones for more than ten years, which means that wages are being deliberately kept at low levels. The Government argues that improvement of wages in the sector will threaten the competitiveness of our EPZs. As a trade union organization, we cannot subscribe to the view of the Government, as 80,000 employees of the sector are being unduly penalized. We expect the Government to reconsider its stand on the issue in the coming weeks.

Coming to industrial and labour legislation, we have been informed that the Government has constituted a working group. This working group is supposed to come up with proposals to amend and ultimately replace the Industrial Relations Act, the Labour Act and the Workmen's Compensation Act. The Government has also announced that it has sought the assistance and guidance of the ILO to replace the above-mentioned legislation.

The trade union movement in Mauritius notes that the Government has taken a lot of time on the issue and that things have unfortunately remained unchanged. In this context, I will again express my satisfaction at the ILO's request to all member States to ratify the seven core Conventions. We are happy that the Government of Mauritius looks forward to ratifying the three Conventions, i.e. Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100), and the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111).

We believe that Mauritius with its export-oriented economy should project a democratic image with an emphasis on the respect of human rights and liberty. Such an image will be very beneficial for the country, as we export everything we produce and it would even benefit the services that we offer. We hope that the Government and employers in the country will give necessary importance to this fundamental point. We believe that Mauritius should enter the third millennium with the image that we have described above.

It appears that the days of full employment in Mauritius are over, as the rate of unemployment in the country is already as high as 5.5 per cent. The economic situation is not an easy one, with rising inflation, increasing budget deficit, etc. The unions do not subscribe to the view that privatization is an answer to the existing economic problems.

So far, Government has not deemed fit to keep us informed about the discussions it has had with the IMF and the World Bank. We believe that the days are gone when economic and social issues had to be dealt exclusively by government, employers and the World Bank. Workers need not only to be ignored. Their approval and involvement in economic and social policies are absolutely essential.

My organization, which is the Mauritius Labour Congress, deplores the fact that the Government has not been able to come forward with any White Paper since it has assumed power. On the eve of the presentation of the national budget, it is publishing a series of White Papers to justify its stand on centralization of the sugar industry, new fiscal policies, privatization, etc. This is not the way to deal with trade union organizations as it will not create confidence in government policies.

The Mauritius Labour Congress, as well as all other trade union organizations in my country, do not want to hamper progress. We want to play our role not only by defending exclusively workers. We are fully conscious of the important changes that are taking place in the world, particularly with the advent of the World Trade Organization.

We hope that our contribution in changing our country for the better will be acknowledged by the Government as well as employers. I am also confident that the ILO will play a more meaningful role in bringing social partners to collaborate more fruitfully in the interests of everyone.

Original French: Ms. ZGHIBARTA (Workers' adviser, Republic of Moldova) — On behalf of the workers' organizations of the Republic of Moldova, I would like to congratulate the President and the Officers of the Conference on their election and wish them every success.

The trade unions of the Republic of Moldova, as the most important social partner of the Government and the employers in my country, have closely studied the Report of the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Michel Hansenne, which gives a very complete picture of the period behind us and outlines the major policy guidelines for the future. The discussion on the Report is particularly significant this year. It will mark a crucial stage in the discussion on the Organization's future approach to standard setting.

In his introduction, the Director-General states that the ILO has high expectations in the area of standard setting, especially after the World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen and the Ministerial Conference of the WTO in Singapore.

Globalization of the economy undoubtedly has a lasting impact on the progress and prosperity of the member States of the ILO, as well as on the newly independent countries and those which emerged following the geopolitical transformation which took place in the 1990s in Europe — including the Republic of Moldova.

It is increasingly clear that globalization of the economy will bring about substantial and structural changes which, in turn, will raise two issues of major importance with respect to ILO standards: first, the constitutional principle concerning the voluntary nature of commitments entered into through Conventions, which does not allow them to play fully a role of regulator of the world economy and of the social and labour relations based on that economy; second, the constitutional principle whereby the commitments arising from the Conventions are limited to the State. Although the social partners — the employers and the trade unions — are not part of the government, their role is becoming increasingly important in the process of globalization of the economy — a fact that influences the effectiveness of social policy.

It is clear that at the present time, the elaboration of ILO standards must take account of these facts. In our view, given the globalization of the economy, these factors will allow international labour standards to play an active role.

It is of major importance to the national trade union movement that standards should be more targeted in order to have a greater impact in this era of economic globalization. This movement needs the support of international law, as constituted by the Conventions and Recommendations of the ILO.

Globalization brings forth new topics for the standard-setting activity of the ILO and requires careful selection.

The selection of subjects for standard setting must be carried out in accordance with certain criteria specific to the ILO which, in our view, should be adjusted to take into account the new phenomena emerging in conjunction with globalization.

However, if the criterion of "added value" is not supported by the social partners, the significance of international labour standards in this era of globalization will decline.

It is for this reason that we feel that this criterion is of major importance to the process of renewal of the standard-setting activity of the ILO in this time of globalization and insist that it be recognized by all parties and introduced into the final instrument.

The Republic of Moldova, since joining the ILO, has ratified 14 Conventions; this is perhaps not much, but is nevertheless significant for our Republic.

At present, the priority tasks of the trade unions are (a) to implement the provisions of the Conventions ratified by the Parliament of Moldova, and (b) accelerate the process of ratification of the seven Conventions submitted for examination by the legislative bodies.

There are many crises throughout the world and their repercussions affect first and foremost wage-earners. The rights of workers and their trade unions are violated in a flagrant manner. The ILO must therefore make it a priority objective to strengthen its activities and to place itself at the forefront of action aiming at settling these serious problems.

By way of conclusion I wish to express the hope that the resolutions taken at this Conference will contribute to improving the situation of wage earners throughout the world. I trust that the Conference will find positive solutions to the problems faced by all wage earners today.

Original Arabic: Mr. DJEMAM (representative of the International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions) — Permit me first of all to express our full support to the International Labour Organization, which is the only body within the United Nations system to have adopted the principle of tripartism. I am convinced that belonging to this Organization represents a commitment to respect the principles of the Constitution and its standards. I counsel caution in examining these standards and I call for a growth in standard-setting activity so that the standards are well adapted to reality.

The role of the workers within the ILO has dwindled because of rapid transformations taking place throughout the world. Therefore, we call for a new approach to be found which will give a bigger role to the workers, through the development of technical cooperation between the International Labour Office on the one hand and the international trade union federations on the other, with a view to improving their capacity and also training competent officials, which will allow the unions and their officials to take up the challenges they face, which have been caused by globalization.

The problem is a question of the organizational and management methods of globalization, in its goals, in the supremacy of the profit motive, in dodging around the law and in the quality of some dubious investment capital in this framework. The liberalization of markets is flattening the world of work and ensuring the observation of the law of the jungle, thus exploiting the development of the means of telecommunication and the free movement of goods to transcend frontiers and to corrupt society in each country, its sole aim being to optimize profits.

Confronting this reality demands the drafting and adoption of national and international legislation that bar the exploitation of labour and ensures the well-being of all within a context of democracy, social justice and respect for human dignity.

We also defend the social clause and also the importance of the role of the International Labour Organization. The Copenhagen Summit and the Singapore Meeting recognized our existence and rights. Today we have to set up a mechanism which requires all parties to develop the social rights of all the workers, men and women, and of all the population, to condemn marginalization and discrimination, to refuse to submit political decisions to the laws of the economy and of capital, to work towards bridging the gap between North and South, to reduce the external debt burden, and to soften the conditions of structural adjustment, which is grinding down poor societies. Therefore, we invite all people to join hands to join an international trade union grouping in which all trade unionists participate, whatever their political sympathies.

We also welcome the idea of a social label, on condition that it encourages the development of social and human rights, but not if it is simply a pretext in order to impose protectionism and sanctions. In this connection, I must call for the respect of trade union rights, and for the autonomy of trade unions, while also condemning any interference in the internal affairs of trade unions. I affirm that we strongly reject the interference of governments, whether it be to choose the trade union authority or to impose their choice, as in the case of Lebanon now, where the legitimate leaders of the General Confederation of Workers are being pursued, in particular its president, Mr. Elias Abou Risk.

We condemn the attempts made to abort the peace process in the Middle East, the challenge thrown down to the international community, the policy of blockades, the building of new settlement colonies, the frontier closures around occupied Arab territories, the hindering of development efforts, as well as the policy of Israel supported by the United States. We demand that Israeli troops withdraw from the occupied territory of Lebanon and the Syrian Golan Heights, as well as to respect international legitimacy and the accomplishment of the rights of the Palestinian people, namely the creation of an autonomous and independent State within its capital in Jerusalem.

The International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions also condemns the economic blockades which hamper development and have a negative impact on the life of citizens. We call on all the people affected to find a solution to the existing problems through negotiation within a framework that respects the rights of the citizens, human dignity, and the sovereignty of justice and law.

Original Russian: Mr. KUNYAVSKY (Employers' delegate, Belarus) — It is a great pleasure for me to join all the other speakers who so warmly from this tribune have congratulated the President on her election to her high post and to wish her continuing success in guiding the work of this 85th Session of the Conference. I would like to congratulate the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Hansenne, on the high-quality Reports which are of fundamental importance for the ILO in the twenty-first century, at a time when the social and economic development of the world will be inspired by globalization and the liberalization of trade exchange and where the results of this evolution, from the social point of view, including the fundamental rights of workers and of some isolated groups of employers, might take different paths. My country, Belarus, is a sovereign country and in the words of our President will never yield that sovereignty. But we are now playing an active part in globalization and the liberalization of trade. We have trade links with more than 100 countries throughout the world and we shall develop these relations. The employers of Belarus are the first to feel the social consequences of this process, both positive and negative. We share the view of the Director-General that social progress and economic process must go hand in hand and that the liberalization of trade and social progress should not be developed separately. However, social progress must be carefully aligned with legal and economic mechanisms in order not to jeopardize the economic fruits of the liberalization of trade and fair competition.

I should like to emphasize, on the basis of our albeit limited experience, that such mechanisms should be both precise and subtle. Here, we think that the ILO has a very important role to play, as one of the international organizations responsible for the preparation of mechanisms to harmonize the globalization and liberalization of trade on the one hand and real social progress on the other.

Some elements of these mechanisms have already been examined in the Director-General's Report, but many others will require further discussion and preparation. However, the Director-General is quite right in saying that the essential role of the ILO is to enrich its knowledge of facts and realities as reflected in the situations around us. This will heighten awareness of the fact that progress and social justice must accompany the globalization and liberalization process.

These processes, together with social processes, do not take any vacations and there is little time available to ponder on them. Like a spring, they bring forth from the earth a constant stream of water.

I am convinced that the ILO will meet the challenge of the new century which lies ahead.

Mr. MIN (Workers' delegate, Myanmar) — Madam President, I also wish to congratulate the Director-General for his interesting Report presented to this Conference. The theme of the Report is realistic approaches and means of action of the ILO on its standard-setting activities in order to cover the needs of globalization. I therefore respectfully agree with the conclusions set forth by the Director-General.

May I take this opportunity to commend the International Labour Office for its unrelenting efforts to place important topics on this year's agenda of the International Labour Conference. Accordingly, our first discussions concentrate on the general condition to stimulate job creation in small and medium-sized enterprises and on contract labour.

As a Workers' delegate I will give my full support for them and I look forward to the adoption of these instruments at this 85th Session.

In Myanmar political, economic and social reforms have been made in recent years with significant success. In the economic sphere, the present Government has successfully implemented the four-year economic plan which started in 1992-93 and ended in 1995-96. Thanks to the multifaceted efforts of the Government and the active participation of workers and peasants in the national development endeavours, the actual performance exceeded original targets. With a view to strengthening and sustaining the favourable conditions and growth for long-term development, a new five-year short-term plan from 1996-97 to 2000-2001 has been adopted. The performance of the first year of the new five-year plan will create favourable conditions for successful implementation of the entire plan. With this in view, close supervision and close coordination among the implementing agencies and organizations concerned are crucial. On the other hand, it might also be necessary to effectively mobilize national productive resources and to adopt ways and means for optimum utilization of its human resources.

In Myanmar we hold in high esteem the role of workers and peasants in nation building. In his message to the working people of the nation on the occasion of the 1997 Workers' Day celebration on 1 May the Chairman of the State Law and Order Restoration Council specifically made a point on that, and here I quote, "At a time when the State Law and Order Restoration Council has been building Myanmar Naingngan to make it a peaceful, modern and developed nation after laying down political, economic and social objectives, the workers are playing a crucial role, and the life of the workers who are contributing their physical and intellectual services in nation-building tasks is truly noble".

In this context, enhancement of the level and quality of life of the working people of Myanmar is one of the major concerns of the Government. In these days of trade liberalization and the opening up of the national economy, the flow of technology and investments from outside will provide our workers with new skills and technical know-how and thus improve their living standards and contribute towards national development.

I would like to draw your attention to the fact that in the meantime Myanmar workers are enjoying their legitimate rights as prescribed under the existing labour laws which were enacted several decades ago.

Reviewing and redrafting of these old labour laws are now in progress, and enactment of these new labour laws will be made after the emergence of a new State Constitution.

Lastly, allow me to extend my sincere wishes for the fruitful conclusion of this Conference.

Ms. BALLANTYNE (representative of the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom) — On behalf of the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom I thank you for giving us the opportunity to address this session of the International Labour Conference. It is always with some emotion that we speak before this assembly. Our organization born in 1915, hailed the establishment of the ILO in 1919 and it supports fully the ILO's aims and purposes.

As an international women's peace organization we share the ILO's basic premise that universal and lasting peace can be established only if it is based upon social justice. This goal has yet to be achieved universally and on a sustainable basis in spite of the efforts made over the years by the ILO and other organizations, including the one I represent.

The Director-General in his Report to this session describes the challenges to the ILO in the new international climate of trade liberalization and globalization of the economy. The Report deserves careful reading and debate, not only at this Conference, but by all those who have responsibilities in, and making decisions about, conditions affecting the world of work, which includes not only workers and their unions and employers, but also legislators at all levels and government officials; it also includes women and men generally, because we are all part of it and we are all affected by the liberalization of trade and by the so-called globalization of the economy. For these reasons, we read with interest the Director-General's ideas to reach out to the wider non-governmental community, of which women's organizations are an important sector.

We support the Director-General's views that the "ILO is indispensable for the consolidation of the multilateral trade system", and that the partners in this system must guarantee fundamental rights such as freedom of association and collective bargaining, the prohibition of forced labour, including forced labour of children, minimum age of employment, and non-discrimination (particularly in the form of equal remuneration for work of equal value). We support his view that there are other vital rights that must be recognized. Without a firm commitment by States to uphold these standards, the workers, and among them the most vulnerable of them — women and migrants — will be exposed to even worse exploitation.

We share the concern expressed by many, worldwide, that the globalization of the economy works primarily to the benefit of the major transnational corporations. Their power, already immense in determining financial and economic policies to serve their own interests, will grow, and the pressures they exert will weaken further the possibilities and resolve of national governments to respond to their peoples' demands.

The process endangers the fundamentals of democracy, which require the participation of the people in the debate and decision-making concerning the organization of their societies. Furthermore, during this globalization process we witness the increase of unemployment and poverty. Not a week passes without another corporation announcing the suppression of a significant number of jobs while posting a considerable increase in benefits to the shareholders. No wonder social unrest, tension and violence increase and armed conflict erupts within nations.

We also wonder just how the globalization process affects the United Nations system, of which the ILO is a part.

It seems to us that a hard look needs to be taken at the globalization process in which competition and maximization of profits are the credo, and not cooperation and action for the common good, which are the objectives enshrined in the UN Charter and in the constitutions of its specialized agencies. This is of deep concern to us.

Finally, we would like to express appreciation to the ILO for focusing, or continuing to focus, in the coming two years on promoting democracy, providing support and assistance in the fight against poverty, on protecting workers, with particular attention to the rights of women, children and migrant workers. In the case of migrant workers, we urge that particular attention be given to the protection of women migrant workers and to undocumented migrants.

We are glad to note that the ILO will continue its follow-up work to the World Summit for Social Development and the Fourth World Conference on Women.

And, as a final appeal, we urge that the question of "comfort women", taken up by the ILO, will be taken up again at next year's annual session of the Conference.

Ms. FRANCE (Employers' delegate, United Kingdom) — The Report of the Director-General, which we welcome as an interesting and thought-provoking contribution to our Conference debate, highlights the fact that the ILO is facing a crucial challenge.

Does the ILO wish to stay in the comfort zone, continuing to churn out Conventions which create a "feel good factor" at the time of adoption, but are less and less ratified and less and less relevant to the modern world? Or does it wish to foster a renewed commitment to achieving the objectives of the ILO's mandate?

It has a choice — marginalization, or a new direction.

British employers therefore welcome the debate the Director-General has provoked in Part II of his Report, which outlines some suggestions as to how the ILO's standard-setting process can be made more credible. There is a role for international labour standards in protecting fundamental rights and advocating best practice. Child labour is a perfect example of an issue which demands mandatory standards from the ILO. However, this is by no means true for all subjects, where standard setting is sometimes directed to the achievement of a misguided ideal. Standards which are overdetailed, too rigid to be universally applicable, and therefore not ratified.

The employers' attitude towards, and subsequent ratifications of, some of the recently adopted Conventions demonstrates this, and I unhappily predict that the Conventions on home work and contract labour, if adopted, will follow a similar sorry pattern.

We therefore wish to support and debate more fully the issues raised by the Director-General in his Report on standard-setting procedures. How we choose subjects for standard setting, not just using a process of elimination, the role of questionnaires, more use of general discussions, revaluing the role of Recommendations, making a better connection between voting behaviour and a decision to ratify, all bear support and further examination

The Conference sessions of 1997 and 1998 demonstrate how the ILO is at a crossroads. On the one hand we will be tackling the important issue of child labour and revising outdated, but important, Conventions. On the other hand we have invested huge amounts of human and emotional capital, trying to prescribe universal rules on contract labour, when the world is probably crying out for best practice guidelines in this area.

In themselves standards do not create jobs. The ILO also has a key role to play to help its constituents respond positively to the challenge of economic change. Obviously technical cooperation policies have to be a key part of this strategy. The first part of the Director-General's Report addresses another side of this and asks how the ILO can move forward the agenda, following the creation of the WTO and its Singapore Meeting.

United Kingdom employers would not support using trade measures, in however indirect a manner, to enforce labour standards, and in our view the Director-General's idea of the country social label could be seen as a social clause in disguise. More Office work should therefore be done on the issue of current practice and the effects of labelling schemes.

In our view the ILO must take forward the renewed commitment entered into by governments in Singapore on core labour standards, but that does not mean that the ILO should move away from its consensual approach just to steal a march on its competitors. The ILO should act in accordance with its own Constitution and respect the rules of the game of the world trading system.

The promotional work on core labour standards must be continued, but this should not be done with an unquestioning eye. What are the real barriers to ratification? Prescriptive detail? Lack of political will or the tendency of the ILO's Committee of Experts to add additional implementation requirements?

The United Kingdom employers fully support the proposal to draft a solemn declaration of principles, containing the fundamental rights enshrined in the core Conventions. This should be done for adoption at next year's Conference.

The declaration of principles would be a parallel political track which would not replace existing procedures but would form an important promotional tool. The application of these principles by all member States should be supervised, whether they have ratified the core Conventions or not. The Governing Body would no doubt make the initial assessment, but the key questions to ask are whether the country in question is in general compliance with these principles, or making positive moves towards compliance. There should be appropriate treatment for persistent patterns of abuse.

To United Kingdom employers, adopting a declaration is not just about the ILO rushing to respond to the WTO and seeking to justify its own existence, but about the ILO taking forward and updating its core mandate to address and improve workplace human rights in a worldwide context.

Original Portuguese: Mr. DE BARROS (Workers' delegate, Brazil) — Madam President, please permit us to express our satisfaction on your election to preside over this assembly.

It is a pleasure for me, on behalf of the General Confederation of Workers (CGT) to be representing here the group of Brazilian workers at the Conference, whom I wish to thank for the support and solidarity they have shown me.

This Conference is of capital importance, since it will be discussing ways of tackling the new challenge faced by humanity, namely globalization.

The discussion of the Report of the Director-General of the ILO is taking place at a very opportune moment after the World Summit for Social Development and the Ministerial Conference of the World Trade Organization in Singapore.

We are experiencing a time in which globalization is making its effects felt, with increasing unemployment, the increase of inequalities and greater precariousness of employment.

The ILO must establish labour standards which will lead to the establishment of a new economic world order to guarantee lasting growth, an improvement in living conditions, political stability, environmental protection and peace among all peoples.

All these elements have to be guaranteed and for this reason we endorse the comments of the Director-General in his Report. We should like to stress that the strengthening of the ILO supervisory machinery has been a topic of permanent debate over the last two years and the time has now come to put it into practice. We consider that this is an excellent opportunity to make effective the strengthening of the supervisory machinery of the ILO, because in the debates at the WTO, the workers presented their proposal for a social clause which should be included in the negotiations of that organization.

However, governments believe that the subject should be dealt with in the ILO and not the WTO and have undertaken to respect principles relating to such matters as freedom of association, the elimination of forced labour, child labour and so on.

Therefore, in order to consolidate that undertaking, it is necessary to establish supervisory machinery that can enable the ILO to effectively supervise the application of the respective Conventions. This instrument will also allow us to see in what manner the economic benefits of globalization can lead to a just and lasting social development. We also believe it most appropriate that one of these instruments should take the form of a code of conduct for enterprises.

The Director-General rightly believes that independent supervisory machinery is essential. The workers are an essential part of technological progress and modernization of the international production system, all of which has repercussions on the quality of production and consumption. That is why it is not possible to accept an economic globalization which excludes the workers.

Neither can we accept that globalization should become an instrument for reducing wages, eliminating jobs and disregarding workers' rights and ultimately threatening the basic principles of democracy.

We cannot believe, at the dawn of the twenty-first century, that the organizations which were established to guarantee lasting peace by means of instruments that would lead humanity forward with a minimum of inequality should close their eyes and fail to support policies whose aim is to ensure respect of the basic rights of workers which are essential to our survival. These are instruments which guarantee peace between peoples, and the search for social peace should be cemented into specific instruments.

In December 1988, the San Salvador Protocol was signed; the preamble of which recalls with satisfaction that the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the American Convention on Human Rights are based on an ideal of freedom in a world where destitution has been overcome and where conditions have been created enabling everyone to enjoy their economic, social and cultural rights, as well as their political and civil rights. This Protocol, in its various articles, undertakes to guarantee non-discrimination, the right to work in satisfactory conditions, the right to social security, the right to health, the right to a healthy environment, the right to proper food, the right to education, the right to the fruits of culture, the right to the Constitution, to the protection of the family, the rights of children, the protection of the aged and the disabled, and the protection of trade unions.

We cannot pursue the path of globalization without accepting all these principles. For that reason, we endorse what the Director-General says in his Report.

The ILO must draw up a series of instruments enabling it to fulfil its role in the globalization process with a view to ensuring that all its fruits can be used for the benefit of mankind as a whole.

Mr. WILSON (Workers' delegate, New Zealand) — On behalf of New Zealand workers, I welcome and congratulate the Director-General on his Report. In particular, I support the Director-General's reaffirmation of the importance, in the context of trade liberalization, of guaranteeing fundamental rights which allow social partners to claim freely a fair share of economic progress.

With the recognition of the fundamental importance of the core ILO Conventions by the April 1995 Social Summit in Copenhagen, the 1996 OECD study entitled Trade, employment and labour standards and, most recently, the Singapore Ministerial Conference of the World Trade Organization in December 1996, there can be no question that the ILO has not only a constitutional but also a political mandate for a continued standard setting and social monitoring role in the pursuit of social justice and peace in the global economy.

From the New Zealand workers' perspective, it is important to emphasize the increasing importance of ILO standard setting and supervisory machinery to workers in our country. Currently we have a situation in New Zealand where, firstly, the Government has taken no action to remedy the Freedom of Association Committee's 1994 finding that the Employment Contracts Act breaches Conventions Nos. 87 and 98, has not responded to the ILO's request that it meet with employers' and workers' organizations to discuss amending the Act to ensure compliance, and has ignored the ILO's offer of technical assistance.

Secondly, the Government has taken no action to remedy the breaches of Convention No. 17 relating to workers' compensation. The Government's own estimate is that injured workers are meeting $23 million of their own medical treatment costs for work injuries which, in the terms of the Convention, should be provided at no cost to the injured worker.

Thirdly, the Government has been in breach of Convention No. 42 relating to compensation for occupational disease for 23 years, although I am pleased to say that discussions in Geneva last week involving our Minister of Labour may have remedied that breach at last.

Finally, the Committee of Experts' report to this Conference again questions New Zealand's compliance with Convention No. 100, on equal remuneration. The Equal Pay Act was rendered inoperative in New Zealand by the 1991 Employment Contracts Act, and the gap between male and female earnings has widened.

New Zealand workers are proud of our country, and it is with a real sense of embarrassment that we have to repeatedly call our country to account in ILO fora. It is not simply a matter of failing to comply with the "printed letter" of the Conventions as both our Minister of Labour and Employers' delegate claimed in their speeches to this plenary last week. The breaches I have referred to strike at the very heart of the Conventions.

It is a shameful record for a relatively prosperous developed country, and graphically illustrates why New Zealand workers are strongly in support of the Director-General's proposals.

In particular we support the proposals, firstly, that not only should the ILO ensure that all partners in the multilateral trade system respect fundamental rights, preferably by ratification of, and compliance with, the core Conventions, but further steps should be taken to strengthen the supervisory machinery. Secondly, that consideration should be given to a process of social labelling. We acknowledge that this needs to be done carefully, and requires further discussion. Thirdly, that certain other rights, such as health and safety, should be identified as fundamental and vital. In this regard, I note that none of the major ILO Conventions on health and safety have been ratified by New Zealand.

The Committee of Experts' annual report to the Committee on the Application of Standards is a testament to the shortcomings of the present supervisory machinery. Governments which fail to respect the voluntary system themselves provide cogent evidence of the need for more effective enforcement mechanisms.

The ILO Constitution records that the original contracting parties were moved by sentiments of justice and humanity, and it is important that this spirit remains a prime moving force as we discuss means of ensuring that the ILO can effectively discharge its important role into the twenty-first century.

Mr. BOLD (Government delegate, Mongolia) — May I place on record the Mongolian Government's acceptance and support for the Report of the Director-General of the ILO submitted to the current 85th Session of the International Labour Conference.

Mongolia attaches great importance to the role of the ILO in standard setting and the promotion of labour standards. The Government of Mongolia believes the ILO must advance labour standards in accordance with its Constitution and as an integral part of social progress of societies.

It is against this background that Mongolia has committed itself to the ILO Conventions, amongst them to four core Conventions, and almost a dozen other basic labour standards and instruments. Although Convention No. 29 on forced labour and Convention No. 105 on the abolition of forced labour have not, as yet, been formally ratified, their principles and purposes are incorporated in, and enforced by, the 1992 Constitution of Mongolia and national legislation. As a long-standing ILO member State, Mongolia firmly advocates increased acceptance and observance of the core ILO Conventions and strengthened supervisory mechanism to ensure the fullest possible compliance.

At present Mongolia is making preparations, and intends to ratify several ILO Conventions, such as Convention No. 144 on tripartite consultations, Convention No. 155 on occupational safety and health, and Convention No. 159 on occupational rehabilitation. The underlying objective of this exercise is to establish a tripartite consultation machinery and consensus-building procedure on labour protection and social security issues among government, employers' and workers' organizations.

Globalization of the world economy has created new challenges and opportunities. My Government considers that economic growth and development must contribute to the improvement of living standards and the full observance of labour standards. Hence globalization and the realization of ILO goals are interconnected. Mongolia, as a transition economy, has responded to the globalization of the world economy with its liberalization measures, namely, economic structural adjustment policy, with finances, banking, prices, trade and tax reform measures which, we believe, will lead us closer to, and will integrate us into the world market.

The social cost of internationalization of the economy has been great, for there is a strong link between economic growth and social progress, as well as social peace and harmony. It is, therefore, we assume, through realization and implementation of standards that the ILO can contribute to a world economic system based on free, liberalized trade and multilateralism.

Coming now to ILO technical assistance and regional cooperation, the Government of Mongolia wishes to thank the ILO and the Regional Office for Asia and the Pacific for the continued support and assistance they accord to Mongolia's tripartite bodies at this crucial juncture when it seeks to reform national labour standards. We are looking forward to more increased and expanded cooperation in the future, both on the international and the regional levels.

Taking this opportunity, I wish to place on record the Mongolian delegation's support for the initiative the New Zealand Government has taken, to consider at the Twelfth Asian Regional Conference to be held in Bangkok in December this year the following additional agenda item, namely, and I wish to quote, "What new directions shall the ILO take in a globalized world, and what basic reforms are needed for the ILO, and its standard-setting and supervisory machinery, to ensure that the Organization can meet its responsibility to set and deal with internationally recognized core labour standards".

In conclusion, may I wish the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference successful and fruitful deliberations.

Mr. RONNEST (Employers' delegate, Denmark) — The ILO, standard setting and globalization are certainly subjects that deserved to be discussed both in their own right and, as in the Director-General's Report, the relationship between them. But it would have been more convincing if the Director-General's Report had not focused to such a great extent on the opportunities globalization creates for the ILO as an organization, and instead had concentrated on the ILO's possible contribution to practical and effective solutions to problems related to the labour market and specifically to employment.

Discussing the ILO's future contribution to the solution of the problems falling within its area of responsibility, it is important that the tripartite structure of this Organization be respected when decisions are taken and activities planned. The ILO must of course respond to decisions taken in other world fora without the ILO's tripartite structure, but it cannot and should not follow them without reflection. It is for this Conference and the Governing Body to decide the policies and activities of the ILO.

The Report of the Director-General presents a wide range of proposals, some of which have been opposed by a number of speakers which is only to be expected as the proposals correspond to linking trade sanctions and labour standards which is an idea that has been rejected on previous occasions.

What is new is the introduction of obligations on member States and consequently on employers and workers in member States — obligations to be determined by the ILO and not following the established legal procedures in the ILO and member States. The ILO is to define a set of principles to be respected by all, the ILO is to establish a new system of supervision, and the ILO is to create a system of social labelling based on the declaration of principles.

This is not only an ambitious plan, it is also a controversial one and probably somewhat unrealistic, but it is in particular a plan described in such general terms that it is close to impossible to see what the real intention and purpose is and how it is to be translated into reality. What it will mean for the labour market, for employment and enterprises seems not to have bothered anybody.

The Report of the Director-General proposes that the ILO is to reform its standard setting, making it more effective and relevant. A reform of standard setting is certainly welcome. It is long overdue. Noting for how long the problems of non-ratification and non-adherence have been known one can only hope that the reform plan will be put into practice and that not only lip service is paid to the criticism of the present system.

Much effort should be put into an effective and precise evaluation of the social impact of the standard-setting system, as is proposed, especially its effect on employment.

Let me add that I also see an urgent need for a reform of the ILO's supervisory system, which today is not seen as unbiased, fair and equal by all ILO constituents. And until trust in the ILO's present supervisory system has been established, I see little chance of or use for an expansion of the supervisory system as suggested by the Director-General.

Mr. GATTEGNO (Employers' delegate, Israel) — It gives me great pleasure to join the other speakers in congratulating the President on her election. My congratulations also go to the Vice-Presidents.

Labour relations in Israel have for many years been based on a system of collective agreements. The good relations and the dialogue which exists between the employers' organizations and the trade union (Histadrut) have established patterns and rules for conducting negotiations, while safeguarding industrial peace. Indeed, in recent years, including the past year, there were not many strikes or labour disputes, despite the economic situation in Israel and the resulting need to dismiss workers. In the past years hundreds of thousands of people immigrated to Israel from Russia and the CIS countries. This wave of immigration is potentially able to contribute greatly to Israel's progress and consolidation. At the same time, one of the most difficult problems is to find employment for this large number of immigrants. All those concerned are making great efforts in order to create jobs for them. Large capital investments are needed for this purpose which will encourage Israeli and foreign investments in Israel and the setting up of new plants which will employ both Israelis and immigrants. This is the only possible way in which we can deal with the problem of unemployment, which exists in Israel as in other countries.

Historic changes have occurred in the recent past in the relations between Israel and the Arab States, most significantly the agreement with the Palestinians and the peace accord with Jordan.

Last year meetings took place between business persons from Israel, Jordan and other countries and we hope that these will result in joint initiatives and business which will lead to the economic development of the countries and peoples of the Middle East.

We expressed the desire of the employers, headed by the Manufacturers' Association, to assist in establishing employers' organizations in the territories, to deal with the aspects of labour relations and economics. We also held meetings on these subjects and expressed our desire to assist directly, as well as through third parties which are active in providing assistance in the area.

With regard to the delegation's report on workers in the territories, this report is anachronistic and does not apply to the state of the relations between the Palestinian Autonomy and the State of Israel, and the agreements which have been drawn up on this issue. The time has come to put a stop to the delegations. The Palestinians should be given assistance and guidance on relevant issues — vocational training, small enterprises, employers' and employees' organizations.

The ILO needs to put on a new face and to adjust to the beginning of the third millennium. In a complicated world such as ours, with rapid fluctuations, there is a need to develop proficiency and flexibility which will enable speedy adaptation to changing situations. The ILO must ensure that its experts relate to relevant issues which trouble employees' organizations, employers and States. It would have been more important to create ties and cooperation with other international organizations for the purpose of carrying out joint interdisciplinary activities and not to concentrate on the traditional subjects of Conventions, labour relations, etc.

Regarding payments to manpower and employment agencies, which is one of the subjects on the agenda of this Conference, a law was adopted last year in Israel which regulates the employment of workers via manpower contractors. The law determines that only those who hold appropriate permits may serve as manpower contractors. Permits will be granted only to those meeting the criteria established by the law, and after submission of a financial undertaking to meet all obligations towards the workers. An important item in the law determines that a manpower contractor or employment agent is forbidden to demand or collect payment in any form whatsoever from the worker in respect of services provided or reimbursement of expenses.

Despite the great importance of collective agreements and the establishment of a system of workers' obligations and privileges in such agreements over many years, it is important to point out that in recent years more and more employers and employees prefer to regulate employer-employee relations, conditions of work and salaries through "personal contracts". Whereas in the past personal contracts were signed mainly with senior workers, this type of contract has become more and more accepted at the level of skilled workers within the context of collective agreements.

The personal contract allows for worker mobility and greater flexibility in the system of labour relations, taking into account today's rapid changes in terms of supply, demand and technological developments, and the corresponding changes in needs.

It should be noted that in Israel dialogue and consultations take place at the national level on the subjects of economic and social policy. This dialogue depends on relevant issues and is not defined by law, nor is it dependent on fixed times. We are in favour of such dialogue, but at the same time we are against government intervention in the system of labour relations.

Original French: Mr. DOUALAMOU (Minister of Employment and Public Service, Guinea) — First and foremost, I should like to offer to the President and the Officers of the Conference sincere congratulations, on behalf of the delegation of the Republic of Guinea, on their brilliant election to direct this session of the Conference.

My delegation is convinced that under their able guidance, imbued with their wisdom and experience, this session will be crowned by success.

My delegation would also like to comment on the importance and pertinence of the items on the agenda for this session, to thank the Governing Body for its choice, and the Director-General and his experts for the quality of the documents proposed for our discussion.

Before taking up the Report by the Director-General, I should also like to express a few opinions which arise from the consideration of the technical questions on our agenda.

As regards the revision of the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention, 1949 (No. 96), my Government endorses the conclusions of the Officers and considers the issue an important one, given the fact that employment, in the current context of growing unemployment, requires a realistic approach.

As regards the general conditions for stimulating job creation in the SMEs, Guinea welcomes the position taken by the Officers of the Conference and supports the views expressed in the introduction and earnestly hopes that these conclusions will serve to improve the work in ILO member States, international institutions, employers' and workers' organizations, and lead to balanced economic and social development.

Contract labour is an area in which my Government is keenly interested and we have taken steps to revise the provisions of our Labour Code in order to ensure improvement in the social and legal protection of the workers concerned. This is why my country, once again, wishes to congratulate the Governing Body on its choice, and would like to thank the Director-General for the quality of the documents that he has made available for consideration.

The Director-General has also decided to focus in his Report on the standard-setting activity of the ILO; this document demonstrates his characteristic dynamism and conviction.

The elaboration of international labour standards is indeed the primary task before our Organization and is the main concern of all its Members. Highlighting the utility, orientation and adaptability of these standards to the specific situations in the member States of the ILO would be a welcome initiative.

Far from being stereotyped, legal instruments, the Conventions and Recommendations of the ILO must be daily working instruments and rules which express our will to progress in search of the improved well-being of our peoples.

No purpose is served by standards that cannot be implemented. The economic situation does not seem to be the only factor, there are also political trends, habits and customs as well as administrative structures and the development of society itself which have a role to play. This is why certain standards, which were relevant yesterday, have now become obsolete or pointless. The issues are not the same or are no longer current.

It would therefore be useful to devise instruments to suit the constituents. In this regard, I would like to congratulate the working group which has been formed. Its conclusions are most pertinent and will certainly help to update certain standards and to guide future standard setting.

If they are to be adapted to the scope of application, it is also indispensable that national legislation should be as close to international standards as possible and in putting forward new rules and regulations, the member States must take inspiration from the existing international standards while safeguarding the specificity of our individual societies. This is what my country did when in 1985 it revised the Labour Code.

We have benefited from the assistance of the International Labour Office because it is obvious that our institution cannot be content with the elaboration of standards and supervision of their implementation. The ILO must also help member States to understand these standards and to incorporate them gradually into their domestic legislations.

Our position in relation to the standard-setting activity is that there cannot be any real social progress without a solid economic base and if people live in poverty. Indeed, what significance can the standards have for the great majority of our people working in the informal sector and whose modest incomes cannot even satisfy their basic needs?

Priority must be given to economic development which, without real assistance from the developed countries and the international organizations, will be difficult to achieve. All nations should work towards the establishment of fairer and more equitable cooperation links with a view to installing the new international economic and social order for which we earnestly hope.

Indeed, the serious predicament facing the developing countries puts greater responsibility on all developed countries, in particular in relation to the least developed countries. We must consolidate the appreciable results hitherto achieved through development assistance by channelling increased resources into activities which create jobs and income in developing countries.

The standard-setting activity of the ILO is also linked to another very important issue which should not be overlooked, namely, the adaptation of the structures of our Organization.

I believe, in point of fact, that the structures of the Organization are decisive as far as the efficiency of the standard-setting activity is concerned. Even if the principle of tripartism and prior consultation with Members are satisfactory, this alone cannot ensure the success of the standard-setting activity of the ILO. The work which has already begun on the renewal of ILO structures must be pursued in order for our ideals to triumph.

In my country we very much believe in the standard-setting activity of the Organization which is for us a permanent source of inspiration. We will not spare any opportunity to improve our national standards to bring them as close as possible to ILO standards. We will promote social dialogue and hope for better participation in both economic development and in the field of human resources which is our country's greatest asset.

Mr. LOBENDAHN (Government delegate, Fiji) — It is my pleasure to extend to you, Madam President, on behalf of my delegation and the Government of Fiji, our congratulations on your election to preside over this 85th Session of the International Labour Conference. My delegation is confident that under your leadership, the Conference will be guided through constructive debates and sound resolutions in its deliberations. In that regard I am happy to assure you of the cooperation and support of the Fiji delegation in completing the tasks which face all of us here at this year's Conference.

We are happy that the Report of the Director-General is devoted to the standard-setting function of the International Labour Organization, globalization and other very important related issues. In a world that is changing, and changing fast, Fiji is convinced that the International Labour Organization has, more than ever, an essential role to play. It can help member States, whatever their level of development, to meet the challenges of an increasingly global economy. We in Fiji believe that the International Labour Organization with its tripartite structure can help shape a world community where freedom of association and free collective bargaining can flourish. That is the way to peace, and economic and social stability.

We agree that the guarantee of rights is a prerequisite for workers to be able to enjoy the benefits of globalization and we have taken note of the need to ratify the fundamental human rights Conventions of the International Labour Organization. We are currently reviewing all our labour legislation and practices, and will shortly be in a position to inform the ILO of the action we will be taking to make our labour laws more effective in dealing with present-day needs. Other labour reforms are also under active consideration, and I feel sure that this will very shortly result in a number of improvements to our current legislation. Towards this end I am personally grateful for the recent assistance provided by the Labour Ministers of Malaysia, Singapore, Queensland and New Zealand.

We acknowledge that globalization is the major feature of our age. It combines the effects of the end of the cold war, the harmonizing of the world market in goods and capital, and the rapid spread of new technologies. This is making globalization a double global phenomenon. It is global in its ever-widening geographic scope, and it also touches upon every aspect of economic and social life.

We in Fiji appreciate that the process of globalization has its down side also. In the industrialized nations it is imposing rapid and painful restructuring, with adverse effects on the employment situation. In the poorer countries, it is liable to lead to greater inequality, and is increasing the risk of certain parts of the world becoming marginalized. We must therefore learn to control the process of globalization better. It must be used in the service of people and aim at improving the quality of their lives. In that connection we need to build safeguards wherever necessary and let us also endeavour to adopt equitable ground rules and a level playing-field.

The question that is before us is how can we promote social justice in a rapidly changing world? These are the basic challenges and the axis around which debate will focus during this session of the Conference. We can no longer consider labour legislation without considering the right to work. We cannot deal with the quality of work, without having regard to the volume of work, and we cannot promote employment without protecting the rights of workers. Everybody is striving for greater flexibility and deregulation, which might result in a greater number of jobs being created but often in unacceptable work environments — conditions that often do not meet the minimum standards of human dignity.

In the meantime, we cannot assume that the world economy will abide by one set of rules, particularly in the social field. Social change is necessary and we should be prepared to abide by certain basic rules that are established with the agreement of member countries.

This is what we would call the social framework for international development that needs to be developed within the procedures of the International Labour Organization. We could start with a hard core commitment to a few international labour Conventions that all would agree to apply.

The social framework for international development could be supported through a greater use of the existing supervisory machinery of the ILO. The supervisory machinery for the application of the principles on freedom of association provides an interesting reference and experience in this area as cited by the Director-General in his Report. Under that procedure, governments or workers' and employers' organizations may submit complaints concerning violation of trade union rights by States, irrespective of whether or not they have ratified the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

The two systems I have mentioned will go a long way in both protecting the workers and ensuring a fair distribution of the benefits of globalization. I am speaking from experience, as the trade union movement in my country has on more than one occasion exploited the latter.

We in Fiji are conscious of our size and, like other small island nations, we are very vulnerable to external changes. We therefore request that our special problems need to be recognized and our shortcomings understood as, within these constraints, we are continuously working to improve matters.

My Government is a party to several fundamental human rights Conventions and we may soon be in a position to ratify Convention No. 87 dealing with freedom of association. However, we trust that the International Labour Organization will gauge our observance of its Conventions in terms of our economy and level of development.

We recognize that the social partners have to display consistent goodwill. However, we have to resort to the Pacific way of solving our problems for we believe that, taking into consideration our current economic situation and existing labour legislation, we may not at present be able to fully observe the letter of some of the Conventions we have already ratified.

I call for a balanced judgement on the activities of my Government in regard to the implementation of ILO standards. We are currently going through a very important era, a transition period when we are trying to formulate a revised Constitution, whilst our economy is trying to grapple with the global changes that have taken place over the last decade. Allow us therefore to carefully follow the path we have mapped out for ourselves. Let the ILO provide us with guidance so that at the end of the day the citizens of my country may enjoy a higher level of social justice and a better quality of life.

Madam President, in closing, I reiterate the best wishes of my delegation and Government for a successful Conference under your leadership.

Original Spanish: Mr. GOMEZ ESGUERRA (representative of the Latin American Central of Workers) — We have taken note of the Report of the Director-General and wish to state that it is indeed a very important guide for ascertaining exactly how to channel our energies in the immediate future.

Nevertheless, on behalf of the Latin American Central of Workers, I wish to express our grave concern for the true scope of globalization of the economy, since it is in essence, in the light of this new situation that in our world, and particularly in the so-called underdeveloped countries, all kinds of obstacles are being raised against workers and their organizations

The processes of modernization, privatization and so-called globalization have led to greater institutionalization of poverty, the widening of the gap between rich and poor; flexibility has made headway in our countries, trampling not only our workers and populations, but also destroying our fragile productive apparatus and subjecting our economies to the decisions and restrictions imposed by the centres of power.

With due respect, we would like to mention a few examples of the way in which the so-called globalization affects and determines the present and future of our peoples. In Guatemala, in spite of a number of peace-making efforts, the rights of workers are being violated repeatedly and in many cases violently so. The holocaust for unions in Colombia is continuing. Several of them, particularly those in the oil industries, are branded as terrorist. In Ecuador, Peru and Venezuela the rights of workers are being constantly violated and while globalization is very much in vogue, we are witnessing, with great concern, perverse development of anti-union policies which will seriously jeopardize the consolidation of democracy and peace in many parts of the world.

For the trade union movement, it is most encouraging to note the position taken by the ILO Director-General to proceed with the standard-setting activity of the ILO on some rather pressing issues, to strengthen the supervisory instruments, and to see to it that globalization does not become a mechanism which focuses its energies on economies while disregarding the social aspects of development.

Would it be possible, on the threshold of the new millennium, to build a new world founded only on the laws of the marketplace? Would it be possible to guarantee world peace in the midst of injustice? Would it be possible to speak of development while tens of millions of children are working in conditions of slavery to settle debts and under extreme exploitation? What kind of globalization are we talking about when we have millions of workers reduced to working under the scourge of the informal sector?

The challenge of our times must be faced with full responsibility if we wish to avert a holocaust.

One final thought: according to the ILO Constitution "... universal and lasting peace can be established only if it is based on social justice". Therefore, it takes only one country to fail to comply with the Conventions and Recommendations of the ILO for world peace to be threatened.

Mr. AKRAM (Government delegate, Pakistan) — We wish to express our felicitations on the election of the President of the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference. The issue before the Conference this year is an extremely important one. Some interesting statements have been made by distinguished ministers.

The ILO is a unique organization because of its tripartite structure and objectives of promoting social justice. Over the last 78 years, it has accumulated unrivalled expertise and competence.

Pakistan attaches the highest importance to its ILO membership. We have ratified 31 ILO Conventions, among which, five are the core labour Conventions. Pakistan has committed itself to participate actively in the elaboration of the Convention on the elimination of intolerable forms of child labour. Notwithstanding occasional differences of interpretation on the application of certain standards, the ILO's supervisory mechanisms have helped us in the implementation of the ratified Conventions. The Government of Pakistan will continue to cooperate with the ILO and to take full cognizance of its observations and suggestions.

We have also benefited from the ILO's technical assistance especially through its IPEC programme.

The Government of Prime Minister Nawaz Sharif is committed to the eradication of the abominable practice of forced labour and to safeguard human rights, in particular to save the young from the crushing burden of child labour. We are furthermore committed to making rapid progress towards the fulfilment of these objectives.

The Declaration of Philadelphia proclaims that "poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere". In the poorer countries we must first have the opportunity to work before we can consider improvement of working conditions. Workers in developing countries have limited choices because of the absence of real development and employment opportunities. Those in greatest need of ILO's assistance are therefore the workers in the developing countries. It is the ILO's responsibility to ensure the promotion and protection of the rights of the majority of workers through greater emphasis on generating employment, lowering unemployment and eliminating disguised unemployment.

The workers in the developing countries should be also protected from the loss of employment as a result of trade restrictions often imposed on the pretext of promoting labour standards.

Historical experience shows that higher labour standards are primarily a consequence rather than a cause of economic growth. The surest way to improve labour standards in the developing countries is through economic growth and development.

We have read the Report of the Director-General to this Conference on standard setting. My delegation associates itself fully with the statement read by the Minister of Colombia on behalf of the non-aligned countries. This has offered an alternative, more realistic and more acceptable approach to promote core labour standards.

There is no contention about the need to promote such core labour standards. In many countries conditions can, and must, be improved.

We are convinced that the first and most important step towards the implementation of core labour standards is the ratification of the relevant Conventions by all member States. Such ratification would strengthen the ILO's effectiveness and ensure the optimal utilization of its supervisory mechanisms.

We believe that the possibilities offered by the ILO Constitution for standard setting and supervision have not been exhausted. The current machinery can be put to better and more effective use through streamlining and by ensuring its impartiality and transparency.

States which encounter difficulties in the implementation of standards ought to be assisted by the ILO and the international community.

We agree that, like other institutions, the ILO has to adapt to changing circumstances. The ILO's future lies in catering to the needs of its constituents: governments, employers and workers with as broad a consensus as possible. This principle of consensus should be the driving force in all its activities: standard setting, technical cooperation and analysis. As long as it continues to adhere to this principle of consensus, the ILO will not only preserve but enhance its unique role in promoting social justice throughout the world.

Ms. ELIAS (Government delegate, Papua New Guinea) — Madam President, on behalf of my Government and the people of Papua New Guinea, I too join the others before me to extend and express our warmest greetings and congratulations on your election as President of this august assembly.

Indeed, you have done us women proud in bringing to the Chair gender balance, with such distinguished experience and qualifications of good standing, for you to guide the deliberations of this important forum to a successful conclusion.

With respect to the Report of the Director-General, we cannot help but note that globalization is here to stay. Globalization and the various forms it takes — including regional integration, growing trade liberalization and the increasingly influential role of world summits and major regional conferences — has prompted the ILO, as an institution in its own right, to take up the daunting task of re-examining its strategy and challenging the social dimensions of the issues at major international meetings, thus reaffirming the importance and significance of its mandate, particularly the standard-setting activities and mechanisms to enforce instruments to protect workers' fundamental rights.

As a small developing but democratic country, Papua New Guinea takes cognizance of the primary objectives of the ILO, which have always been to promote democracy and human rights, the fight against poverty and the promotion of equality and adequate protection of all categories of workers. Although the Director-General's Report appears ambitious, it is positive, it is appropriate and a timely universal concern.

The Report did not emphasize the risks of globalization. None the less, member States, whether developed or developing, cannot afford to deny or turn a blind eye to the background against which this Report was written. This background is one of serious and major economic and social problems throughout the world. Today, mankind is undergoing a transformation of unprecedented magnitude and speed, affecting all spheres of economic and social life.

Globalization is shaking and redefining the structures and functioning of the world economy. While we do not dispute that it offers unprecedented opportunities for all countries, and most particularly for developing economies, we cannot ignore the calls throughout the world alerting us to the risks associated with the globalization process as far as human and social progress is concerned. But empirical evidence shows the richest countries are the ones that are benefiting most, whilst the poorest countries lag ever further behind.

The social situation continues to be dominated by high levels of unemployment in industrialized economies, and unemployment is even higher in developing countries. Papua New Guinea is of no exception to this unfortunate predicament.

It is in the best interests of both the ILO and its constituents to zealously guard its continuing relevance and effectiveness. Positive measures have been taken by the ILO in initiating a series of reforms through the implementation of its active partnership policy. None the less it still remains to be seen how under such policy the ILO, in aligning its activities, will, in fact, counteract anticipated adverse social impacts induced by trade liberalization and globalization. During this transitional period, it is imperative that the ILO make a contribution towards overcoming these problems and assisting developing countries by working to strengthen our democratic institutions, including employers' and workers' organizations, systems of industrial relations and tripartism, and towards ensuring adequate occupational safety and health resources at the workplace. Ultimately, it requires maturation on the part of the ILO and its institutions, including the regional offices and officers, to be fully functioning, to foster and strengthen collaboration between member States and the ILO headquarters and regional offices. Above all, there is a need for clarity and unity of vision.

We pledge our support and confidence, in the belief that the ILO will take account of the diverse views submitted during this plenary session and the various tripartite committees on standing items of the Conference, and this will assist in the ILO's endeavour to enable the Organization to carry out its mandate fully so as to achieve its objectives and live up to expectations.

My Government cautions that the ILO must be sensitive about the advance of liberalization and globalization in our young developing economy, given the fact that we lack the competitive edge, that globalization of Papua New Guinea should not be at the expense of economic progress of the developed and newly industrialized countries, that globalization is not economic development bias, but social protection and social progress are part and parcel of the progress of globalization around the world. It is for this reason that my Government concurs with the ILO's re-examination of its Constitution, standard setting, and its approach in the application of ILO instruments by member States in this Conference.

My Government undertook a broad range of governmental reforms geared towards accommodating the demands of the structural adjustment programme, more particularly constitutional and public service reforms, to be responsive to the needs of the people, especially in the rural areas of the country.

Also, our monetary, fiscal and macroeconomic policies have very strong implications for opening up the economy, with less government intervention, to facilitate a more market-oriented economy.

For many years, Papua New Guinea has been adjusting its social and economic policies, with greater emphasis on job-creation initiatives, to absorb many young people leaving school every year, and to cope with the growing social problems associated with the high level of unemployment in our country.

My Government therefore salutes the continuous work of the ILO to develop instrumentalities for application by member States, which allow us to promote and create jobs. We appreciate the ILO's contribution in numerous ILO projects and missions to Papua New Guinea over the years.

To conclude, my Government would like to see the ILO Suva Office vigorously pursue, to fruitful conclusion and implementation, a programming mission to Papua New Guinea this year, to develop a Papua New Guinea plan of action, to coordinate all ILO activities and programmes in the country concerning the labour issues stated above. We believe that, if this initiative is followed through and implemented, it would contribute positively towards minimizing our social problems and lend support to the country's development and economic growth.

Mr. AHMED (Workers' delegate, Pakistan) — In the Name of God, Who is kind and merciful. On behalf of the Workers' delegation of Pakistan and on my own behalf I offer greetings and good wishes to all delegates and offer our felicitations to the President and Vice-Presidents on their unanimous elections.

The working class of Pakistan commends the useful work being carried out by the Director-General of the ILO and his able team and the distinguished members of the Governing Body during the year.

The importance of the ILO core standards has been stressed from time to time by all those who believe in improving the socio-economic condition of the workers, since these fundamental human rights are universal in their application. That is why the World Social Summit was upheld by all the member States, imposing the responsibility on the ILO as the leading agency in poverty alleviation and employment promotion.

Therefore, we not only urge the ratification of these core Conventions by all member States, but also their implementation in letter and in spirit in the respective States. However, the ILO has the responsibility to promote these standards, by expanding its technical assistance programme, since we have a world in which 1.3 billion people live below the poverty line, 160 million children are malnourished, and one-fifth of the population is not expected to live beyond the age of 40, due to lack of health facilities.

Millions of children have no access to education, due to the poverty of their parents. That is the reason that the Declaration of Philadelphia has emphatically declared that "poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere". The debt burden of the developing countries has increased enormously. Instead of transferring resources from North to South the reverse is taking place. At present that burden to the developing countries amounts to more than US$207 billion. The 48 less developed nations, representing 10 per cent of the world population, have halved their share of trade to just 0.3 per cent in the past 20 years. It requires international action, better trade policies, fair rules and fair terms for poor countries to enter the markets, and special action to prevent countries sliding back into further poverty, as well as peace-building efforts and debt relief. These commitments have been further reiterated in the United Nations Human Development Report of 1997.

Pakistan has recently had a new election. Mian Nawaz Sharif, the Prime Minister, has committed himself to improving workers' welfare, and to poverty alleviation and employment promotion. We had the honour to receive Mr. William Brett, Workers' Vice-Chairman of the ILO Governing Body, in Pakistan, who not only met the Prime Minister and other dignitaries but also addressed the trade union conference.

The working class of Pakistan have united themselves under one umbrella organization, the Pakistan Workers' Confederation, and has been building social alliances with other patriotic sections of society in order to tackle the socio-economic problems facing the working class and the poor masses.

The newly elected Government is required not only to govern both well and transparently, and to set an inspiring example, but also to introduce radical social and economic reforms to root out the outdated feudalistic system by introducing progressive vocational education, employment and social policies in line with the ILO Conventions ratified by the Government of Pakistan, and in particular by removing restrictions to the exercise of the right to freedom of association in radio, television, railways and the banking industry, and by strengthening tripartism. We also seek the support of the ILO in regard to the social dimension in the process of structural adjustment being carried out in our country.

Pakistan has been tackling the issue of child labour through the ILO's IPEC programme and the Sialkot Chamber of Industry has recently concluded an agreement with the ILO/UNICEF for the rehabilitation of children employed in the sports industry.

We welcome the initiatives of the ILO and, on behalf of the working class, voice our full support for them. We appreciate the role of the ILO in workers' education, employment and policy development, improving working conditions, migration, standard setting, industrial relations and the work of its branches and the International Institute for Labour Studies, the Turin Centre, the regional department for Asia and the Pacific and also the office in Islamabad.

We also welcome the Report of the Director-General on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories, and consider that more technical assistance should be given to the Arab workers and more support to the Middle East peace process.

To conclude, we wish this historic Conference every success in its deliberations to achieve a better tomorrow for working men and women all over the world.

Original French: Mr. DA SILVA DURÃO (representative of the Federation of International Civil Servants' Associations) — I am extremely honoured to address this august assembly on behalf of the 32,000 civil servants of the United Nations which the Federation of International Civil Servants' Associations represents.

At the very time that this session is being held, international civil servants are being attacked on several fronts, to such an extent that the question must be asked whether the ultimate goal is to break up the United Nations system and replace it by a hybrid system, serving private interests, where profit is the only leitmotiv.

Several times the workers of the United Nations have sounded the alarm in connection with these attacks, perpetrated or encouraged by the most powerful States which see the current structure of the United Nations as restrictive to their particular agendas.

One issue which is a source of considerable concern among employees is the process of reform the United Nations is currently pursuing. We fully agree on the need to reform the system, but reform what and for the benefit of who are the questions to be asked. If it is a matter of reforming the system in order to benefit private interests which are at best suspect to the detriment of the workers, our answer is a clear-cut no. Certain voices of authority, such as the Executive Director of UNICEF, are beginning to express concern as regards this reform. Several times we have asked to participate in the working party responsible for the reform, and have received no response. It is unacceptable that the employees of the United Nations should be marginalized from a process which first and foremost concerns them, because they will be the ones to bear the full brunt of the reform.

At the same time, a group of persons who believe they have the monopoly on absolute truth and wisdom have prepared a new code of conduct for the workers of the United Nations. This code, whose provisions recall to a certain extent the darkest days of McCarthyism, violate the workers' rights in general and their right to freedom of association in particular. There are provisions to prohibit the personnel from striking, from striving to improve their working conditions, from contesting decisions that are unfavourable to them and from communicating with the press. Such provisions are preposterous on the eve of the twenty-first century and are of particular concern to the International Labour Organization, because they run counter to all Conventions on work and freedom of association. But they are also of concern to each of us, because they constitute a serious violation of human rights.

FICSA appeals solemnly to the International Labour Conference to call on the United Nations to take the necessary measures to ensure that the new code of conduct respects the rights of workers as provided in the ILO Conventions.

A further matter of concern has been the interest expressed by the Director-General of UNESCO to create an internal tribunal in that organization on the pretext that the decisions of the ILO Administrative Tribunal are not to his liking. This reflects the trend being followed by certain decision-makers who consider our organizations as their private domain where they are free to do whatever they like, regardless of any prevailing principles or regulations, and to the detriment of the workers.

It is also inadmissible that the workers of the United Nations continue to be refused the right to negotiate their own employment conditions, a right that is however recognized in the Conventions adopted by the International Labour Conference and implemented in practically all democratic countries throughout the world. Are we, the workers of the United Nations, pariahs of society? Should we really continue to carry the yoke of antiquated provisions that are in entire contradiction with the most basic tenets of the right to work?

FICSA has on several occasions asked for a tripartite body to be set up within the United Nations system to determine the conditions of employment of the workers in that system. This body would be composed of an equal number of representatives of member States, organizations and workers. Unfortunately, our requests have so far remained unanswered.

United Nations civil servants hope the International Labour Organization will take dynamic action to defend their rights. In our view, the ILO should act as the guardian of the people, a temple whose foundations are unfortunately being increasingly eroded.

Once more, we appeal to the International Labour Conference to support the efforts of the workers of the United Nations in their daily struggle to have their rights recognized. If we do not tackle these crucial issues now, there is a danger of certain situations being imposed, not without brutality, on workers throughout the world, in the not too distant future.

Original French: Mr. CLESCA (Employers' delegate, Haiti) — Madam President, may I first of all congratulate you on your election to preside over the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference and also for the manner in which you have accomplished this task. Please be so kind as to extend our congratulations to the other Officers of the Conference who so ably assist you.

The Report of the Director-General gives us the occasion to praise the determination of the ILO for the elaboration of labour standards that are universally recognized and that are formulated in a manner acceptable to all, as well as for the supervision of their implementation. It is for these reasons that the standard-setting activity of the ILO was officially recognized by the Heads of State on the occasion of the World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen leading to their commitment to promote the ratification of the core Conventions. The role of the ILO was also clearly recognized by the WTO which, in its Singapore Ministerial Declaration, called it the "competent body to set and deal with these standards".

The employers of Haiti cannot fail to take this opportunity to denounce the action of certain special interest groups which, on the basis of so-called inquiries, are conducting a campaign of defamation against the export industry of Haiti, attempting in this way to discourage trade relations with Haiti. This is the case of the National Labor Committee (NLC), an institution based in the United States, which in January 1996 published a one-sided report questioning working conditions in the industrial sector of Haiti. However, following this accusation two fact-finding investigations were carried out, one by the labour department of the Ministry of Social Affairs, and the other by the Tripartite Advisory and Arbitration Committee, both of which failed to corroborate any of the allegations contained in the NLC's report.

In the new environment of global competition, a minimum standard of ethics ought also to be observed. The employers of Haiti therefore support the proposal of the Director-General to reiterate the basic principles of the ILO in the form of a Recommendation and to establish a tripartite follow-up mechanism. The ILO remains for us the best moral reference.

And since we are speaking of global competition, we must also stress the fact that the concept of economic globalization, while conveying much hope, also gives rise to certain concerns, both on the part of the employers as well as on the part of the workers of Haiti. Subjected to competition for which we are unprepared both financially and structurally, we consider that the international community should devote special attention to the training of local entrepreneurs, as well as civil servants, in order to promote a clear industrial and commercial policy.

Economic integration and raising the level of the least developed countries should go hand in hand. Social progress cannot be attained without its corollaries of production and employment, just as the consumer markets that are sought by the multinational corporations cannot develop in a society that is totally dependent. As the Director-General has put it, globalization cannot be left entirely to its own devices.

Ms. BALSIENE (Workers' delegate, Lithuania) — I address to the President my warmest congratulations on her election. This is a very positive element which augers well for our Conference. I should like to congratulate the Director-General and all his staff on all the work they have accomplished over the last year.

Today I have the opportunity to thank the ILO leaders, the specialists working both in Geneva and in the Budapest Office. I would like to thank the ILO specialists who acquaint the ordinary workers, trade union members and leaders with the international labour standards and national laws which regulate the rights of workers. The tripartite collaboration and the mutual understanding of the three social partners started to develop thanks to ILO representatives and the training and conferences they have organized. Only social dialogue, the common solution of problems and the coordination of interests can ensure social peace and democracy. With the help of tripartite dialogue we have managed to find solutions that are acceptable to all when addressing very acute problems and conflictual situations.

I would like to stress that the activities of all international organizations, the representatives of which we have here today, are very important and worthy of great gratitude. The ICFTU and ETUC lobby activities at the top level have the aim of raising social issues and listening to the voice of workers in the era of globalization and the concentration of capital. The experience of foreign countries where industrial relations are highly developed and where real trade union movements are a traditional feature and have achieved a great deal are very important too. Their lessons of solidarity, moral and financial support are very important for us. Their lessons help us in Lithuania to learn about real trade union activities, to defend human rights in every possible way within the framework of the law and to become equal partners with employers and the Government.

The constantly changing situation demands that trade union leaders and ordinary members be highly professional. It is not enough just to be brave and honest. It is necessary to understand law, economics and to know about the economic situation of enterprises. It is necessary to be diplomats when negotiating with employers and to be a lobbyist when communicating with politicians.

Trade unions serve their real purpose during the transition period from a planned to a market economy. They become a very important balance which does not allow human rights to be violated and helps orient the changing situation. The market economy follows the planned economy but there are no principles of democracy. As regards the national situation, it is one in which we have growing unemployment, decreasing social guarantees, and conditions dictated by foreign capital. We are integrating ourselves into a world where industrial relations, the market economy and labour culture are developed to a level incomparable with ours. It is these conditions which influence the social, economic and political life of our society and it is very difficult for the ordinary members of society to find their place during such changes.

One of the reasons for the economic decline in the countries of Central and Eastern Europe is that our societies were used to working under the planned economy system. Today it has become clear that now that Lithuanian independence has been restored, it is necessary to pay more attention to education and learning. To develop a new approach to work we need a new labour culture and to treat each worker as an individual. The majority of steps taken by our new governments were populistic and sometimes the advice of foreign experts was in contradiction with the economic conditions of our countries and with our mentalities. And now it is becoming increasingly clear that the governments of our countries must pay more attention to adult education in order to develop the market economy successfully, to enter the world markets and to create democratic societies. Perhaps this will prove an effective way of overcoming the indifference and the fear and will encourage hope and the will to take care of other people. Only then will it be possible to speak about civic society, in which a neighbour feels that it is not the same for him if you have a job or not, and if your children are hungry. Civic society must take care of itself, as well as of the fate and the situation of people in other countries.

It is a pity, but in the countries of Eastern Europe we feel the strong influence of international capital and of foreign employers, and the opinion exists that trade unions are a harmful influence on the conditions of the market economy, and it is necessary to weaken them. Such opinion stimulates employers to violate trade union rights, not to accept trade unions as equal partners and to neglect tripartite dialogue.

The changes which people in the countries of Eastern Europe face, namely the transition from planned to market economies, influence all spheres of life and all people. But there are changes in the world as well which are also influencing the industrial countries. Unemployment and poverty are growing, social guarantees are decreasing, and this proves that we are all one big family and we must solve the problems and seek solutions together.

I would like to underline once more that we appreciate the activities and the support of our colleagues. I also wish to add that despite the fact that we are a small country, according to our possibilities we are trying to help others who are weaker than we are.

I wish you success, tenacity and courage in your work.

Mr. TAMPOE (Workers' delegate, Sri Lanka) — I am the General Secretary of the Ceylon Mercantile, Industrial and General Workers' Union, also known as the CMU and my name is Bala Tampoe. Although the trade union movement in my country is divided, I am glad to state that I have been nominated by the Government of Sri Lanka as the Workers' delegate to the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference for the first time. This was on the basis of the consensus among representatives of the other trade union organizations in Sri Lanka who were consulted by the Minister of Labour and Vocational Training, the Honourable Mahinda Rajapakse, MP, in accordance with the guidelines of the ILO in the choice of Worker representatives. The other workers' organizations so consulted, and represented by advisers in this session, are the Ceylon Workers' Congress, Nidahas Sevaka Sagnamaya, the Ceylon Federation of Trade Unions, the Ceylon Federation of Labour and Jathika Sevaka Sangamaya.

I venture to think that all delegations to this session would have benefited from the Report of the Director-General on The ILO, standard setting and globalization. I also think that the Workers' delegations would support a declaration by this Conference that "even in the absence of ratification of the relevant Conventions, all member States, by virtue of their acceptance of the Constitution and the objectives and principles of the ILO" should be "bound to a minimum of obligations with respect to fundamental rights", as envisaged in the Report. I agree that these should necessarily include Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, as well as the prohibition of forced labour, including forced labour of children and non-discrimination (particularly in the form of equal remuneration for work of equal value). As the Director-General states, this would provide a constitutional basis for the ILO to act in promotion of these fundamental rights, by suitable mechanisms that would ensure not merely their ratification, but also their implementation both in law and in practice, as is required by the Constitution. He appears to consider this to be necessary for the ILO to guarantee those fundamental rights in the context of trade liberalization and globalization of the capitalist market system.

I must say, however, with due respect to the Director-General, that I do not subscribe to the view that the suggested declaration, any more than the Declaration of Philadelphia, would cause the labour power of workers in the global capitalist market to cease to be as much a commodity as are all other commodities in that market.

In any case, the history of the ILO, 50 years after the Declaration of Philadelphia, has shown that despite its tripartism, neither the governments of its member States, nor the employers represented in it, can be seriously regarded as being "social partners" of the workers in any of those States. I would think that most of the workers in the industrially developed countries have shed whatever illusions they may have had in this respect, with regard not only to their employers — be they public or private — but also to democratically elected governments, even though they may have been elected with broad trade union support. On the other hand, no one can seriously contend that the governments and the employers throughout the rest of the world today are "social partners" of the masses of the workers, who are mostly unorganized and find employment, if at all, in the ever-increasing informal sector, and who are exploited and/or oppressed in one way or another, with all too frequent violations of their fundamental rights by employers or governments.

I am sad to say that even in my own country, described in its Constitution as the "Democratic, Socialist Republic of Sri Lanka", even today freedom of association and the right of collective bargaining are not guaranteed "in law and in practice" for the vast majority of its workers in the urban, rural and plantation sectors, notwithstanding the fact that ILO Convention No. 87 was ratified in November 1995 and that ILO Convention No. 98 was ratified as far back as 1972.

The reason is not far to seek. It has been implied in the speech of the Honourable Minister of Labour and Vocational Training of Sri Lanka to this Conference on 13 June. He raised what he described as a very pertinent question — "Is there a link between inflow of foreign investment and labour laws and labour standards?"

What the Minister did not state is that the National Workers' Charter, promulgated by the President of Sri Lanka on 2 September 1995, after tripartite consultation has, despite his efforts, been withheld from legislative implementation due to open and hidden pressures upon the President and her Government from both foreign and local capitalists. They consider that even existing labour laws, such as the Termination of Employment Act of 1971, are an impediment to investment and purported employment creation. Instead of agreeing to the legislation already drafted to implement the principles of state policy in regard to employment and labour relations, as set out in the Workers' Charter, they demand an "Employers' Charter"!

On the spurious plea of "competitiveness", what is being demanded is greater "labour flexibility" and increased "productivity" in the so-called private sector, which is being extended by privatization, without regard for the rights of workers under existing labour legislation. Such rights have been secured mainly by trade union and political agitation, since Ceylon (now called Sri Lanka) became a member State of the ILO in 1948, the year in which I became General Secretary of my Union. It was in that year, too, that ILO Convention No. 87 on freedom of association and the Declaration of Philadelphia were adopted by the International Labour Conference.

In the circumstances, I would welcome whatever steps the ILO may take in pursuance of the "declaration" that has been suggested by the Director-General, if the other "social partners" represented at this Conference are persuaded to support it. I doubt this for the reason that the profit-making objectives of capitalist corporations are becoming increasingly incompatible with the human and democratic rights of working people and of global society itself today, whilst most governments act in collaboration with, or in subservience to, them.

Nevertheless, Madam President, may I wish you whatever success you might achieve at this Conference in relation to the suggested declaration on fundamental rights and the adoption of a meaningful Convention and Recommendation on contract labour.

DECLARATION BY THE PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF CHINA CONCERNING THE APPLICATION OF CONVENTIONS TO HONG KONG

Original French: The PRESIDENT (Ms. SASSO MAZZUFFERI) — I give the floor to the Clerk of the Conference to read out a declaration by the People's Republic of China concerning the application of Conventions to Hong Kong.

The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE — On 10 June 1997, the Director-General received 46 notifications from the Government of China concerning the application or continued application to Hong Kong after 1 July 1997 of international labour Conventions. These notifications will be registered as of 1 July 1997 and will ensure the continued application to Hong Kong from that date of all the Conventions which were applicable to Hong Kong until that date under declarations made by the Government of the United Kingdom, except for three, which were specifically designed for non-metropolitan territories.

Original French: The PRESIDENT (Ms. SASSO MAZZUFFERI) — Let us now resume our discussion on the reports of the Chairperson of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Original Russian: Mr. SHAKARIMOV (First Deputy Minister of Labour and Employment, Tajikistan) — Madam President, may I start by congratulating you on your election. We are convinced that, under your leadership, this 85th Session of the Conference will occupy an important position in the further enhancement of our Organization's role in securing social justice in the age of globalization.

May I also pay tribute to the Director-General of the ILO and congratulate him on his most comprehensive Report in which he analyses the problems involved in, and the possibilities for, upgrading the Organization's standard-setting activity in endeavours to live up to the responsibility the ILO bears for social progress in a globalizing economy.

The delegation of Tajikistan fully supports the position taken in his Report that the complex economic interdependence involved in the trade of goods and services and capital flows has highlighted the need for compliance by all ILO member States with fundamental social and worker rights.

Although the Republic of Tajikistan is such a young member of the International Labour Organization (we only joined at the end of 1993), we have however ratified 42 Conventions and they are now all in force. Moreover, my country has ratified six of the core Conventions mentioned in the Report and is now examining ratification prospects for Convention No. 105 on the abolition of forced labour. By virtue of our Social Partnership Act, these issues are reflected in a General Tripartite Agreement signed between the Government, trade unions and employers.

In our opinion, the Director-General draws a most important conclusion, namely that, as globalization progresses, the ILO must present to each member State guidelines which can be utilized locally and which will assist them gradually, but consistently, in moving towards their own objectives. This is particularly important for us. As you know, the Republic of Tajikistan has recently gone through the most difficult period of its whole history. In the civil war, we lost tens of thousands of people, more than 250,000 houses were destroyed, burnt and plundered, 850,000 people became refugees and forced migrants. Practically one-third of the whole population suffered as a result of this armed conflict. At the moment we have reached a new stage of political stabilization. Tajikistan is firmly advancing towards the creation of a democratic, secular State with the rule of law. The Constitution has been adopted by referendum; the President of the Republic was elected by universal suffrage, and the activities of the Parliament or "Mazlisi Oli" are in full swing — indeed it adopted the Labour Code only a few days ago. In a few day's time, President Emomali Rakhmanov and the leader of the united opposition, Abdullah Nuri, will be signing a final peace agreement with UN support. Over the next 12 to 18 months we hope to complete the work of returning our refugees to their former homes, but many of them will find destruction and have no roof over their heads because of the extremely low standard of living in our country (the average wage in Tajikistan is one-tenth of that in neighbouring countries of Central Asia). They are lacking in food and medicines of all kind; there is hunger and disease. In this context, I cannot agree with the Director-General's assertion, made in the introduction to his Report, that, as globalization proceeds, it is not so important for the ILO to act as a guarantor of global peace through social justice. We see global peace not only as the absence of international but also domestic conflict. The example of Tajikistan demonstrates that this problem remains a real one for a whole series of countries, given that, in our opinion, "global peace" and social peace are interdependent and destroying the foundations of social justice may be one of the principal causes of social tension, of acute political crises and military conflicts. It is becoming ever more important for the ILO to maintain its role as a guarantor of social peace.

Tajikistan, as an economy in transition undergoing reforms and structural adjustment, faces serious complications in selecting its priorities. The problems are particularly acute, given that the civil war sharply reduced our financial and other resources which could otherwise have been devoted to urgently needed social welfare and to securing conditions for survival.

In this respect, the Government of Tajikistan seeks to elaborate and sign an agreement with the ILO in the very near future, regarding medium-term cooperation on priority social and labour issues, covering at least the period from 1997 to 2000. We would be pleased to host a group of ILO experts for the drafting of such an agreement.

In the light of the specific social and economic conditions prevailing in our country, we need the ILO's technical assistance, particularly with regard to employment generation, training, the retraining of unemployed persons, refugees, women and young people, given that the return of refugees and forced migrants has seriously aggravated the problems on the labour market: almost half of the nation's working population is not at present engaged in productive employment and is, for all intents and purposes, unemployed. Consequently, we seek to draw upon ILO experience as well as technical and advisory support with regard to planning, elaborating and implementing programmes to develop self-employment and profitable forms of activity at a local level in the most socially and economically disadvantaged rural areas. At the same time, we would be grateful to receive practical assistance and advice on modern vocational training, and retraining methods with an emphasis on self-employment and small enterprises. We are, for instance, prepared to cooperate in the introduction of ILO methodologies regarding the module-based training of the unemployed, the development of vocational training programmes for the self-employed and profitable forms of activity at the local level, the creation of machinery and programmes for technical and material support to the self-employed; and any other ILO experience in employment generation would be of interest to us.

Madam President, I thank you for this opportunity to speak and for your kind attention.

Mr. MANOLOV (Workers' delegate, Bulgaria) — Allow me first of all to congratulate the President on behalf of the Bulgarian workers and to express our confidence in the fact that under her skilful leadership this session will achieve beneficial results.

I would like to express the Bulgarian workers' appreciation for the core issues chosen by the Director-General, namely the impact of globalization on the application of international labour standards. No country is left unaffected by this process but small countries are particularly vulnerable.

Bulgaria is now facing an extremely difficult situation. The Currency Board is planning to introduce a final measure for bringing the country out of crisis in the near future. The collapse of the Bulgarian economy in 1996 was due mainly to the Government of the Bulgarian Social Party (BSP) during this time. This inadequate economic policy may be illustrated by the following: structural adjustment was not carried out; the efficiency of the state administration was undermined, partly because of the influence of some organized criminal groups in it; privatization was slowed down and carried out ineffectively; there was a colossal outflow of capital out of the country; the bank system was in a state of collapse and this paralysed the entire financial-credit sector, as all investments came to a halt; the disastrous monetary policy resulted in a situation approaching hyper-inflation and enormous external debt, which, at the end of 1996, was more than three and a half times the GDP; the tendency to bring the economy totally under the BSP's Government cut short any business initiative.

At the beginning of 1997 the Government faced a wave of popular discontent. Thanks to the civil society's reaction and on the initiative of the trade unions, the situation was brought under control and a new Parliament was elected and a democratic Government was set up — after democratic elections.

The genuine trade unions in Bulgaria believe that a wide public consensus on the parameters of structural adjustment, legislation and the introduction of measures by the Currency Board will be a guarantee for Bulgaria's way out of crisis. We do not wish to be "the highest instance", but we insist that consultations be held with us on any measures taken in the fields of our members' direct concern — structural adjustment and employment, prices and income, social protection.

The genuine trade unions in Bulgaria are aware that one of the most serious consequences of structural adjustment — its social aspect — will be the dramatic rise in unemployment which will create considerable tension in the labour market. We shall therefore strive for the elaboration of and financial provision for preventive programmes for alternative employment in specially endangered regions, for the drafting of appropriate legislation, for encouragement of small, medium-sized and family businesses, for the implementation of privatization models that create the possibility of self-employment for the workers and for the development of vocational training, etc.

The genuine trade unions hope that a balance between prices and income will be attained. They will support the liberalization of prices of goods and services if, at the same time and in parallel, specialized and purposeful protective measures for the security of people's incomes are taken.

As regards tripartite dialogue, I would like to emphasize that although in 1996 such a dialogue did not exist in practice — during the caretaker Government's time — this has been restored under the Alliance of Democratic Forces' (ADF) Government now in power.

The BSP Government imposed its decisions without taking any account of the social partners. Under the caretaker Government's ruling, an agreement for cooperation and social peace was concluded and all of the problems were solved as a result of dialogue. Now that the new ADF Government is in power, the National Council for Tripartite Cooperation has been set up again.

I would like to mention with pleasure that the caretaker Government quickly ratified a number of Conventions which made up for shortcomings in labour legislation regarding basic labour rights. We expect that this policy will also be continued by the ADF Government.

In conclusion, I would like to thank the ILO for its active assistance in helping the genuine trade unions prepare for operating with the Currency Board. We have always counted on the ILO and its bodies to help us with any complex and numerous problems during this transitional period.

Finally, I would like to underline one more time that at this session, we are in the presence of the necessary conditions which will make it possible to promote the Organization's role in the development of democracy, guarantee the observance of human rights and provide incentives for economic development as a prerequisite for social justice.

Mr. GARAMSZEGI (Employers' adviser, Hungary) — After six years it is an honour for me once again to address the International Labour Conference on behalf of the Hungarian employers.

The year 1991 was the first after a period of 40 years of a state economy in which Hungarian employers joined the community of free employers. In the six short years since then, Hungary has become a leading emerging market economy, in a setting of firmly established parliamentary democracy.

Today, with the most ambitious privatization programme in the region largely completed, private business is creating more than 70 per cent of the total GDP. The Budapest Stock Exchange has become not only the most rapidly growing stock market in the region, but also the world's highest performing stock market in 1996. The country has created the basis of future sustainable growth.

In Hungary, tripartism has become the driving principle of labour issues via the National Council of Interest Conciliation, which is the forum of dialogue and decision-making between the Government, employees and employers.

On the part of the employers there have certainly been many developments as a result of rapid changes in the economic and political environment. These changes must be reflected in the structure and competencies of the tripartite system.

One such major issue is to ensure that the representation of free enterprise employers' interests and those of the public sector are suitably differentiated. The Hungarian employers are willing to, and able to, strengthen their representation and develop further the tripartite system of interest conciliation without the need for any external intervention either within the country or on an international scale.

The ILO has played an outstanding role in resolving labour issues internationally. We Hungarian employers are deeply interested in the ILO and in increasing its effectiveness. To fulfil the mission of the ILO, it is our opinion that the support to employees' and employers' sides should be proportional and balanced.

The prestige of Conventions adopted by the General Conference of the ILO should also be strengthened. Conventions can only be effective if they are ratified by the majority of the member countries. Whatever their advantages in theory may be, the General Conference should not strive for Conventions which cannot be put into practice in the majority of the countries due to their deferring levels of development. Such Conventions may undermine the credibility and prestige of the Organization.

We are confident that through such an approach the International Labour Organization will succeed in overcoming the issues which it is currently facing and will be capable of fulfilling its historic role, which — in the context of the globalization of the world economy — is of ever greater importance.

Original French: Mr. SAVARD (representative of the International Confederation of Executive Staff) — On behalf of the International Confederation of Executive Staff which I have the honour of representing here, I would like to offer the President our congratulations on her election to lead the International Labour Conference.

The International Confederation of Executive Staff has, as members, trade unions and associations of executive staff in several countries of the world, notably in North America and soon, we hope, it will also be called upon to speak on behalf of executive staff working in South America.

With regard to freedom of association, the rights to organize and to collective bargaining, the situation of executive staff differs from one country to the other. This difference is observed, first and foremost, in regard to the level of ratification by member States of the two basic Conventions, Nos. 87 and 98.

All the countries of the European Community, without exception, have ratified one or the other Convention. On the other hand, among the three countries which have signed the North American Free Trade Agreement, only Canada and Mexico have ratified Convention No. 87, and the contrast is even more striking. In the case of Convention No. 98, neither Canada, Mexico nor the United States have ratified it, nearly 50 years after its adoption by the ILO.

This first difference can undoubtedly be explained by a second. There is a crucial difference as regards the state of national legislation on freedom of association and the right of collective bargaining for executive staff, depending on whether we are looking at the legislation in the European or those North American member States.

In most countries of the European Union, like other workers, executive staff enjoy the rights and protection accorded under the two basic Conventions, namely, Conventions Nos. 87 and 98. Executive staff, however, are not represented in the same way in all European States. This matter is settled either by law or by agreements concluded with the representative trade unions.

In certain countries such as Austria, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Spain, Sweden and the United Kingdom, executive staff are treated exactly like other employees and do not have any specific representation, as is the case in France, Belgium, Germany, Italy and Denmark.

Our Confederation considers that where it exists, recognition of executive staff as a specific group has certain advantages. It therefore invites member States, where such recognition has not yet been acquired, to conclude agreements with the associations of executive staff on the means of promptly achieving this, in conformity with the ILO Conventions.

In the countries which have signed the North American Free Trade Agreement the position of executive staff is quite different from that of Europe. Firstly, not having ratified Convention No. 98 or having ratified only Convention No. 87, the North American member States have legislation and labour policies generally considered as being in line with the Conventions. This is true only in the case of non-executive staff since these legislations and policies seek to make a special case out of executive staff. They treat executive staff separately, not so much by giving them a specific representation, but rather, by formally denying them this possibility.

Now, nothing in Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 and in their interpretation by the competent organs of the ILO justifies such an exclusion. It is wrong to claim that executive staff are not workers as interpreted by the ILO Conventions and therefore are not entitled, like any other employees, to recognition and legal protection of freedom of association and the right to collective bargaining.

None of the member States concerned would wish, I am sure, to see itself described as simply paying lip-service to the basic ILO Conventions, among other instances, at the World Summit on Social Development in Copenhagen. It is important therefore that these Conventions should be followed by firm action and, in this respect, the Confederation appeals to the member States concerned to add their voices to those who have already ratified the basic Conventions of the ILO, which are Conventions Nos. 87 and 98.

Even before ratification, and I insist on this point, the Confederation asks these member States to grant their executive staff legal protection in the areas of freedom of association, the rights to organize and to collective bargaining, exactly as they already grant to non-executive staff.

More specifically, as far as the application of standards is concerned, the Confederation shares the view that the supervisory mechanism of the ILO is in dire need of strengthening with respect to the application of the fundamental human rights, particularly to freedom of association and the right to collective bargaining. The Director-General in his splendid Report recalls that the standard-setting action of the ILO is necessarily, if not exclusively, to be carried forward by the member States. In this respect, the Confederation agrees that the Organization should exceed the limitations inherent in the fact that it is dependent on the work of its member States.

Whether we are referring to the reports submitted annually under article 22 or to the implementation of Conventions ratified, or reports of Conventions which have not been ratified, we believe that the submission of reports is still desirable. However, we feel that the ILO should reinforce its methods of studying these reports and subject them to more critical analysis.

Finally, the International Confederation of Executive Staff, unreservedly supports the proposed solemn declaration aimed at reaffirming universal respect for the fundamental rights of all categories of workers, including executive staff, and respecting their specific status. It hopes that all member States will accept this project and agree without hesitation to the establishment of the necessary mechanism for its implementation.

Real social progress, without distinction of any kind, is a basic condition for this. The executive staff we represent fully subscribe to this concept.

Original Norwegian: Mr. OPSETH (Minister of Local Government and Labour, Norway) — I consider it a great honour to have the opportunity of addressing the International Labour Conference for the first time. Let me begin by congratulating the President on her election to preside over this important event.

The Report of the Director-General on the standard-setting activities of the ILO provides new ideas on the subject. We find these ideas, which will contribute to a strengthening of the standard-setting role of the ILO, are of great interest and particularly important in these times of the globalization of the world economy and the liberalization of world trade. The Norwegian Government believes that globalization will give all ILO member States an opportunity to improve job creation and working conditions, regardless of their level of economic development. We also believe that special measures are required to help the least developed countries take advantage of the opportunities offered by globalization.

Both the World Summit for Social Development at Copenhagen and the WTO Ministerial Conference in Singapore confirmed the mandate of the ILO as the primary international agency dealing with fundamental labour standards. The development of improved labour standards and better supervisory machinery will be important means enabling the ILO to fulfil this mandate.

Considerable progress has already been made in reforming the ILO's standard-setting system. One of the first visible and tangible results is already before the Conference this year in the form of a proposal to amend the Constitution to authorize the Conference to abrogate Conventions which it considers obsolete. My Government attaches great importance to this and other reforms now on the agenda of the ILO. Reforms are, in our view, of the utmost importance for the continued vitality of this Organization.

A worldwide acceptance and application of the core labour standards should be a principal and prime objective for the ILO and the member States. To achieve this, my Government is going to support the idea of the Director-General to produce a solemn declaration for possible adoption by the Conference in 1998. This declaration should establish that all member States, by virtue of their acceptance of the ILO's Constitution, and the objectives of the ILO, should be bound by a minimum level of respect for fundamental workers' rights, even if those member States have not ratified the relevant Conventions. A draft text for such a declaration should be brought forward as soon as possible, and should be discussed at the November meeting of the Governing Body of the ILO.

The issue of social labelling should also be further examined by the ILO. A system of social labelling would constitute an important source of information for consumers of imported goods. We think this could contribute to a greater awareness of how and by whom a product has been produced. For example, consumers should be able to read from a label that child labour has not been used in the process of manufacturing that product. The question of how feasible and effective such schemes are should, however, be analysed before any concrete proposals are brought forward.

I should also like to avail myself of this opportunity to express my Government's satisfaction with the Director-General's Programme and Budget proposals for 1998-99. Both the contents and the way in which these proposals are presented have been enhanced. We are satisfied with the savings on administrative costs, and we appreciate the fact that the programme now focuses more adequately on priority issues. We certainly hope that this positive trend will continue.

In conclusion, may I once again emphasize the need for a renewal of the ILO's activities when it comes to both drafting and enforcing standards. The more ambitious plan of establishing new mechanisms to strengthen the universal application of core workers' rights should also be developed without any further delay. I express the hope that genuine progress may be achieved on this issue for the benefit of the world of work as a whole.

Original Spanish: Mr. ATANASOF (representative of the Latin American Union of Municipal Workers) — The Latin American Union of Municipal Workers is taking part for the second time in the International Labour Conference, which in 1996 recognized it as a non-governmental organization, entitled to take the floor in this important tripartite event for the world of work. The Director-General's Report before this session stresses the need to concentrate its analysis on the alternatives designed to reinforce the standard-setting activities of the ILO in the current era of economic globalization.

We agree with the document submitted to us on the need to achieve a certain balance between economic and social progress. Otherwise economic progress could lead to an increase in inequalities and marginalization. Unemployment, lack of social protection, the tensions and resentment caused by the widening gulf between rich and poor, constitute a serious threat to social peace and a fearful challenge for democracy in the region.

To this end, we think that attention should be concentrated on the following two aspects. Firstly, the eradication of unemployment and, secondly, a less concentrated, less backward, in short a more equitable distribution of wealth. To achieve this we must reject orthodox remedies imposed by recalcitrant neoliberal remedies calling for greater labour flexibility and unlimited trust in the beneficial effects of the free market. We must therefore stress the role of policy which is no other than to change things for the better; the role of the State, which is to carry out a regulatory function and by using these instruments properly make "a market economy with a social conscience" a reality.

We think that it is possible to have a policy which, at the same time as controlling inflation, gives rise to growth with proper employment. Unemployment and poverty are, in the final analysis, the consequence of the State's abandonment of its regulatory functions. The market, without state control, ends up foreshadowing a social structure ruled by social Darwinism with the consequences of fragmentation, inequality and environmental and social deterioration. This I think has been well expressed by the chief candidate for the presidency of my country, Argentina, who summed it up in the following succinct terms: "for the wealthy the market, for the poor the State".

Development should be based on the well-being of the people and not on the efforts of the majority to shape macroeconomic indicators, the fruits of which will only be enjoyed by privileged minorities. Development based on deeper inequality, increasing poverty and the social marginalization of the majority is not sustainable. Unemployment, social marginalization and the fragmentation of labour markets in the region are the result of policies which favour international integration based on a reduction of labour costs and the over-exploitation of human resources.

This strategy, very widespread in the developing countries, in addition to the inequalities which it causes within each society, as I have already mentioned, places the globalization process at a crossroads. We have to regulate the fluxes generated by free trade so that they benefit all, before protectionism becomes the buzz-word.

In this connection, I feel it is important to declare myself in favour of the idea of a social clause as a mechanism to ensure the implementation of basic standards in respect of labour, human and social rights.

It is not a matter of promoting rules which affect the legitimate development strategies of countries on the basis of their comparative advantages. It is a matter of stopping the exploitation of human beings and environmental pollution being defined as such. There are basic rules which should constitute the nucleus of the social clause: freedom of association, collective bargaining, the elimination of child labour and forced labour, equality and non-discrimination. These are basic rules and principles which if breached deserve to be rejected and sanctioned by the international community using effective mechanisms.

To truly create the utopia of a market economy with a social conscience, we believe that a vital first step is to reaffirm the ILO's standard-setting activity and to reinforce the application of its standards, a view which we share with the Director-General.

From this standpoint, as part of the legislature of my country, I have personally presented bills calling for the ratification of the Termination of Employment Convention, 1982 (No. 158) and the Home Work Convention, 1996 (No. 177), both issued by the ILO.

We consider that between the welfare state and a total lack of state involvement, there should be a return to the state as arbitrator, which exercises control over the excesses of uncontrolled capitalism and limits excessive wealth through taxation which is then used to protect health, education and to lower unemployment.

In this connection we consider most auspicious the British Labour Party's recent initiative to establish a tax to be applied to privatized former state enterprises to finance, on a budget of $8,000 million the integration of 250,000 young persons per year into the labour market. Initiatives such as this promote the regulatory function of the state in a market economy and reflect a change of approach.

In the framework of the struggle against unemployment and the transformation of the labour market as a result of the introduction of new forms of production, I must mention the controversial issue of reduced hours of work.

Two clear facts remain which are beyond controversy: firstly that we are living in a world in which the technological revolution is calling for the substitution of human work, and secondly that the population growth indicators, in global terms, are escalating out of the reach of employment creation possibilities.

The question must therefore be asked whether in order to imagine a future where there is full employment, it is reasonable to envisage that people would work less hours.

Nevertheless, in an increasingly globalized world the idea of a general reduction in working hours in only one country would imply a comparative loss of competitiveness. This is why we are on the threshold of a global debate in order once again to address the issue of the capacity of the State to regulate the overwhelming forces which accompany global development, and this must be undertaken from a global perspective.

In short, to avoid the prophecy of "a society of workers without work" coming true, we have to tackle this problem as soon as possible. To do this we have to design and promote international cooperation to ensure forms of worldwide regulation of development, and to work within each country to ensure a rational and balanced use of time and resources.

With regard to the Latin American municipal sector, we confirm and repeat the denunciations made in our first statement to this Organization at the previous session of the Conference. In our region there is insistence to impose a municipal approach which, in keeping with neo-liberal ideas, aims to privatize all the public services, the majority of which are clearly the responsibility of the municipalities.

The logical consequence of this is a considerable increase in the cost of essential community services where attempts are being made to minimize, at a cost to the workers; this interferes with the guarantee of employment stability, reducing salaries, unilaterally altering working conditions, increasing unemployment and aggravating the social crisis, the magnitude of which is evidenced by the outbreaks of the most destitute, not in the form of organized violence, but instead, the product of desperation and indignation, in a form that could be likened to an anthill being uncovered.

It is no mere coincidence that one of the most important American newspapers, the New York Times, is voicing concern and sounding the alarm about the serious risks associated with "wild capitalism" in Latin America.

To conclude, we reiterate the request we made here last year that the governments of the Latin American countries be called on to make provision for the necessary resources to ensure respect for the public sector; the effective implementation of ILO standards, especially those relating to security in employment, freedom and respect for trade union activities and protection to those who exercise it; and the protection of workers.

Mr. HOFF (Employers' delegate, Norway) — This speaker has one strong motivation — to help to make the ILO perform better, to help the ILO to become a more result-oriented organization and to help to improve the ILO's position in the eyes of its Members and the public. In other words, to make the ILO more attractive.

The ILO stands on two legs, mainly technical cooperation and standard setting. The technical cooperation leg is probably of high quality. Even so, we shall try to improve it — the Governing Body, the constituents and the Office — in constructive cooperation.

As for the standard-setting leg, however, we are faced with considerable problems and challenges. Now let us be frank. Several ILO standards are out of date. Scores of ILO Conventions have not been ratified and — what is worse — they are ignored by those countries which they were meant to help. Working methods in the Governing Body and the Conference are such that much more often than not we have conclusions of poor value for real life.

I venture to point to a few examples. First, the selection of items for the agenda of the Conference. We must control our appetite for new issues. A proposal for a new instrument should satisfy the need for usefulness and have wide support. If not, we will be guilty of killing the ILO from within.

Second, the reaching of conclusions: it has become the habit of the ILO over many long years to revert to voting. We vote in the plenary and in the committees. Sometimes voting can be defended, of course, but far too often in this Organization voting becomes a primitive method of forcing one's will on a big minority or on one of the other groups. In dealing with labour issues, this is nothing but shooting ourselves in the foot. What is more, we all know it. We know it from experience in our own countries. We know that negotiations that end in agreement are the only ones that guarantee respect and a loyal follow-up in everyday working life. The Workers and the Employers know this, and Governments, mostly, as well.

So the key word is consensus. Let us enter a new phase of ILO standard setting in the spirit and practice of consensus and let us avoid voting each other down.

Third, decisions on Conventions: again, let us be honest to each other. An impressive number of governments vote for Conventions in the Conference plenary — Conventions they never intend to ratify, or even try to ratify. Now and then, one suspects governments of rallying behind the workers when in Geneva and supporting the employers when back to real life at home. This bad habit must be stopped. We had better make another effort to establish a link between voting here and ratification at home.

I appeal to our colleagues from Africa, Asia and Latin America to give strong signals on what sort of Conventions they need, and how the Conventions should be tailored to suit them, and to enable them to ratify them.

I hope that the ILO gets itself out of playing useless games, in particular the one where European constituents turn Convention production into vicious circles of self-satisfaction. This is of little or no use to those workers of the world, who really need our full support.

Fourth, on the revision of standards, one main danger for ILO standard setting is that these Conventions are partly out of date. They become irrelevant for modern politics and modern working life. The ILO becomes marginalized. Therefore, let us proceed at full speed to the revision of Conventions, particularly the important ones and, above all, the core Conventions, which will be an embarrassment if they are not fully in line with contemporary legal thinking.

I will give a fresh example. Norway, my country, was condemned half a dozen times in the last few years by the ILO, with reference to the Convention on freedom of association. The Norwegian Supreme Court ruled, on 10 April 1997, that it is the principles ratified and the legal practice in the country that matter, and not the static interpretations made so often by a committee of the ILO. We will see more of this if the ILO does not move into our own time.

Let me now finish with a few words to our colleagues on the Workers' benches. You can trust us in our effort to bring standards up to date without risking a loss of your achieved basic rights.

Ms. PERLIN (Government delegate, Canada, on behalf of the IMEC group) — May I begin by congratulating you on your election, Madam President, and for the effective way that you are conducting the proceedings of this Conference.

This statement sets out common views of IMEC, and a number of Central and Eastern European and other governments, reiterating elements contained in ministerial statements. It is based on four key considerations: first, a commitment to the provisions of the ILO Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia, and the basic principles of tripartism and voluntarism; secondly, a recognition that basic workers' rights transcend local conditions and are inherent in the constitutional obligations of ILO membership; thirdly, a belief that globalization provides an opportunity for improved living standards, job creation, and working conditions, whatever the economic level of a country; fourthly, the conviction that the ILO must provide an effective multilateral framework for attaining social progress, while respecting the right of each nation to define the content and priorities of that progress, according to its level of development.

The Director-General is to be congratulated on his Report. It provides new impetus and scope for the ILO's work in adapting its normative activities to the demands of a globalized economy. It is welcome for the following reasons:

(a) The World Summit for Social Development and the WTO Ministerial Meeting in Singapore reaffirmed the responsibility of the ILO to set and deal with core labour standards. The ILO must now demonstrate that it can respond credibly to international expectations.

(b) Global standard-setting activities must not be diminished but qualitatively improved, and the components of the system — that is production, application and evaluation — require better balance.

(c) There is a need for a comprehensive examination of normative activities within the ILO constitutional base and means of action. Streamlining and adaptation of existing mechanisms, rather than creation of new machinery, is the preferred approach.

(d) The proposals rightly complement work under way in the Governing Body on standards revision, core labour standards, supervisory procedures, empirical research and analysis of the social dimensions of trade liberalization, and relevant reforms to the Governing Body and the Conference.

The Director-General's suggestions deserve considered attention, but should be taken forward in different time-frames.

For immediate action, in the November Governing Body, the Director-General should present three documents: first, a work programme incorporating proposals in the Report, with ongoing work.

Second, a draft text of a solemn declaration, which would not imply constitutional amendment, for possible adoption at the 1998 Session of the Conference. It would be a definitive statement on principles of core labour standards, which were endorsed by world leaders at the Copenhagen Summit and agreed in the Governing Body. Simultaneously, with this draft text there should be a procedure for monitoring and promoting application of the declaration. The procedure should aim at constructive ways of assisting compliance through mobilizing ILO means of action, including technical cooperation. The Governing Body will also wish to examine other options in the Director-General's Report, to strengthen the universal application of workers' rights.

Third and finally, proposals for easily implementable suggestions should be prepared for November, such as revisions to questionnaires, a code of good drafting practices, and better selection of topics for Conference discussions.

In the short term, three proposals should be further developed: first, evaluation procedures to assess standards against their intended objectives and against their impact on other ILO objectives, such as employment. Evaluations should identify impediments to implementation and to ratification, a key factor for universality of application. Lessons learned should be applied to standards revision and to future standard setting.

Second, enhanced use and monitoring of autonomous recommendations, as a potential instrument for guiding national policy within an international framework. Recommendations can be more responsive to local conditions.

Third, a proposal, with resource implications, for work on consolidation of standards by thematic groups.

Two proposals require further reflection and analysis, first, an ILO Social Progress Report, to monitor advances in social conditions at the national level within a globalized economy, as a possible future discussion item for the Conference.

Secondly, voluntary social labelling and codes of conduct are gaining interest in many countries. Questions remain, however, on the feasibility and effectiveness of such schemes. It is premature, therefore, to develop specific proposals prior to further analysis and dialogue in Governing Body fora.

These proposals complement current work in the Governing Body on improved promotion, monitoring and implementation of core labour Conventions, based on an analysis of shortcomings in the existing machinery.

Mr. MOLOPO (Minister of Labour and Employment, Lesotho) — Madam President, allow me to join other speakers before me in congratulating you and your Office for your unanimous election to guide the deliberations of this 85th Session of the International Labour Conference.

Allow me also to congratulate the Director-General for his choice of the topic for the general discussion which, I believe, has come at the right time. This is due to the fact that, as has been pointed out, the world's economic, political and social environment has been transformed tremendously, bringing with it new challenges. Interesting challenges have been presented by the Director-General in his Report on the issue of standard setting, globalization and the role of the ILO.

It is our opinion that the liberalization of trade and economic growth ought to have a social dimension. We believe, as pointed out in the Report, that globalization and the realization of the ILO objectives are inherently interdependent. We therefore endorse the notion that standard setting ought to remain within the domain of the ILO (rather than the WTO) as was agreed in the Singapore Declaration.

It is indeed imperative that fundamental social values be taken into account for globalization to be sustainable in any way. These values form the basis of the ILO Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia. They are also significantly reflected in the core Conventions of the ILO. This, to me, emphasizes the fundamental role of the ILO's standard-setting machinery. For that reason we fully support the move towards strengthening the supervisory machinery of the ILO as a means of maintaining the balance between trade liberalization and the social dimension.

We applaud the campaign for ratification of the core Conventions which, as I pointed out earlier, reflect the fundamental values necessary for sustainable economic growth and worldwide liberalization of trade. Lesotho has so far ratified three of the seven core Conventions and those are Conventions Nos. 29, 87 and 98. I am pleased to inform you that the process of consultation with the social partners on the issue of ratification of other core Conventions has begun in Lesotho. We are currently working on this important issue together with the Southern Africa Multidisciplinary Team, and envisage ratification of additional core Conventions by the end of this year.

The point cannot be over-emphasized that the social dimension to globalization and economic growth as a whole cannot be realized without the existence of constant tripartite consultation at the national level. Although we in Lesotho have not yet ratified Convention No. 144, our Labour Code reflects the principles set out therein and have established tripartite consultative bodies which meet periodically. Convention No. 144 has also been put on the table by the tripartite forum for consideration, for ratification by the Government.

I wish to express my Government's gratitude and appreciation to the Director-General and his Office for the technical cooperation that has been extended to Lesotho. I wish to express my Government's and my own personal gratitude to Ms. Chinery-Hesse, the Deputy Director-General responsible for technical cooperation, for having visited my country in November last year to personally assess the performance of the ILO-assisted projects. During that visit a number of other areas for assistance were identified. These included the strengthening of the labour movement in Lesotho, as well as capacity building within the Ministry of Employment and Labour.

I wish to inform you that considerable progress has been achieved on the programmes that have been initiated with the assistance of the ILO. The project on the strengthening of the Factories Inspectorate has been highly successful and has inspired my Government's continued desire to host a subregional project for occupational safety and health.

The programme on employment policy formulation and labour market analysis is also progressing commendably and is essential for Lesotho, especially in the light of the alarming rate of unemployment in the country. Allow me to express our deepest gratitude to the ILO for its assistance in this regard.

We are further grateful for the assistance received in the area of social security. Most of the groundwork has been laid down for the implementation of a national social security scheme by the ILO, and arrangements for the continuation of assistance will be made in due course.

Allow me to also commend the ILO for its ongoing involvement not only at the national but also at the subregional and regional levels. Subregionally, the ILO has shown keen interest in the SADC programmes involving employment and labour. Regionally, I wish to make particular reference to the Fifth Meeting of African Employment Planners which was held in Pretoria this year. The meeting, which was held at the initiative of the ILO, was very successful and came up with important conclusions aimed at alleviating the problem of unemployment in Africa.

I also wish to commend the ILO for its activities in the field of migration, especially with regard to initiatives that have been developed and recommended for the protection of migrant workers who are amongst the most vulnerable of workers. This is an area of great concern to us since we export a lot of labour to a neighbouring country.

Last but not least, I wish to express our gratitude to the ILO for assistance rendered to us, particularly with regard to capacity- building within the Ministry as a whole. We believe that this will greatly enhance our ability to comply with our obligations as a Member of the ILO, and enhance our developmental efforts in the country.

I wish to conclude by stating my Government's commitment to uphold the principles and aspirations of the ILO.

Original French: Mr. GLELE (Employers' delegate, Benin) — I would like to join all the previous speakers in saying, on behalf of the employers of Benin, how happy we are to have Mrs. Keltošová preside over this session of the Conference and also to convey to her our warm and sincere congratulations. We would also like to congratulate the Vice-Presidents, one of whom is a distinguished colleague of ours, whose many and varied qualities we have always appreciated and which she has generously put at the service of the Employers' group. I am referring to Ms. Sasso Mazzufferi. We are proud to see her elected to this position.

No one can remain indifferent to the great political and economic changes which are occurring at the end of the twentieth century, least of all, this great Organization of ours which is the very embodiment of mankind's social conscience.

Throughout the world we have witnessed a revival of interest in democracy in the countries of black Africa and in Eastern Europe. These political changes are occurring gently in some countries and with considerable violence in others. The globalization of the economy implies a need for constant adaptation and adjustment. We do not have a choice. We have no option but to fall in with this implacable course of events on this planet of ours, otherwise we will be left behind.

In social terms, these changes all have their consequences. Employment issues are becoming ever more acute and have become the focus of concern for all human communities throughout the world. All this implies the need to adapt the standard-setting activities which constitute the legal basis of all our activities in this Organization. Indeed, it constitutes the very vocation of this great Organization, the ILO, within the family of the United Nations.

There is therefore every reason to congratulate the Director-General on his clear-sightedness and the wise choice he made in selecting the theme for this year's Report placed before the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference for our discussion and study.

A few years ago, on this very rostrum, we suggested that an inquiry should be conducted among member States to identify the reasons for a certain reluctance to ratify some Conventions, including the most fundamental ones, such as the Conventions on freedom of association, the right to organize, prohibition of discrimination, forced labour and others, the idea being to get the ILO to review its standard-setting policy. Today, we are gratified to note that the endeavours undertaken by the Director-General and his staff have been successful, not only as regards the ratification of a large number of Conventions but that these endeavours have also led to a plan to evaluate existing instruments and to engage in some deep thinking on future needs. From what I hear, the general consensus on this matter appears to be in favour of a certain measure of flexibility. In this process of reflection, account must also be taken of the specific circumstances prevailing in each individual member State of the ILO and the trend should be towards the drafting of Recommendations and some greater selectivity in producing Conventions.

On the subject of the social clause, we are also most gratified by the common position adopted by our respective countries at the WTO Ministerial Conference in Singapore, which really put things into perspective.

Social issues fall within the bailiwick of the ILO and the World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen confirmed and strengthened the ILO's remit when it comes to these issues.

As for the general conditions to foster the setting up of small and medium-sized enterprises and the promotion of employment, here too we must take into account the great diversity which prevails in our different countries in order to avoid the pitfalls of clichés and standard solutions.

In countries which only just embarked upon the path towards democracy, whose economies are such that the small and medium-sized enterprises still rely on a great deal of involvement on the part of their governments to help promote small and medium-sized enterprises, much work needs to be done to improve the institutional, legislative and regulatory context which will allow small and medium-sized enterprises to flourish in these countries and thereby to create jobs. This can only be done, at least as far as the developing countries are concerned, if there is a strong political commitment on the part of governments to this end.

Once again we would like to thank the Director-General for having given us an opportunity to address these burning issues which are of such great interest to the people in our countries.

(Ms. Keltošová takes the Chair.)

RECORD VOTE ON THE RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE ARREARS OF CONTRIBUTIONS OF CAPE VERDE

The PRESIDENT — We shall now take a record vote on the granting of permission to vote to Cape Verde — which as you know, failed on Wednesday, 11 June through lack of a quorum — to the Dominican Republic and to Djibouti. In accordance with article 13 of paragraph 4 of the ILO Constitution, the Conference may, by a two-thirds majority of the votes cast by the delegates present, permit a member State in arrears to vote if it is satisfied that the failure to pay is due to conditions beyond the control of the Member. In accordance with article 19, paragraph 5, of the Standing Orders of the Conference, a record vote is required.

We shall begin with the record vote on the resolution concerning the arrears of contributions of Cape Verde.

(A record vote is taken.)

[The detailed results of the vote will be found in a separate section of this volume.]

The result of the vote is as follows: 380 votes in favour, 2 against, with 1 abstention. Since the quorum of 251 and the two-thirds majority of 255 were attained, the resolution is adopted.

(The resolution is adopted.)

RECORD VOTE ON THE RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE ARREARS OF CONTRIBUTIONS OF THE DOMINICAN REPUBLIC

The PRESIDENT — We will now proceed to the record vote on the resolution concerning the arrears of contributions of the Dominican Republic.

(A record vote is taken.)

[The detailed results of the vote will be found in a separate section of this volume.]

The result of the vote is as follows: 385 votes in favour, 1 against, with 5 abstentions. Since the quorum of 252 and the two-thirds majority of 258 were attained, the resolution is adopted.

RECORD VOTE ON THE RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE ARREARS OF CONTRIBUTIONS OF DJIBOUTI

The PRESIDENT — We shall now conduct a record vote on the resolution concerning the arrears of contributions of Djibouti.

(A record vote is taken.)

[Due to a technical fault, the detailed results of the vote are unavailable.]

The result of the vote is as follows: 390 votes in favour, 1 against, with 2 abstentions. Since the quorum of 252 and the two-thirds majority of 261 were attained, the resolution is adopted.

(The resolution is adopted.)

FIRST REPORT OF THE CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT AND STANDING ORDERS COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION, DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT — Now we will proceed with the first report of the Constitutional Amendment and Standing Orders Committee, which you will find in Provisional Record No. 10.

Mr. SHINGUADJA (Government delegate, Namibia; Chairperson and Reporter of the Constitutional Amendment and Standing Orders Committee) —The Committee's report before you today proposes for adoption by the Conference an amendment to the Constitution of the International Labour Organization designed to introduce an important new tool to facilitate the task of the Organization.

In bringing up to date the body of international labour standards the number of Conventions adopted by the Conference since 1919 is now approaching 200 and the number of Recommendations is similar. Inevitably, as with national laws, some of these instruments have become obsolete because conditions have changed since they were adopted or they have been overtaken by events which render them irrelevant.

The purpose of the proposed amendment is to empower the Conference to abrogate a Convention if it appears that the Convention has lost its purpose or no longer makes a useful contribution to the objectives of the Organization. Its presentation to you today has been preceded by lengthy and careful preparation by the Governing Body over several sessions. For a full understanding of what is involved, I recommend that you read Provisional Record No. 1 and the first report of our Committee, Provisional Record No. 10.

I do not propose to enter into the details of the subject but will leave this to the Employer Vice-Chairperson of the Committee who took an active part in all the preparatory stages of the amendment at the Governing Body and has a complete grasp of this important and technically complex subject.

The amendment to the Constitution is accompanied by draft amendments to the Standing Orders of the Conference, which lay down the procedure to be followed for the abrogation of a Convention. The Conference is invited today to agree to the preliminary adoption of the amendment to the Constitution, which will be followed by a record vote, and to adopt provisionally the amendments to the Conference Standing Orders, it being understood that their adoption will be effective only following the final adoption of the constitutional amendment.

I would like to thank the two Vice-Chairpersons of the Committee, Mr. Funes de Rioja for the Employers and Mr. Ahmed for the Workers, for their invaluable support in conducting the work of the Committee to a successful conclusion. In the same vein I would like also to thank the secretariat and the Legal Adviser for their valuable technical input during the Committee's debate.

Original Spanish: Mr. FUNES DE RIOJA (Employers' adviser, Argentina; Employer Vice-Chairperson of the Constitutional Amendment and Standing Orders Committee) — It is an honour for me to submit the proposed amendment to the Constitution and the consequential amendments to the Standing Orders, in whose drafting I have been directly involved as spokesperson for the Employers' group in the Governing Body's Working Party on Policy regarding the Revision of Standards, in the Governing Body's Committee on Legal Issues and International Labour Standards and in this Conference Committee itself.

These amendments are one of the most concrete, most symbolical fruits of the process of reform undertaken since the 75th anniversary of the ILO to give a new direction to our Organization's standard setting.

As the Chairperson, Mr. Shinguadja, has said, the purpose of the proposed constitutional amendment is to enable the Conference to abrogate obsolete Conventions.

Any amendment to the Constitution is, of course, a solemn moment, but this does not mean that it is impossible. It is just one of the means at the Organization's disposal to bring its standard setting up to date.

Regarding the background of the amendment, the idea of a reform of this kind is not new but goes back to the very beginnings of the Organization. The fact that the Constitution does not cover the entry into force and various other details of these Conventions, which are halfway between a universal labour code and international contract agreement, means that so far it has been impossible for the body which has enacted the Conventions also to abrogate them, inasmuch as it was not empowered to do so by the Constitution.

The palliatives used hitherto, such as the procedure for revision dating from 1929 involving the inclusion of standard final paragraphs or the suspension of the requirement to report on their application, are not enough, legally speaking, to terminate the existence of these obsolete instruments.

From the doctrinal point of view the whole issue was thoroughly examined at the end of the 1920s, both by the Governing Body and in the Conference Committee, when it was considered that the simplest, most pragmatic and definitive solution was that embodied in the instruments before us today.

The best way of handling this exercise has been weighed very carefully in the Governing Body and Conference Committee, and this with a twofold objective in mind: that a decision to abrogate a Convention should follow the same procedure as for its adoption (discussion by the Governing Body, preparation of a questionnaire by the Office, submission of a report for discussion by the Conference, etc.); and that the decision should be accepted from the time of its discussion by the Governing Body right up to its adoption by the Conference, so that it cannot be taken without the support of each of the groups. These guarantees are embodied in the proposed amendments to the Standing Orders of the Conference and the Governing Body resulting from the constitutional amendment.

The only point I would like to make about these amendments to the Standing Orders is that once they are adopted they should be immediately applicable so that we can withdraw Conventions which are not in force or Recommendations considered obsolete.

Of course, their application to Conventions that are in force will need to await the entry in force of the proposed constitutional amendment.

Finally, the Governing Body's unanimous endorsement of the proposed amendment and the procedural guarantees attached to its implementation suggest that ratification of the amendment should not pose any problem.

I would like to make the point that the amendment is very much in the interest both of the member States and of the Organization, in so far as it will lighten the administrative burden of supervising the application of those Conventions that the Organization considers obsolete and enable them to concentrate their efforts on instruments that can help further social progress.

To sum up, I shall use the expression employed by the Government delegate of Switzerland, who said that the amendments to the Constitution and Standing Orders are a valuable tool for cutting off the dead branches of the Organization's accumulated standards, to the extent that we all agree that they are dead branches.

When the idea was first mooted in the 1920s, the ILO had barely 30 Conventions. Now there are 200, and as many Recommendations. That is why the Governing Body felt that the moment had come to give the Organization the means of restoring to our standards the homogenous character that its founders intended.

As always in the ILO, our dialogue was based on the search for consensus, which means compromises on all sides, so that we can apply by consensus an instrument that had been approved by consensus.

Finally, it bears witness to the leadership and representatives of those who worked on this decision, inasmuch as the Conference confirms the agreement reached in the Governing Body by an expression of the political will of its constituents.

I would like to thank the Chairperson and Reporter, Mr. Shinguadja, the Vice-Chairperson and Worker spokesman, Mr. Ahmed, and the Legal Adviser, Mr. Maupain, for all the work they have done. I trust that you will be able to vote in favour of the proposed amendment.

The PRESIDENT — The report is now open for discussion. If nobody wishes to take the floor we shall move on to the adoption of the report, i.e. the summary of the Committee's discussions, paragraphs 1 to 25, and the Committee's recommendation in paragraph 26 concerning the proposed amendment to article 19 of the Constitution, to enable the Conference to abrogate obsolete Conventions, and the consequential or related amendments of the Standing Orders, articles 11 and 45.

May I take it that the Conference adopts the report?

(The report is adopted.)

PRELIMINARY VOTE ON THE PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO ARTICLE 19 OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANIZATION

The PRESIDENT — We shall now conduct the preliminary vote on the proposed amendment to article 19 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization.

The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE — Since this vote "by show of hands" is being cast electronically, according to article 19, paragraph 16 of the Standing Orders "the individual votes cast by the delegates shall be accessible during the sitting at which the vote is taken, but only the final result of the vote shall be announced and recorded". This means that, contrary to the record votes taken earlier and to be taken later on the Programme and Budget, the details of this preliminary vote on the constitutional amendment will not be published.

(A vote is taken by show of hands.)

The PRESIDENT — The result of the vote is as follows: 389 votes in favour, 4 against, with 3 abstentions. Since the quorum of 257 and the two-thirds majority of 263 were attained, the proposed amendment is adopted.

(The amendment is adopted.)

PRELIMINARY ADOPTION OF THE AMENDMENT TO ARTICLE 11 AND OF THE NEW ARTICLE 45BIS OF THE STANDING ORDERS OF THE CONFERENCE

The PRESIDENT — The Conference is now invited to adopt the amendment to article 11 and the new article 45bis of the Standing Orders, it being understood that the approval today is subject to a record vote on the amendment to the Constitution. With this proviso, may I take it that these amendments are adopted?

(The amendment to article 11 and the new article 45bis of the Standing Orders are adopted.)

The amendment to article 19 of the Constitution is referred to the Conference Drafting Committee which will meet immediately after the vote on the Programme and Budget. For this purpose I will be joined by three members of the Constitutional Amendment and Standing Orders Committee, Mr. Cartier, Government member, Mr. Funes de Rioja, Employer member, and Mr. Gray, Worker member. The Conference Drafting Committee will also undertake a final review of the amendments to the Standing Orders which have just been provisionally adopted by the Conference.

RECORD VOTE ON THE RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE ADOPTION OF THE PROGRAMME AND BUDGET FOR 1998-99 AND THE ALLOCATION OF THE BUDGET OF INCOME AMONG MEMBER STATES

The PRESIDENT — As announced at yesterday morning's sitting, when we examined the Second report of the Finance Committee of Government representatives, we shall now take a record vote on the resolution concerning the adoption of the Programme and Budget for 1998-99 and the allocation of the budget of income among member States, which you will find in Provisional Record No. 14.

[The detailed results of the vote will be found in a separate section of this volume.]

I am pleased to announce that the result of the vote is as follows: 379 in favour, 0 against, with 2 abstentions. Since the quorum of 257 and the two-thirds majority 253 were attained, the resolution is adopted.

(The resolution is adopted.)

I have received a request from the Government delegation of the United States to give an explanation of the vote. I give the floor to Ms. Anderson, Government adviser, United States.

Ms. ANDERSON (Government adviser, United States) — It is an unusual occurrence when a member

State asks for the floor to explain an affirmative vote on the ILO budget. After all the budget is, necessarily, the culmination of a long process that involves much discussion and debate. But a complete explanation is important if our fellow Members are to understand the context in which the major contributor has made, and will continue to make, decisions about budget matters in international organizations.

The United States is committed to remaining a strong and active member of the multilateral system, including the International Labour Organization. We recognize our treaty obligations to meet our assessments and arrears. But these obligations must be sustainable over the long run if the United Nations system is to remain healthy. Some Members have cited increased demand for services as justification for increasing resource levels. It is true that there is much to be done and much the ILO can do in order to promote social justice and help ensure sustainable development. But these activities cannot command unlimited resources. Indeed, resources available to national governments are declining, and by logical extension resources for international organizations are also declining.

During these ILO budget negotiations, the United States argued for a budget reduction of 5 to 9 per cent because of our firm belief that such a reduction could easily have been achieved without damage to the core programmes and activities of the Organization. We offered many ideas about where cuts could have been made and I have no doubt that other delegates, if they searched their hearts, could find equally compelling examples. The final result of our negotiations, a reduction of just 3.75 per cent in constant dollar terms, was a disappointment to us. We are very concerned that our failure to come fully to grips with budget realities during this cycle will come back to haunt us in the next.

Our decision on whether to support this budget was a close call for us. In the end, our decision was swayed by a recognition that the ILO has made some (albeit modest) progress towards budget discipline in the last two years. We see this reduction as a first step towards achieving a sustainable budget level for the ILO. It is not yet enough but we are at least moving in the right direction. We also want to encourage other organizations in the United Nations system to match and exceed the progress achieved here.

Secondly, we based our decision on the understanding in this Organization that reform is a continuous process. We are confident that within the tripartite structure we can continue to work on reforms that increase the effectiveness of programmes, the efficiency of administration and, as an added bonus, will cut costs.

As a mark of his commitment to the multilateral system, President Clinton has requested essentially full funding during the coming fiscal year for the United States assessed contributions to international organizations. He has also proposed an ambitious plan for payment of United States arrears to the United Nations and the other organizations of which we are a Member. If this effort is to succeed, and we are optimistic that it will, President Clinton must be in a position to demonstrate to the United States Congress that the United Nations system has taken concrete and meaningful measures to reform itself to bring budgets down to sustainable levels.

I believe it is important for Members to understand that reform of the ILO is vital, not for the sake of pleasing those within the Organization who are advocating it but for the long-term health of this Organization. If we do not move forward we will surely move back. We do not have the option of standing still.

Therefore, in casting the United States Government's vote in favour of this budget, we are casting a vote of confidence in the continued ability of the ILO to adapt to changing economic conditions and to remain at the centre of international discourse on improving the lives of working women and men.

The PRESIDENT — It only remains for me to thank the Chairperson and Vice-Chairpersons and members of the Finance Committee for their fine work.

The PRESIDENT — We shall now resume our general discussion.

Original Spanish: Mr. DE ARBELOA (Employers' delegate, Venezuela) — May I congratulate the presiding Officers on their election and especially my compatriot, fellow countryman, Federico Ramírez Léon, President of the Venezuela Labour Federation, whose election has been a well-deserved recognition of the Venezuelan workers' democratic traditions and their attachment to tripartism.

The short time left obliges me to be very brief about a very few points which we believe to be vital.

In his Report we were very happy to see that the Director-General recognizes the importance of revising the whole process of ILO standard setting. In this way, we agree with those who have maintained over many years in this forum that it was inappropriate to promote new instruments, and that it would be better in place of them to revise very carefully those standards already in existence, giving the Recommendations a more transcendent nature in accordance with conditions and realities of each country.

We have in the past taken the line, and we firmly repeat it now, that the proliferation of ILO instruments has unfortunately in many cases led to the pouring out of new legislation and promotion of these standards when they in fact include features already rejected or discarded by tripartite committees of the ILO. As a result the experience has been totally negative and counter-productive. This way of operating, which violates the sense and the spirit of the tripartite process, far from stimulating the creation and promotion of employment in countries like mine, produces totally contrary results when rigidities and obstacles are reinforced and convert themselves into a fertile field for the growth of unemployment, the informal economy and, thereby, the marginalization and delinquence of people. This is unacceptable.

Thus we agree fully with the Director-General as to how desirable it is to ensure that Conventions which correspond to fundamental rights and which are the essence of tripartism are universally ratified and applied and that the ILO concentrates on ensuring that this is so. Here we share our Government's and our workers' sector's concern and disagreement with any proposal for a "social label" which would be yet another barrier to the freedom of international trade.

It is satisfying for my delegation to be able to point out on this occasion that, thanks to the stimulus of the mechanisms of social dialogue and of the ILO multidisciplinary technical teams, and the efforts of our worker and employer sectors, we have succeeded in my country in making historical advances and progress towards revising and updating our labour legislation, which at present is an obstacle to further investment, job creation and better salaries, while also impairing safety and health. This has led us to tripartite agreements signed by the social partners for the revision of social benefit schemes and updating the whole system of social security. We are confident that this exemplary message, which is being institutionalized by Venezuela, will act as a catalyst to obtain the investments we need to contribute to the development of our country and the wider achievements of our Government's macroeconomic plan, which is known as "the Venezuela agenda", and are happy to salute its objectives.

In accordance with this, we hope that our Government will promote, through true tripartism, yet further indispensable changes and amendments to improve and update labour legislation in Venezuela, following the recommendations of the Governing Body of the ILO, with regard to the demand presented by the International Organization of Employers and Fedecámaras in 1991. We are happy to confirm that our new Minister of Labour, Dr. Maria Bernardoni de Govea, has already taken a few steps in that direction and we hope that she will bring new life to and implement the achievements we had hoped to obtain through this, in terms of investment, creating employment, creating new firms, improving salaries, reduction of informal labour, calming of social tensions, and so on.

Thus we cannot close without referring to the absolute necessity for the Governing Body to deal unequivocally and very precisely with our member States and help them to observe the obligations which so many of them are violating in the composition of the tripartite delegations which must come to these Conferences. If they continue to violate obligations in this way, using economic limitations as an excuse, we are putting tripartism in danger, because delegations, especially those from countries far away from Geneva, are unable to bring technical advisers, who do very important work. It is incompatible to proclaim tripartism at the same time as not fulfilling their obligations, and we hope that in effect concrete and immediate steps will be taken. We hope that the reform proposed by the Standing Orders Committee will solve this once and for all.

Mr. JENNINGS (representative of the International Federation of Commercial, Clerical, Professional and Technical Employees) — I address this Conference on behalf of FIET, the global trade union organization for staff in commerce, finance, industry, services, hi-tech and professionals. Over half of our 11 million members are women and we are delighted that a woman has been elected President of the Conference this year. I bring five messages.

First, that FIET supports the Director-General's Report. The backlash against globalization will be stronger unless the application of core standards and the supervisory mechanism to enforce them are strengthened. There are too many rogue governments and rogue businesses in today's global economy. As the Dow Jones index hits new highs the disparity in wealth has never been so wide in the United States of America. This is a global trend. The Director-General is justified in proposing to examine how wealth is being distributed. Perhaps then we will see the extent of the irrational exuberance in stock markets. The WTO Conference in Singapore voted to respect core labour standards and to further develop relations with the ILO. The two kilometres that separate the two offices in Geneva sometimes feels like the longest two kilometres in the world. FIET would like to see a much more productive working relationship between the ILO and the WTO.

Secondly, we welcome the initiative on social labelling. FIET represents tens of millions of retail staff and we know that consumers are asking more questions about the conditions under which goods are produced. Social labelling can apply to nations, to products and to individual enterprises and FIET is ready to work with the ILO on this initiative.

Thirdly, we support the work of the ILO on child labour. The IPEC programme has now recognized the need to work more closely with trade unions, and in FIET we want to get joint union and employer projects off the ground in all continents to end child labour in the supply chain.

Last year, with the participation of the Deputy Director-General of the ILO, an agreement was negotiated on child labour with FIFA. During next year's World Cup finals in France we will want to examine compliance with this agreement as we would like to seize the occasion to examine progress on the IPEC project in Sialkot, where many of the soccer balls are produced. In 1999 we have the Rugby World Cup, and in the year 2000 the Sydney Olympics. The sporting community should support our campaign. Michael "Air" Jordan is a sporting hero — we would now like to see "fair Jordan", the man who refuses to fly on "baskets" made by sweatshop labour.

The Director-General has seen the need to take the message to schools and to children themselves, and FIET, with the support of IPEC, was delighted to sponsor a performing arts weekend at the La Chat school here in Geneva with 16 European schools on the theme of child labour. This initiative is being followed up with materials and education curricula for wider dissemination in the global community.

My fourth message is addressed to today's global businesses. The tripartite declaration on multinationals is now entering its third decade. FIET would be delighted to give a positive label to those who practice and do not just pay lip-service to the declaration. Today, FIET has either signed or is in negotiation with almost 200 global companies to introduce works council agreements. We want each of these companies to be labelled good corporate citizens by complying with the tripartite declaration.

However, too often global businesses show an astonishing lack of sensitivity and judgement in their industrial relations. A strike at the Hong Kong and Shanghai Bank in Jakarta is more than one year old. The company is victimizing the strikers and shows no willingness to begin a dialogue to settle the matter. The Ministry of Manpower looks the other way whilst the bank, that has lent money to the Minister's business, contravenes basic labour standards. We can only stamp their label with a reject sign. In Harare, Zimbabwe, the Standard Chartered Bank is now conducting a witch-hunt against its staff who undertook strike action. Their label should also be stamped "reject". We also reject the new policy of the Government of Nigeria which has made contact between unions and their internationals illegal, and that of Pakistan where last week we learned that union activities are banned in banks during office time. Let us see how we label labour relations practices in Hong Kong on 1 July 1997.

My final comment, is an appeal to the ILO to give more attention to new areas of economic activity. Your Salaried Employees' and Professional Workers Branch must be strengthened. The ILO must do more in the labour markets of the 21st century. The symposium on multi-media this year was a step in the right direction. This is why the discussion on contract labour this year is so important — it shows how the ILO through dialogue can address new working relationships in today's labour market. In this sense we also look forward to the adoption of a Convention on temporary employment agencies.

Madam President, we support the adoption of the report.

Reports of the Chairperson of the Governing Body and of the Director-General: Discussion (concl.)

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT (Mr. KHALIL) — In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! Let us now continue the discussion of the Reports of the Chairperson of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Mr. ADIYA (Workers' delegate, Mongolia) — First of all, I would like to extend the warmest greetings of the Mongolian workers.

Social, political and economic reforms began in 1990 in Mongolia. The transition to a market-oriented economy still goes on. We have attained a certain amount of progress in the sphere of economic liberalization, the development of pluralism and respect for human rights and freedom. However, we acknowledge that the economy of Mongolia faces many difficulties and hardships. People's living standards are certainly low and poor, the unemployment rate is high and a quarter of the entire population is living below the poverty line. Given these circumstances, Mongolian trade unions focus priority attention on minimizing the negative consequences of the transition period for the working people.

There is no doubt that it is highly important to establish a sustainable tripartite mechanism for the enforcement of labour standards to reduce unemployment and eliminate poverty and to guarantee fundamental human rights and freedom.

The Confederation of Mongolian Trade Unions strongly supports the discussion of all the items on the agenda of this 85th Session of the International Labour Conference because they are vitally important for the improvement of workers' living standards. The Report of the Director-General submitted to the current session of the Conference, which presents ways and means of promoting and strengthening the core ILO standards and which discusses the future standard-setting activities of the Organization, deserves a great deal of interest. We fully agree that it is high time to enhance the ILO supervisory machinery on the application of Conventions in the context of a globalized economy. Mongolia has ratified nine ILO Conventions, among them four core Conventions. Ratification should be followed by effective implementation of the Conventions. In our country a number of cases have been registered of violations of ILO Conventions.

We intend to take all the necessary measures to make the Government of Mongolia ratify the rest of the core ILO Conventions on the prohibition of forced and child labour, namely, the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) and the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138). Trade unions, as workers' representative organizations, must strengthen solidarity action against violations and ignorance of internationally recognized ILO standards by governments. Today, it is crucially important for all the tripartite constituents to make the utmost and best efforts for the implementation of the declaration drawn up at the World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen.

Negative consequences arising from the transition economy directly affect the workers' social and economic interests. In the transition economy countries, unemployment and poverty have become acute social problems.

Now, in Mongolia the registered unemployment rate is 7.6 per cent of the overall labour force. Therefore, we consider the item on the agenda entitled "General conditions to stimulate job creation in small and medium-sized enterprises" an increasing recognition of the important role of small and medium-sized enterprises and the promotion of economic growth and development.

Finally, may I pay tribute to the ILO for the valuable and generous assistance rendered to the Mongolian trade unions for the purpose of educating and training the Mongolian workers.

Original French: Mr. COLCEAG (Workers' delegate, Romania) — On behalf of the Romanian Workers' delegation, I would first of all like to congratulate you on your election to the presidency of the Conference this year.

The Workers' delegation of Romania wishes to explain our position with regard to certain ideas and concepts set forth in the Director-General's Report. Our view is that the liberalization of trade and economic growth will not inevitably lead to social progress and equality of opportunity, and will not necessarily reduce social exclusion and poverty. Liberalization may well make things worse for many workers.

The Report is, we think, is excessively optimistic about this. The Social Summit in Copenhagen and the Ministerial Conference in Singapore emphasized the importance of workers' fundamental rights, that is, freedom of association and collective bargaining, a ban on forced labour, including that of children, and non-discrimination. In the present context of economic globalization and freedom of trade, it is incumbent upon us to recall the importance of respecting basic human rights and for example the right to employment and the right to earn enough to allow a decent standard of living.

Making reference to the Central and Eastern European countries, amongst which is Romania, we observe that the social implications of economic globalization and the liberalization of trade have to be added to the consequences generated by the more or less radical reforms now in the process of being completed. In Romania, the present Government is applying a radical and accelerated programme of economic reforms, the costs of which are borne by the population, with major social implications, among which are the decrease in real wages, and in spending power, and loss of jobs by massive redundancies.

One of the conditions imposed by trade liberalization — the immediate reduction of import taxes — has had the short- and medium-term effect of making it more difficult for Romanian enterprises to compete internationally, which brings with it further social implications, first and foremost of which is a further reduction in jobs. This is why we consider that in the present context of economic globalization and the liberalization of trade, respect for workers' rights concerns only the basic rules of the game and should allow the development of social policy that takes account of national possibilities and of the principles and rules set forth in social security standards.

Now we are far from achieving a parallel between economic and social progress that was expected from liberalization. Hence we support the efforts made by the ILO to reinforce the real impact of international labour standards so that all workers may profit equitably from the fruits of globalization.

The Romanian Workers' delegation supports the establishment of a social label machinery to be awarded by the ILO. This system should, we think, contain at least the following elements. First, it should encourage and support the countries which make concerted and tangible efforts to ensure fair distribution of the costs and benefits of economic development, and to promote the equality of opportunity for their citizens in accordance with the constitutional principles and objectives of the ILO. The International Labour Office, the other international bodies and other member States could, for example, support the efforts made by giving mutual assistance and by technical and financial cooperation.

Second, it should support and coordinate the efforts made by the social organizations like the workers' organizations, consumers' associations, NGOs and enterprises, to introduce and to ensure respect in practice for the labels, charters and codes of conduct which guarantee that conditions of production are in accordance with the ILO labour standards.

In supporting the idea of a social label, we draw attention to the proposal made by the Workers' group with regard to the introduction of social clauses that incite employers to observe standards and if necessary to punish violations in a multilateral or non-protectionist framework.

The Workers' delegation of Romania supports the Director-General's Report when he says that "merely to 'take a break' from standard-setting", that is to say no to further new standards, is not acceptable.

We believe that globalization, increased competition and new technologies call for fresh standards and the revision of existing ones. With regard to the type of standards, we are against any attempt to promote Recommendations rather than new Conventions — for the simple reason that governments and employers do not take Recommendations seriously since they are not obligatory — unless the Recommendation helps to supplement or add to the background of some particular Convention.

Finally, we consider that there should be a report by the ILO on the supervisory machinery and the possibilities offered by technical assistance. Before concluding I would like to offer my thanks to the ILO for the activity of their experts in Romania up to the present time and to hope that this work will continue on a broader scale.

Original Spanish: Mr. ZAVALA-COSTA (Employers' delegate, Peru) — I am once again pleased to address this tripartite labour forum on the occasion of the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference. I warmly greet all my fellow participants in the name of the National Confederation of Private Employers' Associations of Peru.

The Report of the Director-General on standard setting by the ILO at a time of globalization is excellent. It invites us to reflect on the policy of standard setting of our Organization and, at the same time, on another crucial and related topic, the creation of productive employment, which is undoubtedly another priority which should be the focus of ILO activities in the years ahead.

It is essential to have a new pragmatic policy of standard setting which will bolster the effectiveness of the ILO, revising and updating the standards that have become too detailed or too rigid to be applied in many countries, or which curb the creation of employment. We recognize the important function of the international labour Conventions and Recommendations, but the proliferation of non-ratified standards which affect a limited number of people has weakened their credibility. We should not decide a priori on the adoption of Conventions, rather, in accordance with the principle of subsidiarity, we should elaborate international standards only when absolutely necessary, and accord priority to those issues on which a consensus is likely to be reached. To that end, it might be worth our while to modify the questionnaires used in preparing the work of the Conference and hold consultations with the secretaries of the groups to anticipate the problems which might arise. The Recommendations should not be considered as being supplementary to the Conventions, but, rather, they should be regarded as having a value of their own since they adapt themselves to various situations and do not present the same problems of interpretation and application. The word "standard" should not be synonymous with "Convention".

We also believe that it is in the interests of the ILO constituents to take into account the specific proposals, such as those made by the International Organization of Employers, to assert the standard-setting role of the ILO in facing the challenges of the next millennium. The Governments should therefore not vote in favour of a Convention if they do not believe that they can ratify it. The current supervisory mechanisms should take advantage of identifying the items to be revised, and this would greatly facilitate the ratification and correct application of the instruments. It would also increase the number of required ratifications which, in turn, would take into account the increase in the number of ILO member States.

Furthermore, it would also help ratification if it were easier to denounce Conventions, since it would prolong the period during which they may be denounced. Finally, we welcome the introduction of mechanisms for denouncing Conventions which have lost their purpose or which no longer contribute to the achievement of ILO objectives. The elimination of obsolete texts will, without a doubt, improve the image of the ILO.

No national or international legislation is untouchable but they must always be adapted to the changes taking place, or those which are about to take place, within a more flexible and pragmatic legislative framework which does not stop, but stimulates growth and economic development. The protection of the fundamental rights of workers must remain one of the basic objectives of the ILO. This is of great importance at the moment and is at the root of discussions on the social consequences of the liberalization of international trade. As the Director-General says in his Report, "Today, nobody can claim that developing countries are not entitled to the advantages they derive from their wages and levels of social protection which are comparatively lower".

"But if their approach is to be formalized", as the Director-General notes, "it presupposes the universal respect of certain fundamental human rights of workers: freedom of association and collective bargaining, the prohibition of forced labour, including forced labour of children, equality of treatment and non-discrimination, and the minimum age of employment." In that sense it is up to the ILO to exert its influence decisively on all member countries, including those which have not yet ratified the Conventions, as promised by the Heads of Governments who participated in the World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen. We must also remember that the value of those fundamental rights were also recognized in the WTO Ministerial Declaration in Singapore, which categorically rejected the notion of a social clause, reiterating that the ILO was, "the competent body to set and deal with these standards ...".

In conclusion, allow me to take this opportunity to express our satisfaction at the recent solution in Peru of the so-called hostage crisis, which began with the invasion of the residence of the Japanese Ambassador in Lima by a group of terrorists from the Túpac Amaru Revolutionary Movement on 17 December last year. We particularly want to express our appreciation as employers for international solidarity with our country, and we must praise the courage and boldness of the Chavín de Huantar emergency rescue operation which, in 40 minutes, dealt with the whole drama of the hostages. We do of course profoundly regret the loss of 17 lives, including that of the magistrate of the Supreme Court of the Republic and who is now a national hero.

As employers from Peru, we reaffirm our vocation to live in peace without yielding to any from of blackmail against the State by terrorist groups.

Original French: Mr. DIARRA (Minister of Employment, Public Service and Labour, Mali) — I should like first of all to associate myself with the congratulations expressed to Mrs. Olga Keltošová, Minister of Labour, Social Affairs and Family Affairs of the Slovak Republic on her brilliant election to the presidency of this, the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference.

I should also like to congratulate the other Officers of the Conference. I am quite sure that with their skill and experience they will guide our work to a successful conclusion. I should also like to take this opportunity to thank the Governing Body of the ILO and the Director-General for the excellent quality of the reports which they have produced.

At the 83rd Session of the International Labour Conference already, on the agenda item relating to labour policies in a global economy, I had expressed the ardent wish that peace and social order which are essential to economic growth in our countries, should not be destabilized for the sake of improved economic prospects through unbridled deregulation of the labour market which could lead to social tension and confrontation with unforeseeable consequences.

This approach has fortunately just been reaffirmed by his Excellency Alpha Oumar Konaré, President of the Republic of Mali who, in his inaugural address on 8 June 1997, began his second term of office with a dual commitment to reinforcing the social front and overcoming poverty. Convinced "that there is no social peace where injustice and inequity exist", the President of the Republic of Mali believes that the improvement of the economic situation will be meaningless in and of itself unless it serves the promotion of social well-being.

This is eloquent of the great interest which the Government of the Republic of Mali takes in the Report of the Director-General which is entitled The ILO, standard setting and globalization. This standard-setting work must be maintained because it is the very raison d'être of our Organization, which seeks to maintain universal and lasting peace through the promotion and development of social justice.

The improvement of labour conditions, protection of the life, health and dignity of workers should be the permanent goals of the ILO. Development of world trade in goods and services and growing integration of financial markets, undoubtedly constitute today the cornerstones of social progress. However, as the Director-General states in his Report, the greatest risk of globalization is that international competition could lead to progressive deterioration of labour conditions at world level.

Therefore, standard setting for this development of the global economy is a necessity for the international community to provide a firmer basis for the recognition of the fundamental rights of workers. Such promotion of good labour conditions should be as broad as possible in order to provide more concrete social improvements as globalization develops.

The Government of Mali remains convinced that the ratification of international Conventions is essentially a question of the political will of each of the member States of the ILO. Therefore, the ILO has the duty of stressing the fundamental issues and assisting member States in charting their policy and implementing them by continuing to improve their own mechanisms to monitor application of Conventions.

Promotion of small and medium-sized enterprises and the role which these can play in stimulating growth and creating jobs are of paramount importance. To overcome unemployment and poverty we must first develop and implement favourable employment policies.

The development of small and medium-sized enterprises is one of the most credible alternatives in the fight for employment. This is why, very early on, Mali initiated, with the assistance of friendly countries and institutions, many projects geared towards the promotion of SMEs and SMIs which enabled us to create thousands of direct and indirect jobs.

We have to create a context favourable to the development of this sector which potentially can bring remunerative employment by removing the obstacles such as difficult access to real estate ownership and to credit, unsuitable trade and customs policies, and insufficient training, etc.

We must encourage quality and productivity which are the keys to growth and competitiveness in general and for SMEs/SMIs in particular.

Like many developing countries, Mali has adopted in the context of its economic reform programme, a number of institutional measures to liberalize the labour market. We have created private employment agencies and temporary employment agencies which now carry out work previously done by the public employment service.

Since this reform, contract labour is on the increase and as far as existing legislation is concerned, although contract workers are not subject to any discrimination in my country, none the less, in practice we experience genuine difficulties. Many of these agencies which are still in their infancy, frequently experience difficulties in properly fulfilling all their obligations towards their employees. In addition, some of those involved are not sufficiently professional and this compromises quality of service rendered.

Because of all these problems, our States need to make a great effort to adapt rules and practice in order to improve conditions of work for contract work and guarantee equality of treatment and sufficient social protection.

This legislation to provide the necessary protection to the workers will, however, need to be sufficiently flexible to take account of the specific situation in each country.

In concluding I should like to endorse one of the wishes formulated by the Director-General in his Report. I too wish to see the ILO invigorated in its standard-setting work at the dawn of this third millennium already before us.

Mr. APPIAH AGYEI (Workers' delegate, Ghana) — I bring you fraternal greetings from the working people of Ghana.

Let me start off by joining those who have spoken before me in congratulating you and your able Officers on your election to preside over this 85th Session of the International Labour Conference. Under your wise leadership we are convinced that the affairs of this Conference will be steered to a very successful end.

The topic for this session, which is dear to the hearts of all working people of the world, has come at an appropriate time when the campaign to intensify the promotion of human and workers' rights globally has been acknowledged.

The renewed interest shown in promoting the ratification and application of international labour standards has been largely motivated by the significantly poor and morally unacceptable labour conditions prevailing in many countries.

Problems of child labour and inhuman conditions, of bonded labour, physically taxing work processes, discrimination in access to employment in the workplace, and inadequate returns for work still prevail. A lot, therefore, still remains to be done in terms of achieving the primary objectives of the ILO. The problem has been compounded by the global communications network which has brought to the fore and to public awareness appalling labour conditions, such as the exploitation of child labour and the harsh labour processes of women workers in export processing zones.

Some of the products of these developments are exploitative labour practices and the political manifestation of popular anxieties over job losses in industrialized countries, which have contributed to the renewed debate on the social clause and its inclusion in international trade agreements.

In the face of mounting globalization of the world economy and continued liberalization of world trade, we have no option but to strive for respect for the core Conventions of the International Labour Organization in international trade.

It was on this score that we hailed the decision of the OAU Labour Commission, at its meeting held in Addis Ababa this year, to promote promotion of the ratification and application of core Conventions of the ILO.

This decision was meant to endorse the declaration at the WTO Ministerial Meeting in Singapore that only the ILO has the competency to take responsibility for promoting the application of international labour standards.

For the sake of the credibility of these governments, we expect them to stand by their commitment to support the Director-General's efforts at strengthening the supervisory mechanism of the International Labour Organization.

We support the measures contained in the Report of the Director-General aimed at guaranteeing the relevance of the ILO's standard-setting activity in the future and tangible measures required to be in place to ensure social progress as well as humane conditions in international trade.

Our support for the measures outlined in the Report also stems from our belief that Africa, my continent, represents the world's most serious development challenges with an alarming level of poverty — over 40 per cent of its 660 million inhabitants are categorized as poor. The fact that its population growth rate is roughly twice that of the world means more and more people enter the poverty bracket every year.

Our economies, despite over a decade of implementing structural adjustment programmes, continue to be in crisis. With its generally declining incomes, high population growth rates, minimal foreign direct investment, a deteriorating social sector, the AIDS pandemic, famine, civil strife and unfavourable trade balance, the continent remains almost abandoned.

With this disturbing situation we expect the ILO to continue to support Africa with programmes that will enable it to overcome the challenges of structural adjustment and globalization, with the objective of ensuring that employment creation, poverty alleviation and popular participation remain the main focuses of ILO constituents. Otherwise, even in the coming millennium, Africa will continue to bear the tag of a continent of missed opportunities.

Let friends of Africa stand up now and be counted.

Mr. VAN LEEUWEN (representative of Education International) — As you drive out of Geneva on the motorway you see an overpass where somebody has written in big letters "You want to globalize? First, human rights!" In a nutshell, there we have it. Globalization of the economy is a fact. There is no point in trying to deny it or in trying to stop it but the question is: "What kind of globalization?" A form of globalization respecting no values, functioning only according to the laws of the jungle? Or one based on common human values? Globalization is not new. The creation of the ILO after the First World War reflected an earlier movement towards globalization based on common values, as did the Declaration of Philadelphia.

But the pace of globalization has accelerated. More and more people are demanding, like that anonymous acrobat who wrote those words on the overpass outside Geneva, that the time has come to reaffirm basic human values. It is their voice which in this house is represented by the workers' movement. Education International, being part of that movement and speaking for over 23 million educators and education employees, insists that the Universal Declaration of Human Rights sets forth fundamental values for all peoples.

This Organization was created in order to establish, monitor and defend international labour standards and we support the Director-General in his efforts to strengthen the supervisory functions of the ILO and to find ways to ensure compliance with the international labour standards outlined in his Report. We are shocked at the unwillingness of some governments to allow further exploration of those proposals. Even more disturbing is that some of the same governments ignore the findings of the Freedom of Association Committee, that they treat this Organization's unique tripartite Governing Body with disdain and seem to aim at weakening the mechanisms that we have developed over the years. Such a position will leave workers with no option but to pursue other avenues, including trade sanctions.

Allow me to stress here that those who are preaching unguided globalization today, and all those who are making pleas in this house for minimizing or even abandoning international standards, are to be held directly responsible for the social consequences of their vision of the world. I will not speak of the deterioration or even disappearance of vital public services, which is widening the gap between rich and poor; I will not speak of the public school systems that are on the brink of collapse in some countries, due to unbridled free marketism; I will, however, refer to one of the most evil consequences of their ideas, namely that millions of children will be forced into servitude, destroying their chances for a better future and locking them into new cycles of poverty and despair. We believe all children, boys and girls alike, have the right to education.

Our members, educators and other education employees, have carried, and are carrying forward, the ideal of education for all, which emerged out of the Industrial Revolution. They have been in the vanguard of revolutions, industrial as well as political. Educators played leading roles in the movements for independence of Latin America and the Caribbean, of Africa, of Asia and the Pacific, and they have been instrumental in struggles to overthrow dictatorships and regimes based on racial discrimination.

Today we are more than ever in the forefront of revolutions — the information revolution and the knowledge revolution, and we are crystal clear in our advocacy for the idea that these revolutions must be based on respect for basic human values and must not be an excuse for the strong and powerful to trample on basic human rights.

The militant advocacy of our members places them in the firing line. As I speak here today, we have teacher union leaders in jail; some are being tortured by governments which cynically send representatives to this Conference. As in previous years, some of our members have paid for their beliefs and their dedication with their lives.

But it would be a mistake to think that we will give up. We have not in the past, and we will not in the future, for we have an abiding belief that the human spirit will prevail. Education, by its very nature, seeks to nurture, to develop the human spirit and that is the duty which a democratic world society requires of our profession.

Education International and its national member organizations around the world remain more committed than ever to working with their colleagues in the ICFTU and the International Trade Secretariats towards a global society based not on the law of the jungle, but on equality of opportunity, social justice and democracy, solidarity and peace, and we expect our governments to support an ILO that remains faithful to its original mandate.

Original French: Mr. PEIRENS (Workers' adviser, Belgium) The international workers' movement, and with it the ILO, is trying to redefine the social content of the new international order, which is being ushered in by what is commonly known as globalization.

But this talk of globalization often serves to mask a series of politics or practices which, it is claimed, are inevitable in economic terms, whereas, in fact, they are based only on ideological premises or on considerations of profit or competitivity, without any social ramifications. It is essential that we should be attentive to the perverse effects of this neo-liberal discourse, which leads top politicians increasingly to abdicate their responsibilities to market interests and market forces.

The Summit at Copenhagen and the Ministerial Conference of the WTO in Singapore emphasized the key role played by the ILO in establishing a social framework. It is therefore important that the ILO should take up the challenge before others feel called upon to play this part. The ILO is the guarantor of representativity and universality, whereas others act only in the name of economic, geographic, or institutional interests — or without having the tripartite character which determines our actions.

I shall merely focus on a few points which call for more action on the part of the ILO; and I shall take as my yardstick, as does the Director-General, the central instrument of the ILO — its standard setting.

It is vital that the ILO constituents should be more rigorous with respect to the principles and basic standards of the ILO. We support any initiative which tries to increase the level of ratification of these basic standards. We should also therefore encourage the effective application of standards — and we understand the social label in this sense — and render the supervisory machinery more effective.

In this connection, it is incomprehensible that certain States which, economically and politically, are at the centre of the whole process of globalization, have not even ratified all the basic Conventions. It is also unacceptable that other States, for many years now, and even at this session of the Conference, hide behind national differences as regards development to justify the partial or diversified application of Conventions. These same States seem to wish to confine standard setting and monitoring within an exclusively national framework.

We cannot, at the same time, deny the essential rules of the game and wish to continue to be a player. Nor can we deny the universality of social justice and say that we are respectful of the ILO's principles and Conventions.

It is time to provide for a system similar to that of the Committee on Freedom of Association, which would apply to other basic Conventions — thus constituting a worldwide social basis for durable human development.

No decision to step up the work on basic Conventions can go ahead without breathing new life into the whole standard-setting process of the ILO. The consistency and interaction of the Conventions and principles must be maintained and reinforced because they constitute the only guarantee of balanced and effective social action.

There are some new major challenges which urgently call for the enactment of standards. Brutal shut-downs, decided unilaterally, as was the case in Renault Vilvorde in Belgium, are in flagrant contradiction with the principle of tripartism, the Convention on collective bargaining, and a number of other ILO Conventions.

This development shows how necessary it is to devise a Convention which would guarantee effective machinery for the information and consultation of the workers in supranational undertakings and networks. Such a Convention would be indispensable in a concrete form and an essential complement to the ILO Tripartite Declaration on Multinational Enterprises.

The ILO must continue its work of drawing up new standards and give preference to Conventions.

To sum up, I am in favour of a solemn declaration which would have a constitutional character, thus involving a specific and regular procedure to examine complaints of violations of basic Conventions — as I have just explained. I am also in favour of a social label to cover all workers, including those who do not work for the export trade, which would encourage and support those countries which make concerted and tangible efforts in accordance with the principles and constitutional objectives of the ILO.

I will limit myself to these few reflections by insisting on the need to go ahead on the basis of firm guidelines, such as those we have been able to devise these last few years, and I am confident that at the next session of the Governing Body concrete action can be decided on.

Mr. SHU'AIBU (Workers' adviser, Nigeria) — On behalf of the Nigerian Workers' delegation, I would like to congratulate the President on her election to the lofty position as President of the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference. The Nigerian Workers remain grateful for the efforts of the ILO in promoting and protecting the interests and rights of the worker, especially in Nigeria.

With respect to the apparent delay, or failure, of member States to ratify various ILO Conventions, the Nigerian Workers feel that serious efforts must be made to secure ratification and observance by member States of the core Conventions.

Our delegation has tried extensively at the meeting of the Committee on the Application of Standards, and outlined our observations, predicaments and positions on the various reforms in the Nigerian labour movement. The Nigerian Workers have come of age, and we remain hopeful that our gains in the various negotiations so far will be further enhanced and consolidated by the impetus already provided by the ILO.

Finally, the Nigerian Workers' delegation wish to thank the ILO for its noble and unique role in trying to find solutions to the multifarious problems of global industrial relations.

Original French: Mr. BARDE (Employers' delegate, Switzerland) — First of all, I should like to congratulate the President on her election to the chair of this session of the International Labour Conference. S, as in Slovakia, is also S as in Switzerland, and I am very happy that this should be so.

The Report of the Director-General of the ILO entitled The ILO, standard setting and globalization does not require a decision to be taken by us. It does, however, call for a response and I should like, on behalf of the delegation of Swiss Employers, to focus on two essential aspects.

The first is the standard-setting activity of our Organization. We must imperatively move from considerations of quantity to considerations of quality. The globalization of the economy entails ever broader trade scenarios, but it also means that we have to take account of the specific situation in each of the member States. Although the basic principles enshrined in the fundamental human rights Conventions must be universally reinforced, both in the application and as regards the monitoring of that application — whether in letter or in spirit is of little import when compared to the final objective — the tendency more ideological than practical or realistic, to accumulate new instruments can only dilute and trivialize the essential mission of our Organization.

The Director-General wishes, in his Report, to revitalize the concept of a "Recommendation". We approve this wish, because it is better to have a Recommendation which is universally accepted as a set of guidelines, than a Convention which has been ratified without enthusiasm by only a few States, some of which moreover will encounter obstacles to its implementation.

If we look at what is happening in our countries, we can see that collective agreements between social partners are moving more and more towards the setting of framework agreements, leaving sectors, or even enterprises to establish the more detailed standards themselves.

The second aspect I should like to discuss is the corollary of the first and concerns the famous clause. The recent Ministerial Conference of the World Trade Organization in Singapore clearly defined roles and responsibilities. The fundamental principles of the respect and dignity of workers are the responsibility of the International Labour Organization. Therefore, we have to rise to this challenge, without interfering in trade, which could be more harmful to some than advantageous to others. In affirming this conviction, I am aware that it might jeopardize certain situations and acquired powers. However, this conviction is also based on the need of all our member States to have broader access to international trade, whilst ensuring — and this is sometimes lost sight of — that every person can keep his or her own bearings and points of reference. The economy is not just anonymous free trade. It is also the fruit of active and motivated participation on the part of all the players.

Original Spanish: Mr. FRADES (Workers' adviser, Spain) — May I begin by congratulating the Director-General for the very pertinent Report he has presented to this 85th Session of the International Labour Conference with which we agree in many aspects. The fact is that globalization of the economy brings us face to face with a reality which is complex and contradictory. If on one side it makes it easier to have economic and technological exchanges, on the other hand — in the absence of social objectives and social standards — it aggravates regional imbalances and reinforces social inequality. The competency of the ILO in the establishment of these objectives is incontrovertible, as has been recognized by all countries in the summit meetings of Copenhagen and Singapore.

In this new context, the role of the ILO has to be reinforced by the extension of basic workers' rights, reinforcement of monitoring international labour standards and the drafting of new standards which in the opinion of the Spanish trade union movement, should preferably take the form of Conventions if they are to be truly effective.

The idea of a social label which would be granted to certain countries that respect basic rights and accept that their social and labour practices should be inspected internationally, seems to be exceedingly promising and merits our support. Nevertheless, we should point out that the Spanish trade union movement believes in the necessity of a social clause of social rights in all commercial transactions, which is still very appropriate and will be needed if one day we are to achieve the globalization of social justice.

The ILO also has to continue to be just as active in promoting tripartism and social dialogue.

As regards this point, I would like to point out that the most representative Spanish trade unions have put social dialogue and social negotiation as the central objectives of our trade union action in order to find an answer to the labour and social problems, bearing in mind the new international framework. Social negotiation at the national level in each country is still important for us to be able to tackle problems which are bound up with or aggravated by the new international context.

In approximately one year we have signed seven very different agreements, but all of them have had enormous social effects and have generally been accepted in practice.

For instance, there is an agreement between the trade unions and employers on the system of arbitration and conciliation, others with the Government for the consolidation and improvement of social security, and for employment and social protection in agriculture together with a tripartite agreement on vocational training. But I would like above all to mention the recent agreements for employment stability and collective bargaining, which called for reinforcement of the value of social dialogue between the most representative employers' and workers' organizations.

These agreements, which are realistic and prudent, presuppose that the unions and the employers take over the administration of labour relations from the Government, and therefore confirm that there should be no unilateral action imposed by government power. Besides favouring stability and employment in the face of the precariousness that exists today, which affects up to 34 per cent of wage-earners, these agreements have a definite indirect influence on employment by favouring the factors which lead to employment growth. On the other hand, as regards collective bargaining, these agreements rationalize and reinforce its structure and enrich its contents.

But with this same responsibility and legitimacy we are profoundly concerned by certain threats to education and public health in Spain. The trade union movement will not accept regressive measures in these two pillars of the social State, that can only accentuate social inequalities. At the same time we have said that we reject the policy of privatization and liquidation of the public enterprise sector because it leads to unemployment and reduces the capacity to link the functioning of the economy to the general interests of society.

Finally, I would like to point out that the two majority trade union federations have lodged a complaint against the Spanish Government in the Committee on Freedom of Association of the ILO for a breach of the right of collective bargaining for public employees and breach of the collective agreement which had been in force until 1997. The unjust, discriminatory and abusive decision of the Government not to increase wages for public employees in 1997 is an obvious violation of the rights protected by ILO standards.

The Spanish trade union movement is continuing to support negotiations and social dialogue, but it will only be possible if there is a reorientation of social and economic policy and more positive attitude on the part of the Government.

Economic globalization cannot be an excuse for national States to question labour rights nor to reconsider their commitments in the social sector. On the contrary, as we are part of the European Union and identified with its values of welfare and social justice, we defend a new concept of globalization which means an extension of these values to the world at large.

Original Arabic: Mr. DEMNATI (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Morocco) — It gives me great pleasure, first of all, to congratulate Mrs. Keltošová personally and on behalf of the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco upon her election to the chairmanship of our Conference and to wish her every success in performing her duties. Thanks to her experience and great skill in the field of social and labour issues, she will, without any doubt, be able to secure success in our work.

The present study of the ILO's standard-setting activities will help us to chart the path towards realistic international labour standards and to enhance their role in the achievement of social justice that the Organization endeavours to defend through its various forms of action. Globalization with the economic progress that can result from it would have no impact if, at the same time, it were not to improve social conditions and bring about a balance between economic growth and social progress. We fully agree with the Director-General in respect of workers' fundamental rights, the scope of which has been determined by certain Conventions adopted by the ILO and which are the cornerstone of social progress. But at the same time we believe that every effort should be deployed by our Organization for the purpose of achieving international consensus on the fundamental rights which should be respected by all while, at the same time, determining their contents and the conditions of exercise without other rights and freedoms being encroached upon. This is particularly necessary, given that the relevant Conventions and Recommendations adopted by the International Labour Conference are restricted to a series of general principles and do not determine the border-line between the application of these principles and the exercise of other rights. We also believe that the substance and scope of those rights and the achievement of consensus in their regard are indispensable for the observance of those rights by the international community. That consensus is likely to encourage member States to ratify the core Conventions and to allow the Organization to use its machinery properly. In this way, it would become possible to avoid a division between international Conventions of an authoritarian character based on special supervisory machinery and ordinary Conventions which are not mandatory unless ratified. We also think that imposing obligations on States that those States have not accepted would constitute an unacceptable legal precedent, given that it would run counter to the fundamental principles enshrined in the Treaty of Vienna.

Even if economic globalization has given our Organization's standard setting a new outlook, the ILO does not need to revise its Constitution in order to accomplish its new standard-setting functions. It should merely extend its basis of consultation in order to determine which issues are best addressed by standards and use the most appropriate means it has available to it for that purpose. In this context, the ILO could draw more than ever upon external structures in endeavours to identify its constituents' real needs; this would allow it to target its standard-setting activity at issues which cannot be dealt with in any other way.

Moreover, Recommendations should have priority in such cases, providing that proper effective follow-up action through the Organization's constitutional machinery is ensured.

It is our opinion that the Director-General's proposal regarding the social label would be harmful for social conditions in several countries, in as much as this label would be used for protectionist rather than social purposes. This is why we believe that the best way of securing social progress is to be found in the elaboration of technical cooperation programmes and of strategies designed to mobilize the funding of such programmes.

Convinced of the need to dovetail the Organization's standard setting and the process of elaborating national legislation, the Kingdom of Morocco has ratified 41 international labour Conventions, including five of the seven relating to workers' fundamental rights. In this respect, the draft Labour Code, upon which we are seeking a consensus between all concerned parties, includes provisions conducive to the ratification of the two core Conventions not yet having been ratified, as well as to an improvement in industrial relations.

Our country is aware of the need to face up to the economic challenges now encountered on an international level and that it is important to establish the foundations of economic and social progress on the principles of tripartite cooperation; consequently, we have placed the social dialogue between the Government and the social partners at the heart of our social policy.

The important signing in Morocco last summer of a joint declaration between the Government and the social partners is now having a major practical impact and constitutes undeniable evidence of Morocco's commitment to the system of tripartite consultations always highlighted by the ILO's Conventions and Recommendations.

As we rejoice at the creation of an ILO unit in Arab Jerusalem with a view to supervising the implementation of the Organization's programmes in support of the social partners in the State of Palestine, we, at the same time, express our concern and condemnation of the Israeli settlement policy with its serious repercussions for workers and employers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories.

We call upon our Organization to face up to its responsibilities and to give the necessary protection to Arab workers and employers in the occupied Arab territories and to use all means available to it to put an end to the destructive consequences of the Israeli settlement policy.

Original Spanish: Mr. BERNAL CAMERO (Workers' delegate, Cuba) — The Cuban Workers' Federation supports all efforts directed at the proper implementation of the ILO's international labour standards.

As regards what has been called "the era of globalization", I can only ask "What kind of globalization?", and add "Will this era be unfortunate and unhappy for the workers like the one preceding it?" It would seem that the answer is yes, because before so-called "globalization" the greater part of the wealth generated by the work of millions of wage-earners and their forbears was concentrate in the hands of a small minority owning huge amounts of capital, and unless this unjust relationship of ownership changes, the position will remain the same.

Indeed, there is plenty of evidence that many of the most serious problems not previously solved will crop up again in the new era in a pernicious and chronic form, such as unemployment, hunger, malnutrition, illiteracy, incurable diseases, housing shortages, destitution, lack of security and social systems, child labour and many other evils which could be avoided, but never will be under a system of capitalist, neo-liberal globalization, as that which is being imposed on us and which unfortunately quite a lot of us are awaiting with a sense of anxiety and convincing ourselves of its supposed beneficial effects for the whole of humanity.

None of the forms adopted by capitalism in its open greed for profit and yet more profit will have the virtue of making the social problems that affect humanity one of the major issues to be addressed. This era, dominated by a group of economic powers which are in turn obedient to the most powerful interests of major capital, is not an appropriate one for trials of labels or certificates of good conduct.

However, the need to ensure that international Conventions are applied is indisputable; it is in the interest of the workers. The debate must continue until we find the most judicious and feasible ways of giving the ILO's standard-setting activities the necessary stringency.

I would like to state once more the need for the international community to continue to demand the suspension of the economic, commercial and financial blockade to which Cuba has been subjected for over 30 years and which it is heroically and stoically resisting, and will continue to resist, without any concessions to the aggressor which seeks to make us hesitate in our sovereign will to construct a socialist society in the service of the workers.

I understand that all nations are free to trade with whoever they choose, but I cannot understand that there should be nations which lay down laws to be them applied by other countries or to be given effect by financial undertakings or entities which are not subordinated to them, as is the case of the latest laws promulgated to tighten the blockade of Cuba and those applied to other countries which are also the subject of blockades.

Not only are threats and different types of sanctions directed at those who trade with or make investments in Cuba, but on 13 June a delegate at this Conference told me that he had been officially informed that he would not get a visa if he requested one to visit a certain country which takes part in the blockade of Cuba, since during a debate at the ILO he had made certain statements.

In this Conference I have had heard it said that we are all entitled to enjoy the fruits of globalization, but it would be necessary radically to change the very unjust world order that currently exists. There would also have to be a reduction in the dominance, the arrogance and the abuse of power of certain nations, beginning with the most powerful one of all, and it would be necessary to instil democracy in the whole United Nations system, raising the real power of the majority of nations above the omnipotence of a small group.

I would like to repeat what the Director-General says on page 34 of the appendix to his Report, The report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories, which is that "universal and lasting peace can be established only if it is based upon social justice".

Mr. KARA (Workers' delegate, Israel) — Allow me first of all to congratulate the President on her election, and to express the hope that the final results of this Conference will be to the satisfaction of all the groups.

It gives me great pleasure to have the honour of addressing the Conference once again as the representative of HISTADRUT, the General Federation of Labour in Israel. As we approach the turn of the century and the start of a new millennium we are witnessing turbulence and change where we had expected stability and calm. After the calamities of the great wars of the first half of the century, mankind collectively hoped for a better second half. Instead, we see that human relationships have not become warmer or more compassionate as the laws of market forces rule everywhere. The god of profit is paramount and humane labour relations are less important.

Wherever we look, governments are weakening the services provided by the Welfare State and pensioners are seeing a steady reduction in the value of their savings and benefits. The feeble are paying the price of "managing government like a business" and the old and infirm have to fend for themselves.

I believe that one of the important functions of this eminent body is to correct the tilt of the table and to report and correct injustices where they occur, in all parts of the world.

We must address ourselves to the question of the response of our organizations to the eroding of collective agreements by the concept of contract labour, which can only lead to confusion and anarchy. This element of labour relations is very popular with the multinational companies and the international community must learn the best way to handle it. It appears that this phenomenon is unavoidable and I believe that a way must be found to include the provisions of contract labour within the framework of collective agreements.

Another important question to be addressed is that of the exploitation of children. HISTADRUT supports the ban on purchasing merchandise produced by the companies who are misusing child labour and we hope that this campaign will succeed in stopping this modern form of slavery.

The employment of foreign nationals also brings its attendant problems. The achievement of the principle of the free flow of labour must not mean that migrant labour is mistreated and exploited. Opportunities for abuse and weaknesses in present laws are convenient. We must find new ways to deal with unscrupulous employers who again take advantage of the weak and defenceless.

Privatization is today a popular cure of all illness. HISTADRUT does not oppose privatization as such, provided that the legitimate rights of the workers and the strategic needs of the nation are adequately safeguarded.

The turmoil I mentioned earlier is also affecting HISTADRUT and the whole region of the Middle East. HISTADRUT has embarked on a process of renewal and reformation. Our organization has become more compact and more emphasis is now placed on trade union affairs and services to our trade union members. The reduction in size has been painful and we are now embarking on a campaign to attract new members. Our activity in the field of industrial relations is very important and felt by all of Israel's population.

HISTADRUT has always supported the peace process in the Middle East. We are concerned about the pace of progress at the present time. The prosperity and happiness of everyone in our area depends on the establishment of just and lasting peace at the earliest possible time. Only this will ensure a better life for all. We pray that the hope for success which we all shared such a short time ago will return to the region in the near future and that all the countries of the Mediterranean will be able to look forward to happy, serene and democratic lives of cooperation between nations in place of enmity and suspicion.

(Mr. Ramírez León takes the Chair.)

Original German: Ms. ENGELEN-KEFER (Workers' delegate, Germany) — No one looks at common products on sale like shirts and shoes to see under what conditions they have been produced. If we knew that, would it in any way affect our decision to buy or not?

I support the proposal of the Director-General to introduce an ILO social label, which we should carefully check. Only then could the consumer decide conscientiously in favour of this or that labour standard. This is not protectionism.

We also support the other proposals of the Director-General for strengthening labour standards in general. Furthermore, we believe that measures and development assistance should be increased for countries which are striving to achieve social progress. Industrial countries have a special responsibility in this respect. We agree with the Director-General that unfettered competition does not automatically lead to social progress.

On the contrary, the promises of globalization may well bring disappointment and disillusion. Globalization is a process which we cannot avoid but it is also a process that can become a social bomb which we must seek to defuse. There is a need for a worldwide plan for the massive protection of the interests of workers and the strengthening of the ILO's objectives vis-à-vis the capital and internationalization.

If the national State is reduced to a competition State fully subject to the world economy, uncontrollable internal and external factors will increase the vulnerability of States.

The risks of economic and social collapse are growing, and particularly affect the developing countries. Money also does not create solidarity, but is merely a means of providing charity assistance. New kinds of fundamentalism, whether religious or national, are appearing, if which neo-liberalism is part, particularly when it claims that market laws are sacred.

All those who want to sacrifice social standards on the altar of globalization should be aware that this could lead to a return to protectionism in some countries — which is something that none of us desires.

To prevent this from happening, ILO standards should be strengthened as well as the objectives of the Organization. We firmly support the idea of a report on the social consequences of globalization. I also agree that the provisions on freedom of association should be included in other Conventions. The jurisprudence regarding freedom of association and the right to strike shows that the three groups agree on the universal nature of these fundamental standards. But we do not agree with all that the Director-General says. By placing too much emphasis on Recommendations without strengthening the supervisory machinery, we risk weakening standard setting as a whole. We will judge States according to the way in which they give effect to the declarations made in Copenhagen and Singapore. And I believe they will show that they really want to support the ILO's activities.

We insist on the social label. We endorse the assessment made in Singapore that it should not be used for protectionist purposes and that a country's comparative advantages should not be called into question.

We believe that studies have clearly shown that developing countries have nothing to fear from the application of labour standards, particularly as regards the fight against child labour.

We must ensure that fundamental standards as well as the basic United Nations Conventions are fully respected. What we expect of the developing countries must also apply to the World Bank and the IMF.

The remarks of the Director-General concerning the strengthening of workers' basic rights in no way contradict the appeals made for the development of the developing countries.

We believe above all that cooperation between the WTO and the ILO should be promoted, and we would have liked to see some proposals to this effect in the Director-General's Report.

Social standards have even greater importance since the end of the conflict between the East and the West. But we must also try to defuse the time-bomb threatening the North and the South.

Mr. BOTHA (Employers' delegate, South Africa) — The Report of the Director-General is a significant contribution to the ongoing debate on the development of standards and their role in furthering social and economic progress. The Report emphasizes that unless the function of standard setting by the International Labour Organization is strengthened, the promise of progress in the world economy is liable to be jeopardized for many workers.

There can also be no promise of progress if standards and the process of standard setting are permitted to pose the same threat and place unacceptable limitations on all obstacles in the path of entrepreneurship or the creation of employment.

But that is not to say that the ILO should not continue to devote itself to the protection of the fundamental rights of workers and employers. Particular attention must be paid to the relationship between standards and the priority of the creation of productive employment.

We support the Director-General's positive proposals directed at better implementation of standards and their alignment with contemporary economic and social realities.

A critical review of the existing customs, practices and procedures, seemingly accepted as sacred by the parties engaged in the standard-setting process during the Conference, is a useful starting-point in the consideration of alternatives.

The Director-General highlights the attitude of governments which vote for a Convention with no serious intention of pressing for its ratification by the competent authorities. Not only is this attitude inimical to the initial intentions of the founders of the ILO and a breach of a moral commitment that is established by a yes vote, it threatens to undermine the core function of this Organization. This form of hypocrisy to which I refer has two important consequences.

First, the quality of the instruments that emerge do not reflect qualitative tripartite negotiation. Rather they too often represent miserable compromises fashioned during an adversarial amendments procedure adopted in a technical committee under extreme pressure to rapidly complete its work. These circumstances are not conducive to what we come here to do — to seek consensus with our social partners in an atmosphere of good faith.

Secondly, Conventions put to the vote at Conference reflect less and less the realities of the workplace. With little prospect of a significant rate of ratification, the standards held out by this Organization as internationally applicable norms, offer a false hope, even for those who look to them as an influence on national law and practice.

Records of voting on instruments should receive more publicity. A vote in favour of a Convention might even be the basis of regular inquiry by the Office when no ratification is registered within a reasonable period, taking into account the obligations of submission. Perhaps there should be a formal obligation to report on reasons for a failure to ratify once a positive vote is registered.

Of course the dynamics of politics will account for a degree of non-ratification despite a vote by a government in support of an instrument. But a return to the initial intentions of the founders of this Organization, of which South Africa was one, and the ongoing consideration of the Governing Body to the proposals made by the Director-General, will ensure a qualitative advance in standard setting within the limits inherent in the ILO's dependence on the action of its member States.

Finally, we acknowledge the continuing technical assistance by the ILO and in particular the Swiss Government, to the reform of labour market institutions in South Africa. The success of our Principal Dispute Resolution Agency, which has improved settlement rates of industrial disputes from 20 per cent to in excess of 70 per cent, is both a contribution to industrial peace and testimony to the success of this assistance.

The assistance of the multidisciplinary team in Harare has ensured that southern African members, for two consecutive years, have met their reporting obligations. We acknowledge, and are grateful for, their efforts.

Original Arabic: Mr. MATTAR (Employers' delegate, United Arab Emirates) — In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! In his Report the Director-General chose as his topic the ILO, standard setting and globalization. This Report discusses the ILO's standard-setting activities and the demands of the globalized economy. It deals with a number of subjects and puts forward various ideas and views. Permit me now to give you the opinion of the Employers' Union of the United Arab Emirates on the Director-General's Report.

The position of our Union as regards international labour standards is based on the following. First, respect for the provisions of the ILO Constitution. Accession to these standards must however be on a voluntary basis and in accordance with the conditions of each State. Second, the current monitoring system for the application of international labour standards is a flexible, objective and impartial one and we feel that it should not be modified or changed unless it is to make it more flexible in the interests of member States, thus enabling us better to apply international labour standards. Third, the decision of the Singapore Ministerial Conference confirms the mandate of the ILO in standard setting, without however granting this Organization any mandate on international trade. Therefore we refuse a connection between international labour standards and trade liberalization. We also refuse to link trade with the social label proposed in the Report. My fourth point is that it is the duty of the ILO to grant technical assistance through technical cooperation projects to member States and employers' organizations, in particular in order to ensure greater compliance with ILO instruments.

The United Arab Emirates has a free market economy and has trade relations with all the States of the world. Our country has worked to create an environment favourable to trade and conditions favourable to investment. In the context of this policy many small and medium-sized enterprises were created and the market expanded, thanks to numerous facilities and exceptional conditions of service. We attracted foreign manpower as a consequence and we feel that the globalization of the economy should provide conditions favourable to trade, the transfer of technology, economic cooperation and the improvement of living standards, whilst respecting the conditions in each country.

The Director-General in his Report referred to the situation of Arab workers in Palestine and the occupied Arab territories. We thank the Director-General and the heads and members of the mission for their objective report which denounced Israeli policy and practices and showed the needs of the social partners in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories. We appeal to the Director-General to continue with this work by sending further missions on a periodic basis. At the same time we request the ILO to grant financial, technical and moral assistance to workers and employers in the occupied Arab territories, and in particular to the Palestinian authority. We commend the generous assistance given to the ILO projects in Palestine by the United Arab Emirates. This assistance took the form of the establishment of a centre, which provides wheelchairs for the disabled, and it was financed by his Highness, Dr. Sheikh Sultan bin Mohammed al-Qassimi, a member of the Supreme Council of Rulers, and Ruler of Sharjah. A centre for the disabled was also established, with the financial support of His Highness Sheikh Zayad bin Sultan al-Nahyan, Ruler of Abu Dhabi, Vice-Commander of the armed forces and President of the Supreme Council of Rulers. A project focusing on employment set up by Sheikh Rashid bin Saeed al-Maktoum and financed by Sheikh Hamdam bin Rashid al-Maktoum, Vice-Ruler of Dubai and Minister of Finance and Industry.

Original French: Mr. DAACH (Minister of Labour and Vocational Training, Djibouti) — Madam President, first I should like to congratulate you on your brilliant election. My congratulations also go to the other members of the Bureau. I wish you every success in your continued work at the Conference, and assure you of the support of my delegation.

Our Conference is taking place at a time when we have to rise to the challenge which the development of the world economy has posed, at a time when, as the Director-General has written, we are defending values, and promoting change. The subject of the Director-General's Report is a very topical one and is designed to encourage a fruitful debate.

The Director-General is right when he affirms that the Constitution of the ILO and the Declaration of Philadelphia provide the Organization with the means and the mandate which it requires to supervise the implementation of its basic principles.

The fundamental and essential goals of the ILO are still topical and they should guide us in our work. This is why Djibouti was often inspired by the instruments of the ILO when it modernized its labour legislation and developed a framework for social protection for our workers.

Thus we brought together the two essential conditions which link economic progress to social progress, namely, universal recognition of certain fundamental rights and the creation of an appropriate institutional framework.

The world has changed and we live henceforth in a multipolar world — a world where the already wide gap between the North and the South is becoming wider still. The questions which we have to ask ourselves are, as I see it, the following: First of all, how can we make our labour legislation modern and profitable for all the countries of the world? Second question, how can we reinforce the principle that man must remain at the centre of our concerns and our actions?

In this respect, we should like the "global social label" to be a means to overcome increasing poverty of the countries of the South, and a means of adding vigour to international solidarity. In fact, liberalization of trade and globalization of the economy should not constitute an end in themselves, rather they should be seen as a means to overcome underdevelopment, poverty, hunger and illiteracy. All of these scourges can, moreover, lead to national and regional conflict.

Can public opinion in our countries continue to be properly aware of our principles and our goals in a world in which a billion people have to live on less than a dollar per day, at a time when the world gross national product has increased by 40 per cent, in a world where 48 developing countries account for only 0.4 per cent of international trade?

Djibouti supports the initiative of the Director-General to strengthen the social dimension of structural adjustment, in accordance with the conclusions of the Copenhagen Social Summit.

Together, thanks to the principles and means of action of the ILO we can improve the daily lives of our populations throughout the world.

Original German: Mr. THÜSING (Employers' delegate, Germany) — The Director-General's Report should be studied with attention and respect, not only because of the matters he discusses, but also because of his imagination and his readiness to look for new ways forward. I can follow him on some of these paths, but not on others.

I welcome the fact that, in the second part of the Report, we find the traditional practice of standard setting critically studied. The Report thereby draws conclusions from the criticisms which in the last two years have become ever stronger. I cannot go into detail here concerning the considerations and proposals involved, but I would just say this — if standard setting is to preserve its sense, and this consists in the ratification of and compliance with Conventions and not just in their adoption, there is a need for radical reform, but not only in procedure, but also in the underlying philosophy. The Director-General's Report goes in this direction and therefore his considerations and proposals should be pursued further in the relevant ILO bodies in a constructive sense.

I would merely add two points to these considerations. Firstly, in preparing a Convention, must reading necessarily be limited to the length of one session of the Conference? Why should not the relevant conference committee ask for authorization for the subject to be resumed during the following session of the Conference if it observes that if it is to do its work properly it requires more time? This, of course, would only occur in exceptional cases, but we could perhaps ensure in this way that the time-limits imposed by our shorter labour conference sessions do not affect quality. I see nothing in the Constitution that would hinder this. Other related problems I think could be solved.

Furthermore, should not we consider in future subjecting those governments which at the Conference have agreed to adopt a Convention, but which then do not ratify it, to special additional obligations to report? We could find justification for this in that in giving their agreement at the Conference, they have awakened expectations which they do not then fulfil and that the reasons for this discrepancy demands special justification on which a report should be submitted. I think this could lead to more responsible and hence more fruitful standard setting.

In connection with the first part of the Report, I fully understand and share the concern of the Director-General with regard to the protection of basic labour rights throughout the world, but I feel that the possibilities which are available to the ILO in the framework of its Constitution are more limited. In this connection the Report develops — and in the best of intentions I agree — an interpretative fantasy, which could ultimately lead to a weakening of the Constitution. If we take this path with regard to rights now recognized as fundamental, then we would have no reason not to continue this procedure indefinitely tomorrow and the day after, when it would involve other Conventions then considered to be fundamental.

The Freedom of Association Committee is a special case which I do not think can be taken as a precedent.

I consider rigorous respect for the Constitution to be essential today, and in the future perhaps even more so. The Constitution is the only bond which holds us all together despite all our differences in interests and circumstances. This does not call for resignation. The solemn declaration mentioned in the Report to be given by the Conference, supplemented by changes concerning the reporting obligations, would prove valuable for further progress. The success seen so far in the ratification campaign of the Office supports this expectation.

We have heard much criticism of the proposed social label and unhappily I have to associate myself with it. I will give only two of a from the whole range of reasons for this: if social labelling were a success it would lead to trade discrimination, and this in turn would mean that the ILO would be overloaded if it were then responsible for close monitoring of the procedures.

Original Spanish: Mr. LAZO PERALTA (Workers' delegate, Peru) — Allow me to offer you, Madam President, and through you to the international community of the ILO, the respectful greetings of Peruvian workers and, at the same time, to wish the ILO renewed impetus in its mission to protect the rights and employment conditions of workers in the world. In this connection, we wish to express our strongest support to the points raised by the Director-General in his Report to the 85th Session.

Indeed, we consider it essential that we should have the most necessary existence of a parallel between economic and social progress. For that the ILO must ensure greater universality in the application of its fundamental standards especially for freedom of association and collective bargaining (Conventions Nos. 87 and 98) and equal remuneration and non-discrimination (Conventions Nos. 100 and 111) amongst others specified in the above-mentioned Report. We are in full agreement that the guarantee of fundamental rights is a necessary condition, albeit insufficient, for social progress. In this way we demonstrate our agreement that the member States of the ILO must press actively for social progress in every shape and form.

Indeed, we support the mechanism proposed for a social label of a general nature for all the products made in a country which would only be awarded to those countries which act in conformity with a series of fundamental rights and principles, and countries should accept that their practice in the labour field should be subjected to international supervision and agree to observe the necessary requirements on the spot.

We Peruvian workers are in favour of any initiative that would allow better supervision by the international community of the fulfilment of workers' fundamental human rights, so long as such rights have become common currency for all humanity.

We agree to improve the system of supervision to the extent that Peru does not hold in high esteem any ILO Conventions or Recommendations. We have indeed sent several denunciations through the Coordinator of the Trade Union Centres of Peru, which have merited favourable judgements from the ILO's Committee on Freedom of Association, and approved by the Governing Body in November 1994 and in June 1996, in which the Peruvian Government was requested to modify its legislation because it was in contradiction with international labour Conventions Nos. 87, 98, 100 and 111, exactly those which are supposed to confer a sign of universal respect for fundamental standards of the ILO.

It is our obligation to denounce, in this international forum, the fact that in our country workers in cooperatives are not allowed to unionize, nor those in temporary service companies which act as agents for employers, nor may workers organize in special complementary companies (dealing with such services as maintenance, cleaning, security guards, etc.) and the same applies to those workers who are contracted or subcontracted. All of them are prevented from unionizing by the sophistry of saying that they work for some different company. Furthermore the unionization of the workers contracted through youth or pre-professional training agreements is forbidden, because their relationship is supposedly not to be regarded as taking part in work, and is therefore not covered by any of the standards of labour law or any international labour Convention approved by the ILO.

All this has brought about a drastic reduction in the number of unionized workers and a consequent fall in the quantity of collective agreements to a number lower than ever seen before, because of specific measures taken to weaken the negotiating powers of unions.

A new Law on Collective Work Agreements has been promulgated by the Congress of the Republic, but instead of improving the situation and taking account of the main observations made by the Committee on Freedom of Association of the ILO, on the contrary it has been made worse by introducing a series of prejudicial prescriptions for workers and their trade unions, so you will appreciate that there is now another denunciation from the Coordinator of the Trade Union Centres of Peru who has submitted it to the above-mentioned Committee of the ILO's supervisory machinery. In order to achieve the hopes and expectations that globalization implied, we hope that the existence of a social dimension will be agreed upon, which will benefit all workers in all countries, no matter what their level of development.

Finally, we repeat our request, which we mentioned at the last meeting of the Conference that the ILO should equip itself with an instrument capable of sanctioning member States which fail to comply with the recommendations of the ILO and violate the social rights of workers.

Nineteenth sitting

Wednesday, 18 June 1997, 10.15 a.m.

President: Ms. Keltošová

The PRESIDENT — Before we start with today's agenda, I would like to refer to the three record votes that the Conference took yesterday on the resolutions concerning arrears of contributions of Cape Verde, the Dominican Republic and Djibouti. All three were adopted and the Chair announced the results during the sitting. The details of the votes concerning Cape Verde and the Dominican Republic were published in Provisional Records No. 13(a) and 13(b), but due to technical problems the details of the vote concerning Djibouti could not be retrieved after the results were announced. I would like to make it clear, however, that the results of the votes which I announced are valid.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE REVISION OF CONVENTION NO. 96: SUBMISSION, DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT — The first item on our agenda this morning is the consideration and adoption of the report of the Committee on the Revision of Convention No. 96, which you will find in Provisional Record No. 16.

I call on Ms. Maesela, Government adviser, South Africa, and Reporter of the Committee to submit the report.

Ms. MAESELA (Government adviser, South Africa; Reporter of the Committee on the Revision of Convention No. 96) — It has been my honour and privilege to serve as Reporter of the Committee on the Revision of Convention No. 96. I am therefore pleased and proud to submit to the Conference the report of the Committee, together with its instruments, that is, the proposed Convention and Recommendation on private employment agencies (Provisional Record No. 16).

Convention No. 96, which was adopted in 1949, provided for the abolition of fee-charging employment agencies which were conducted with a view to profit, and the regulation of existing fee-charging agencies. From the beginning of the 1960s onwards, the growth of private employment agencies helped to change the attitude that monopoly was the only solution, and the possibility of coexistence between public employment services and private employment agencies began to be considered. Progressively, in the last 20 years, many countries have allowed the development of temporary work agencies and have decided to relax the monopoly of public employment services and allow the operation of the private employment agencies. It, therefore, became necessary for many governments to protect from exploitation the most vulnerable workers who were being placed by these agencies.

The ILO must be congratulated for having been able to face up to the realities of changes in the labour market and the challenges that these changes presented. The ILO has demonstrated its ability to embrace change when it became necessary. However, we must not lose sight of the reason for the ILO's existence which is to protect and to promote the rights of workers.

The revision of Convention No. 96 was the result of a trend towards the liberalization of placement services. Taking into account the long-standing controversy on private employment agencies, the Governing Body decided to hold a general discussion in 1994 on the role of private employment agencies in the labour market.

The conclusions of the 1994 discussion formed the basis on which our Committee conducted its business.

The Committee on Private Employment Agencies at that session held the view that the revised standard should pursue the following objectives:

1. set the pattern for response to the dynamics of changing labour market functions and recall the role of its actors;
2. draw up general parameters to describe the main actors, namely, the public employment services and private employment agencies, as well as the nature of the relationship both between themselves and with their clients;
3. establish general principles and provide guidance that protect: (i) labour markets against poor and unethical practices; (ii) workers' interests, including whether the stability of industrial relations systems might be affected by some practices of private employment agencies (these principles should consider the concerns of some (but not all) Committee members with regard to the triangular employment relations, including contract labour, temporary work agencies and staff-leasing arrangements); (iii) workers recruited in one country for work in another;
4. create environments that allow for the improved functioning of all employment agencies;
5. ensure that national governments are free to determine how the above objectives should be met.

Looking at the results of our Committee's work and comparing them with the objectives set in the 1994 conclusions, I feel that we have fulfilled our mandate.

We started our work on the basis of two reports: the 1994 report, and the texts for a Convention and a Recommendation compiled by the Office, drawn from the answers to the questionnaire from the various countries. The Committee was charged with the responsibility of finalizing its discussion on the revision of Convention No. 96 in one session. However, the Committee needed 19 sittings to complete its work, which reflects the difficult issues which had to be dealt with.

The scene was set very early in the discussion, as the Employers stressed the positive role which private employment agencies could play, allowing for increased efficiency of the labour market in the interest of jobseekers, while the Workers stressed the documented malpractices and abuses which are prevalent in this industry, and the need to protect workers.

From the Government benches there were varied positions, with the EU countries being more united in most of their positions than the rest of the other governments. As the discussion progressed, there appeared to be identifiable trends in government positions from developed and developing countries. While developed countries appeared to favour less regulation of private employment agencies, as these countries have sophisticated systems of monitoring mechanisms already in place, developing countries on the other hand appeared to favour regulatory mechanisms, to be incorporated in the Convention. There was overall concern for the protection of workers, and very disturbing abuses were reported as having occurred in various countries.

Specific examples of abuses reported were: (i) workers being sent to non-existent jobs at own expenses; (ii) workers being forced into prostitution or domestic work to which they did not agree; (iii) workers being sent to enterprises to break strikes; and (iv) workers being dumped at sea after being promised work in another country. There are various examples of this nature. The Committee took bold decisions on many issues; most of them were taken on the basis of consensus, although on some issues compromises were reached after arduous and protracted discussions.

I would like to highlight some of those important issues on which key decisions were taken by the Committee: the inclusion of temporary work agencies in the scope of the instruments which is reflected in Article 1 of the Convention; the need for Members to determine the legal status of agencies and, in the absence of appropriate national law and practice on the operation of agencies, to establish proper licensing, certification or regulation of the operation of agencies, which is reflected in Article 3 of the Convention; the protection of personal data processed by these agencies, reflected in Article 6 of the Convention; the prohibition of fee-charging to workers with a few exceptions, which is reflected in Article 7 of the Convention; special protection of migrant workers, reflected in Article 8 of the Convention; prevention of the use of child labour by agencies, reflected in Article 9 of the Convention; a wide-ranging protection of workers, reflected in Article 11 and Article 12 of the Co vention; and the encouragement of cooperation between private and public sectors in the provision of services to the labour market, which is reflected in Article 13 of the Convention.

The report of the Committee reflects the detailed and sometimes difficult decisions which led to some of the above decisions. I believe that the detailed record of the discussion will help member States to take early decisions on the ratification of the Convention and on the application of both instruments. I also fully believe that we have come up with a modern instrument which will be able to stand the test of time. The principle of tripartism was clearly demonstrated and triumphed during the deliberations.

I therefore recommend that the Conference adopt this report as well as the attached texts of a Convention and a Recommendation. I believe that these two drafts should receive the necessary support from the Conference so that member States may recognize the degree of acceptance of the principles on which they are based.

It is my sincere hope that the application of these two instruments will provide jobseekers and workers of temporary work agencies the kind of protection which our Committee intended.

To conclude, I must extend my thanks to the Chairperson for having so ably led the discussions, allowing Members fully to express their views and their reservations, and also for having allowed the spirit of consensus to prevail.

I would also like to congratulate the two Vice-Chairpersons and the Committee members in the Employers' and Workers' groups for their commitment to their group's views and positions, but who nevertheless worked hard to achieve agreement which took into account as much as possible all the views expressed by the Government members.

I am also grateful to my colleagues on the Government benches who have shown a high level of expertise in comparing the draft texts with their national legislation so as to identify possible areas of difficulties and compromise.

To all my fellow Committee members I would again like to express my gratitude for the confidence placed in me, and also for the cooperation and support which they have given me throughout. I would also like to thank the secretariat and the interpreters for their excellent work which allowed for the smooth running of the Committee.

I will end by asking the Conference for unanimous support for the report, as well as a positive vote for the two instruments — the Convention and the Recommendation.

Mr. MAGNUSSEN (Employers' adviser, Norway; Employer Vice-Chairperson of the Committee on the Revision of Convention No. 96) — Convention No. 96 is an old Convention, growing out of the labour market of the 1930s and adopted shortly after the Second World War in 1949. Its main message was that private employment agencies should not be allowed to function and that governments should retain all responsibility for the activities of the private employment agencies, which then existed mainly to provide services for matching offers of and applications for employment, without being employers themselves.

The development of the labour market since then has progressively outdated Convention No. 96, as these employment agencies have grown considerably both in number and in the scope of their activities. In particular, temporary work agencies have grown in importance and number.

The 1994 International Labour Conference discussed this development and considered the position that should be given to the private employment agencies. The Conference concluded — as expected — that the International Labour Organization should proceed to revise Convention No. 96 and that the revised standard should pursue a number of objectives. The Reporter has already mentioned in detail the conclusions of the 1994 Conference and I shall therefore not repeat them. I shall, however, add that the Conference also held the view that private employment agencies can play a very positive role in the functioning of the labour market and went to some lengths in describing the possible positive effects of these agencies.

It is on this basis and with that spirit behind it that the Employers have worked in the present Committee to create a new instrument to replace Convention No. 96.

What has the Committee achieved?

First, on the proposed Convention, I want to say at this point already that I believe that the proposed new Convention on private employment agencies, is regarded by the Employers' group as a good instrument which governments should be in a position to ratify. I will add that Conventions that governments can ratify are what the ILO needs.

There are three main reasons for this position. First of all, already in the Preamble, the proposed Convention underlines the importance of flexibility in the functioning of labour markets — of central importance in the report of the 1994 Conference — and a recognition of the role which private employment agencies can play in a well-functioning labour market.

Secondly, the new Convention not only replaces Convention No. 96, it also extends its scope very considerably, including in its definition of actors the temporary work agencies as well as the other activities undertaken by private employment agencies. It effectively does away with the monopoly philosophy so prevalent in Convention No. 96 by stating in Article 2, paragraph 3: "One purpose of this Convention is to allow the operations of private employment agencies".

Thirdly, and of equal importance, the paragraph just quoted continues with the words "as well as the protection of workers using their services".

Protection of workers is not a part of old Convention No. 96. The Employers recognize that, as the monopoly of the State is abandoned, a large part of the Convention should be concerned with protecting workers' rights in an appropriate manner, in order to balance the liberalization of the activities allowed to the private employment agencies. We believe that in the proposed Convention such a balance has been achieved.

Finally, but not less importantly, and also in the spirit of the conclusions of the 1994 Conference, governments have been given the wide freedoms necessary to apply the Articles of the Convention in their own national contexts.

Thus, as I mentioned a while ago, the Employers support this new Convention and feel that is it perfectly amenable to ratification. At the end of the Committee's work, we were happy to hear that many governments indicated that they would in fact be in a position to ratify this instrument. We sincerely hope, therefore, that in the near future Convention No. 96 will disappear and become history, where it belongs.

As to the proposed Recommendation, the Employers are much less satisfied. Some of its provisions can be interpreted as suggesting to governments that they follow a course of stricter regulation, which is removed from the spirit of the 1994 Conference conclusions. In addition, Employers have consistently argued that the Recommendations should not be used as catch-all sacks, where one can blend all sorts of issues, but that the role of Recommendations should be to provide sensible advice to governments.

On the other hand, the Employers are aware that implicit in the word "Recommendation" is the other concept of "according to national law and practice", which allows governments freedom to implement the suggestions as they see fit.

The negative elements in Recommendations, as the Employers see them, should therefore not overshadow the positive results achieved in the proposed Convention.

Let me say a few words about how the Committee worked. The Committee dealt with a subject which was difficult both in its technical parts and the challenges presented by legal interpretations. The groundwork which had been laid by the secretariat, first in its document presented to the 1994 Conference, later in the report from that Conference and in the reports preparing this Conference, is excellent and deserves much praise.

However, in the actual proceedings of this Conference problems have arisen on a number of occasions which could have been dealt with in a better way. This is offered as a positive criticism, and I sincerely think that a prestigious organization like the ILO should accept it as a modest attempt to contribute to its further improvement. I ask the secretariat therefore to reflect on the work of this Committee, so as to be better prepared in the future for the intricacies of the proceedings and the legal interpretations, thus contributing to progress.

It would not be fair, however, if I did not underline that the work was even more difficult due to the fact that this revision of Convention No. 96 was given only a single discussion which, in the Employers' view, is insufficient for such a complex task.

These somewhat critical remarks should not reflect negatively on the fact that we have, after all, achieved — I repeat — a proposed Convention which the Employers support and which governments should be able to ratify.

Ms. O'DONOVAN (Workers' delegate, Ireland; Worker Vice-Chairperson of the Committee on the Revision of Convention No. 96) — The Workers' group fully endorses this report on the revision of Convention No. 96 and supports the texts of both the draft Convention on private employment agencies and its accompanying Recommendation. Indeed, we believe that these draft instruments represent another major step in standard setting in the field of recruitment and placement workers which started with the foundation of this Organization in 1919.

Some standards exist that are to be continually and universally valid, such as those standards contained in the Conventions dealing with freedom of association, collective bargaining, discrimination, forced and child labour. Other standards are more contingent on particular historical, institutional and economic realities. Convention No. 96 on the fee-charging employment agencies is one such Convention which needed to be adapted to present-day labour market realities in order to maintain its relevance and its effectiveness.

This was recognized by the Workers' group in 1994 when it joined the consensus on the need to revise Convention No. 96. As a direct follow-up on this consensus, these two new draft instruments have been prepared which we believe respond to the new economic and social realities and should bring greater certainty and stability and greater efficiency to the labour market.

In the Workers' group we recognize that the world of labour and thus the world with which the ILO must deal, has changed dramatically since 1949, when Convention No. 96 was adopted. These changes stem partly from a prolonged period of slow economic and employment growth, particularly over the last two decades. However, they also result from rapid technological change, significant demographic changes, the expansion of the services sector in industrialized countries and the continued growth of the informal sector in developing and transitional countries. In virtually all industrialized countries there has been an explosion of non-traditional forms of employment, including part-time, casual, contract labour, temporary work, home work and tele-working. There have also been more favourable trends, such as the increased participation of women in the labour force and the emphasis placed on numerical and functional flexibility in all labour markets.

In many quarters the ILO has been criticized for failing to reflect and adapt to these changes. Without doubt this criticism has been warranted at times. Today, however, the Conference has before it two new instruments which address and respond in a realistic way to certain components of these labour market changes.

The new aspect dealt with in this draft Recommendation and Convention is employment through temporary work agencies. As Mr. Magnussen has pointed out, this is a booming business which enjoys profits that run into many millions of dollars. Indeed, as a direct result of the revision of Convention No. 96 these temporary work agencies will now be able to expand into many countries where their activities were previously prohibited or severely curtailed.

If this expansion of temporary work agencies creates additional quality jobs and gives rise to greater labour market efficiency and transparency, it will be a welcome development. However, we all know that temporary jobs are not usually high-quality jobs and that far too often they are used to undermine the wages and conditions of workers in regular, full-time employment, or indeed to undermine trade union organizations. Therefore, the difficult task which we faced on this Committee in preparing these new instruments was to find the correct balance between facilitating a greater role for private employment agencies in the labour market while ensuring that temporary workers received adequate protection and that the stability of the broader industrial relations system was maintained.

I think that it is important that we place our discussion about these two new instruments within the broader framework of ILO trends in recent years. This is not the first year that the ILO has attempted to grapple with the complexities of the modern labour market. In the last few years the ILO has also adopted Conventions on part-time work and home work. Moreover, as everyone is well aware, we have at this Conference reached the mid-point in the development of a new Convention on contract labour.

These are all issues that some have argued were premature for consideration, or too complex to be covered by a Convention. Yet, if we examine in detail the provisions of all these new instruments, it is evident that they have one central theme. All of them set out to establish a very basic level of protection for employees in these various forms of precarious employment.

As the Workers' group examines these draft instruments, we believe that there are three dimensions to them. They set minimum standards of protection, minimum standards for cooperation and minimum standards for promotion in relation to the activities of private employment agencies. The Convention offers protection to workers and jobseekers who are often victims of unscrupulous private employment agencies. It indicates what must be done and what must not be done in this connection. It aims to prevent abuses against migrant workers. Article 5 of the draft Convention provides for equality of opportunity and treatment in access to employment and to particular occupations. Article 6 provides for the protection of personal data held by private employment agencies on workers and jobseekers.

The Convention calls on member States which ratify it to ensure adequate protection for the workers employed by temporary work agencies in relation to freedom of association, collective bargaining, minimum wages, working time and other working conditions. It provides also for the allocation of the respective responsibilities of temporary work agencies and the user enterprises in relation to those terms and conditions of employment. It sends a very clear signal to private employment agencies that they should neither use nor supply child labour.

This is also a standard which promotes cooperation because it draws up the parameters for cooperation between the public employment service and private employment agencies. It defines the relations, interactions and joint decision-making of the main actors in the labour market policy area. Most important amongst these are workers' and employers' organizations and the governments.

Article 3 of the Convention confers the responsibility on governments to determine the conditions governing the operation of private employment agencies in accordance with a system of licensing, certification or other form of regulation if they are not otherwise adequately regulated by the legal system.

As a standard of promotion, this Convention promotes good and fair practices by private employment agencies. It promotes effective consultation between the public authorities and employers' and workers' organizations.

Finally, I would like to highlight the spirit of tripartism which prevailed throughout our deliberations. This atmosphere was created largely by Mr. Ramond, our Chairperson, who left no stone unturned to seek consensus on the most difficult issues involved. We thank him for having successfully steered the work of the Committee in the right direction. I wish also to extend my thanks to Mr. Magnussen, the Employer Vice-Chairperson, and the whole Employers' group for their cooperation and cautious, but determined, defence of their interests in the Committee.

My thanks go also to the governments whose interventions were often decisive in breaking a deadlock in our discussion. I would, of course, also like to thank the secretariat for its usual and quiet efficiency and our Reporter, Ms. Maesela, for her excellent work.

In conclusion, I have no hesitation in commending to you the adoption of this report and of both the draft Convention and the draft Recommendation in the vote which will take place tomorrow.

Original French: Mr. RAMOND (Government adviser, France; Chairperson of the Committee on the Revision of Convention No. 96) — First of all, I would like to tell you what I believe are the characteristics of this revised Convention; and then I will tell you why I feel that all governments should be able to ratify this Convention.

First of all, what are the characteristics of the Convention? I believe them to be threefold. In the first place, it is a modern legal instrument, covering a sector which has developed at an exponential rate of growth in varied forms. In 1994 temporary work agencies alone had a turnover of $80 billion, of which $20 billion was in the United States, where in 20 years the turnover has multiplied by 30. Hundreds of thousands of workers are employed by such agencies throughout the world. It is therefore legitimate for the ILO to take into account these developments in labour relations and seek to ensure the best possible protection for the workers involved.

The second characteristic is that this is a balanced instrument. Private agencies find their legitimacy; workers get protection. This balance was not brought about without debate, conflict and tension, all of which as our work has proceeded, revealed a need for compromise, so as to reach a consensus born not of resignation but of a proper appreciation of the legitimate interests of each party.

The third characteristic is that it is an ambitious instrument, because it takes into account the diversity of situations without sacrificing anything vital. It fits in perfectly with the Director-General's thinking about our standard-setting system. In this respect, it illustrates the importance of the very idea of revision, which does not consist merely of cutting off dead wood but of bringing new blood to give new life to the standard-setting system.

The Director-General's Report talks of absolute respect of fundamental standards, and this was one of the major concerns of our Committee. The Convention is absolutely faithful to the principles of freedom of association and non-discrimination. I think that we need to keep this in mind whenever we are working on Conventions, if only to be consistent with our Organization's priority concern with promoting the fundamental rights of workers, as emphasized in the Report of our Director-General. The ILO's services should also remember this in the assistance they provide to the committees.

Modern, balanced and ambitious, this Convention has to be ratified, and I urge all governments to do so. However, I can already see three kinds of problems that they will need to overcome.

First of all, certain countries, including one with which I am extremely familiar, have had legislative provisions piled one on top of the other over the last four or five years. Though practice is very close to what the Convention advocates, some of the laws and regulations that are still in force are going to have to be revised. But very often they have a strong symbolic value. This is a problem which will need to be overcome, because nostalgia is not a good principle of government.

Other countries have well established industrial relations between powerful, loyal and responsible social partners. They may feel that they do not need revised Convention No. 96 and can carry on as before on the basis of their traditions and interests. I would remind you that Article 11 of the Convention gives as much weight to collective agreements as it does to national legislation. Moreover, these countries, which consider themselves to be exemplary, need to be exemplary also from the point of view of international law. They need to set an example of speedy ratification, which would have the effect of encouraging others.

In a third group of countries there are clear cases of gross abuse. There, ratification would give a solid legal basis for ILO support, whereas non-ratification might give rise to the suspicion that they lack the will to eliminate these abuses.

I am confident in the future of this Convention. Of course I am not its owner, as someone suggested, nor its father, but I do find that our baby is very promising. It is the product of the intense and constructive work of our Reporter, who brilliantly introduced the Convention and told us what is at stake, and of the two Vice-Chairpersons, who represented their groups magnificently and contributed both in the plenary and the group meetings to a thorough examination of these legal instruments. Each of them has displayed great competence and great enthusiasm. I think that their enthusiasm has been felt by everyone; they did not only represent the interests of a particular party but strove to bring about a consensual instrument which was a reflection of the general interest. It is because of this enthusiasm that we have been able to come up with positive compromises.

My dear colleagues from the Government group were of course of great assistance particularly for the governments with problems. These governments told us clearly what their problems were, explaining patiently in certain areas (I am thinking about age, about handicaps) that the Convention needed flexibility, and we took this into account. I think that the instrument before you for adoption tomorrow, is all the better because the governments, particularly those with problems, have given us clearly to understand what their problems are and have obliged us to come up with solutions to these problems.

I would not want to forget to thank my two neighbours, Hedra Sarfati and Jean Courdouan, whom I have known for a long time and whom I respect for their professional skills. I think that the trouble I caused them by losing my papers and not always listening to their advice and hard work that we all did make it possible for me now — if they will allow it — to think of them as friends. And I would like to thank all of the colleagues who have shown the right spirit of impartiality and who have always made themselves available. When you have spent a night or a large part of the night working for a committee, it is very much to your credit to be able to greet the members of the committee with a smile, as if you have had a good night's sleep. I am very grateful to them for their smiling availability.

Our Legal Adviser was of course vital, because whenever we were on the verge of coming up with an agreement on policy it still had to be brought into line with the provisions of our Constitution. He was always there with his legal strictness and his political flexibility, so that problems which I myself felt to be insurmountable were, in fact, overcome.

Finally, I have to thank the interpreters who have saved me from my linguistic isolation. The only thing that I regret, as I already said in our Committee, is that we cannot see them. I think that their interpretation was done with such subtlety that they also contributed to the smooth running of our Committee.

I think that the Conference is going to adopt the revised Convention and the Recommendation tomorrow. I trust that this will be a unanimous vote, and I hope that you will all act as spokespersons with your governments to help bring about speedy ratification.

The PRESIDENT — Thank you, Mr. Ramond, for your excellent statement and for the excellent job you have done together with your colleagues on the Committee.

Now I open the general discussion on the report of the Committee on Convention No. 96.

Mr. KRUSE (Government adviser, Sweden) — Convention No. 96 as it stands was adopted in 1949, but it is born of the realities of the early twentieth century. It reflects the concerns of workers, employers and governments faced with rapidly changing labour markets in many countries in the beginning of this century.

Sweden was for a very long time one of the strongest guardians of the principles behind the Convention, i.e. the promotion of a free public employment service and the abolition of private employment agencies in order to avoid the exploitation of workers and jobseekers. But over time realities and values change. My country, which has a very strong public employment service, denounced the Convention in 1992. We did so because we found that private employment agencies also have an important role to play in the development of a well-functioning labour market in our country.

We therefore welcomed the decision of the ILO to start a process aiming at a possible revision of the Convention when we joined the general discussion on this item in 1994. The end in view was a revised Convention of a modern kind, strong enough to establish good protection for the workers concerned against abuses, but which could also suit the needs of businesses and suit the different labour market environments in the various parts of the world.

My delegation is pleased with the outcome of this process and the results now achieved in the Committee on the revision of Convention No. 96. We feel that the new draft Convention is flexible enough to suit various national conditions. We also feel that it establishes good and necessary safeguards for workers seeking employment or employed by temporary work agencies or similar undertakings. We think that it also ought to satisfy the needs of business, because it recognizes that there is a space for private enterprise in the pursuit of a well-functioning labour market; it recognizes the existence of temporary work agencies as well, and seeks to promote good and fair business practices.

The end result is a labour standard from which all parties concerned could gain, a win-win Convention. I think this is true also for the Recommendation. These instruments therefore are good examples of how ILO standards can be drafted to suit the need of the twenty-first century. They prove that the ILO — that is, the social partners and governments together — is able to adapt to the needs of a changing world and set new and modern labour standards. The tool is hard tripartite work. To me it is obvious that this hard tripartite work in our Committee, and the honest will to listen to each others arguments and to understand the interests and concerns of others, have created the environment, creativity and search for consensus which has made this new Convention possible.

I am gratified to have been allowed to take part in the long process of revising Convention No. 96. I join the proposers that these instruments be adopted by the Conference and I am proud to take this Convention home to my authorities and advise them to take the necessary steps to have it ratified by Sweden.

Mr. STEYNE (Workers' adviser, United Kingdom) — On behalf of the Trades Union Congress which represents 7 million trade unionists in Great Britain, I should like to make a few observations on the newly revised Convention and the Recommendation on private employment agencies, and on the work of our technical committee.

First, we have produced a very straightforward instrument. It is simple and relevant, it embodies the flexibility needed to be widely applicable, and it is therefore extremely ratifiable.

Our work was informed by the general discussion at the 1994 Conference. It was also informed of course by the often harrowing experiences of working people around the world: migrant workers who are tricked into paying large sums of money in advance to private agencies for jobs abroad, only to find that their placement fees and travel costs have led them into virtual debt bondage, or that there is no job at all; workers who find that both the private agency and the user enterprise deny responsibility for paying wages; or workers who are used as cheap, transient labour precisely to undercut existing collectively agreed wage levels, used therefore by some unscrupulous employers to put further pressure on the downward spiral of wages and conditions.

The instruments deal with these matters. The revised Convention has a main and simple purpose, to ensure that workers placed or employed by private employment agencies enjoy those key rights in employment proclaimed in the fundamental human rights Conventions of the ILO, rights to freedom of association and collective bargaining, the right to be employed and work without discrimination — basic human rights in employment which should be enjoyed by all working people, whether in typical or atypical employment relationships.

That has been a main aim of our work in the Conference in recent years. In dealing with the need to protect part-time workers, homeworkers, workers placed or employed by private employment agencies, and now of course contract labour too, we are seeking to make explicit that those basic minimum standards should apply to all workers. In that sense we are not breaking new judicial ground. We are seeking to ensure that the ILO fulfils its core mandate, the protection of working people, through its core means of action, international labour standards, at a time when a globalized and increasingly deregulated and casualized labour market poses real threats to the livelihoods, security and dignity of working people. What is new is our sense of urgency of the need to guarantee to the many millions of workers on the edges of the labour market — an edge which represents an ever-growing sector — equal access to those key rights at work.

That is the key. This new Convention confers upon workers placed or employed by private employment agencies equal rights to freedom of association and collective bargaining. No more, no less. Our one regret in the final draft of the instrument, is, therefore, that the provision regarding strikebreaking appears in the Recommendation and not in the Convention. For it is certainly true that replacement of strikers is a clear threat to freedom of association. No worker can enjoy a genuine right to strike or to bargain collectively if private employment agencies are permitted to supply strikebreakers. I would therefore remind all governments of their existing obligations under Conventions Nos. 87 and 98.

My organization, the Trades Union Congress, has always favoured public provision of employment services over private agencies. But we recognize, as did the 1994 Conference, that private agencies exist. In some countries they have gained considerable ground — in some cases they may even be the largest single employer in the private sector. Very few, if any, of the governments of those countries will wish to abolish them. Those private agencies need to be permitted to function, but only within the clear parameters of this Convention which can protect working people and prevent abuse.

But this Convention poses no threat whatsoever to those member States which have a purely public employment service, and wish to maintain a purely public employment service. If your government has ratified the original Convention No. 96 and wishes to maintain its obligations under that Convention, it can do so. Nothing in this revision threatens your right to continue to uphold Convention No. 96. To those governments, I say simply: please be clear today. You can, and indeed should, vote tomorrow for the adoption of this revised Convention. It does not threaten your own continued attachment to Convention No. 96. But please do not deny, to those of us who work in countries where private employment agencies do operate, this means of regulating their activities through an international labour standard. Only by adopting this Convention tomorrow will you allow those member States the possibility of ratifying it in the future.

Finally, I should like to thank my colleagues in the Committee, Ms. Maesela, our excellent Reporter — I have to say that it is of some considerable satisfaction to us that the new South Africa has provided two of the three Reporters of this year's technical committees — Mr. Ramond, our congenial and flexible Chairperson, Mr. Magnusson, for his pragmatic approach, the secretariat, both of the Committee and of the Workers' group, the interpreters who had to deal with a very technical debate, and above all, Sister O'Donovan for her magnificent chairing of the Workers' group.

I commend the report to Conference and urge all delegates to vote tomorrow for the adoption of the new instruments.

The PRESIDENT — Let us now move to the adoption of the body of the report, paragraphs 1 to 543.

May I take it that paragraphs 1 to 543 of the report are adopted.

(The report is adopted — paragraphs 1 to 543.)

PROPOSED CONVENTION CONCERNING PRIVATE EMPLOYMENT AGENCIES: ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT — We shall now proceed to the adoption of the proposed Convention concerning private employment agencies.

May I take it that the proposed Convention, as a whole, is adopted?

(The proposed Convention, as a whole, is adopted.)

PROPOSED RECOMMENDATION CONCERNING PRIVATE EMPLOYMENT AGENCIES: ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT — We now proceed to the adoption of the proposed Recommendation concerning private employment agencies.

May I take it that the proposed Recommendation, as a whole, is adopted?

(The proposed Recommendation, as a whole, is adopted.)

In accordance with paragraph 7 of article 40 of the Conference Standing Orders, the provisions of this Convention and Recommendation will be submitted to the Conference Drafting Committee for the preparation of the final text.

We have now concluded our consideration of the report as well as the proposed Convention and Recommendation submitted to us by the Committee on the Revision of Convention No. 96. I wish to thank all the Officers and members of the Committee as well as the staff of the secretariat for the excellent work that they have done.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON JOB CREATION IN SMALL AND MEDIUM-SIZED ENTERPRISES: SUBMISSION, DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION.

The PRESIDENT — We will now proceed with the next item on our agenda this morning, which is the consideration and adoption of the report of the Committee on Job Creation in Small and Medium-sized Enterprises, which you will find in Provisional Record No. 17.

I give the floor to Mr. Bryant, Government adviser, Canada, to submit the report on behalf of Mr. Ott, Reporter of the Committee.

Mr. BRYANT (Government adviser, Canada; Acting Reporter of the Committee on Job Creation in Small and Medium-sized Enterprises) — I have the honour to present to you the report of the Committee on Job Creation in Small and Medium-sized Enterprises. The report including the conclusions of the Committee, is before you in Provisional Record No. 17.

The Governing Body of the International Labour Organization decided in March 1995 at its 262nd Session, to place an item on general conditions to stimulate job creation in small and medium-sized enterprises on the agenda of the 85th and 86th Sessions of the International Labour Conference, with a view to adopting a Recommendation on that subject. The Committee had before it Conference reports V(1) and V(2). These reports formed the basis of discussions in the Committee. The Office reports were appreciated as a helpful analysis of the issues surrounding the subject of job creation in small and medium-sized enterprises. They greatly facilitated the discussions of the Committee. In our work and in our report, the Committee acknowledges the growing importance of the small and medium-sized enterprise sector in a number of respects. In addition to the fundamental role SMEs play in employment generation, they are also effective in mobilizing domestic, human, financial and material resources. They often strengthen linkages with other sectors in the economy, thus leading to a more flexible and diversified economic base. This in turn spreads opportunity, knowledge and skills more widely in the community.

The Committee also recognizes that SMEs provide the potential for women and other traditionally disadvantaged groups to gain improved access to productive, sustainable and quality employment opportunities. We also recognize that the proposed instruments should promote respect for core Conventions of the ILO related to freedom of association, collective bargaining, the right to organize, forced labour and discrimination, in order to enhance the creation of quality employment in small and medium-sized enterprises.

Members of the Committee identified opportunities of assisting in the important work of elimination of child labour. Committee discussions identified the importance of concerted tripartite action at several levels as fundamental to the promotion of quality job creation in the small and medium-sized enterprise sector. In terms of overall policy and legal framework, issues of stability and review from an SME perspective were highlighted, as was the development of an enterprise culture favouring initiative and enterprise creation, productivity, environmental consciousness, good labour and industrial relations and equitable social practices.

A set of guidelines emerged with regard to the development of an effective SME service infrastructure. Specific roles for employers' and workers' organizations were identified, as were a range of suggestions for international cooperation in the subject.

I am pleased to note that the conclusions proposed by the Committee are both comprehensive and future-oriented.

We have made a good start on the development of a Recommendation which will provide valuable guidance to all Members. The Committee's work was generally characterized by a good spirit of cooperation among Government, Worker and Employer members and we were well supported by the staff.

In conclusion, I recommend to you for adoption the document submitted by the Committee on Job Creation in Small and Medium-sized Enterprises.

Mr. JEETUN (Employers' delegate, Mauritius; Employer Vice-Chairperson of the Committee on Job Creation in Small and Medium-sized Enterprises) — As the Employers' spokesperson, it is a great pleasure for me to support the adoption of the Proposed Conclusions of the Committee on Job Creation in Small and Medium-sized Enterprises. This is a result of lengthy discussions in a spirit of understanding and constant dialogue that has taken place at the committee level. It has been an enriching experience for all of us and I would like to thank the Chairperson, Ms. Danuta Mozdzenska-Mrozek, from Poland, who ably led the discussions with a lot of patience, as well as the Workers' spokesperson, Mr. Agyei, for the cordial and professional manner in which the debate took place.

I should also thank the Office for their valuable support and assistance that helped our deliberations tremendously, not forgetting the interpreters as well for a job very well done. A word of thanks is due to my Employer colleagues for their useful contribution, guidance and unflinching support during the Committee.

Job creation is one of the top economic priorities of most countries which are plagued by high rates of unemployment. Unemployment, on the scale that it exists today in many developed and developing countries, is a cause of growing concern and apprehension among all segments of society, not only because it embodies a wealth of valuable human resources but also because of its human, social, economic and political repercussions.

In such a difficult and challenging environment, small and medium-sized enterprises appear as a silver lining on the horizon. They can be instrumental in minimizing the impact of unemployment and in cushioning the impact of recession by providing the means of livelihood for the bulk of the population in many countries.

The importance of SMEs is, today, fully recognized in terms of their contribution to employment, gross domestic product and exports.

It is not a coincidence that the International Labour Conference is discussing this topical issue of job creation in SMEs. In doing so, the ILO is in the forefront of action to combat unemployment. It is a highly respected international body and its present deliberations cannot but have a positive impact on the ILO itself. It is concerned with the serious problem of unemployment, it is concerned with the creation of jobs, it is concerned with devising a good and flexible instrument that should be a landmark for all countries to stimulate job creation.

SMEs can create productive jobs, especially in the private sector, without being a burden on the state finances. SMEs have, in fact, created jobs in many countries; and those countries that have been successful in promoting SMEs have reaped the benefits that accrue in terms of enhanced economic growth, higher per capita income, better standards of living, improved health and education opportunities.

SMEs are thus playing a crucial economic and social role. In order to do so SMEs have to be competitive, particularly in the era of globalization. As the report prepared by the Office states "the objective for SMEs is to remain flexible and competitive by upgrading quality and productivity". This is the crux of the problem; the flexibility, competitiveness, quality and productivity are all important determinants of their success and it is our duty to ensure, in an instrument, that we promote these four determinants.

The SMEs can deliver the goods provided the environment is conducive to the growth of enterprises. All enterprises — small, medium, large — form a continuum and coexist. All of them belong to the same family and stand on the basic foundation of private enterprise, the main characteristics of which are risk-taking, initiative, entrepreneurship, innovation, etc.

We therefore lay particular emphasis on a flexible framework that will promote, rather than stifle, SMEs. There is a need for an enabling environment, some of the ingredients of which may be listed, such as: political stability, good governance, acceptance of the concept of mixed economy and market mechanism, effective and consistent policies — fiscal, monetary, trade, wage, etc. — appropriate investment incentives, rationalization of government regulations and elimination of bureaucracy, investment in infrastructure and investment in human capital.

We have in front of us the Proposed Conclusions that will no doubt help create this enabling environment and promote an enterprise culture. These Conclusions also recognize the role of government, of the social partners and international organizations. The Conclusions embody an element of flexibility essential for SMEs to operate and create jobs.

As I mentioned in my opening remarks to the Committee, the Managing Director of the prestigious World Economic Forum said at the ILO Enterprise Forum last year: "In the old economy it was the big fish which was eating the small fish. This is, today, irrelevant. Today, it is the fast fish which eats the slow fish. It is not any more a question of size. It is a question of flexibility and speed."

The government plays the leading role and it should continue to play a leading role to create a business-friendly environment and to encourage the spirit of entrepreneurship and enterprise culture. The social partners, on their part, can also offer assistance and support for the development of SMEs. The international organizations, like the ILO, can also offer technical assistance and expertise, particularly in the field of training and productivity improvement so that SMEs can flourish. Productivity and quality can be enhanced through training.

The ILO itself has spearheaded many projects and programmes in this respect, and it can contribute significantly to these objectives since it has a high degree of expertise and a strong comparative advantage in this field. The assistance and involvement of the ILO in the promotion of small and medium-sized enterprises is well known, and in these Proposed Conclusions I think that we take cognizance of the role that has been played, not only by the ILO here, but also by the Turin Centre in Italy.

The ILO has a wider role to play as well. The ILO will have the duty and responsibility to propagate the instrument, when it is adopted, to all parts of the world.

We of the Employers' group fully endorse the proposed conclusions and we look forward to similar fruitful discussions next year.

Shakespeare says that men sometimes are masters of their fate. We, today, have an opportunity to shape our destiny by working together in a true tripartite spirit. All of us can act in unity to promote productive job creation by SMEs which will be beneficial, not only to the social partners, not only to the governments in our respective countries, but to the entire population in the world at large.

Mr. APPIAH AGYEI (Workers' delegate, Ghana; Worker Vice-Chairperson of the Committee on Job Creation in Small and Medium-sized Enterprises) — On behalf of the Workers' group, it gives me great pleasure to speak in this session and to recommend to you the endorsement of the Conclusions of our Committee on general conditions to stimulate job creation in small and medium-sized enterprises.

The Workers' group supports the preparation of a Recommendation on this subject for adoption by the Conference next year. SMEs are responsible for most of the job creation throughout the world; they provide the potential for women and other traditionally disadvantaged groups to gain access to productive, sustainable and quality employment opportunities.

At the same time, the concern of the Workers' group in this area has been that SMEs are also characterized by much worse terms and conditions of employment, lower social protection, reduced trade union representation, and worse working conditions. The rate of occupational accidents is considerably higher in the SME sector, which is a source of particular concern. Child labour, too, is a problem which is essentially confined to the SME sector.

For these reasons, we would draw your attention to the emphasis placed by this draft Recommendation on respect for the core Conventions of the ILO, and on the importance of the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155). In this regard, the draft Recommendation emphasizes the need for measures and enforcement mechanisms to safeguard the interests of workers in SMEs, in accordance with the basic protection under other relevant instruments. It speaks of the need for policies which ensure the equal application of labour legislation, in order to raise the quality of employment in SMEs. It calls for the observance by SMEs of international labour standards related to child labour, and it recommends specific measures for assisting and upgrading the informal sector to become part of the organized sector.

With regard to these problems, the draft instrument calls for the extension of social protection to workers in SMEs. It states that Members should ensure compliance by SMEs with social security regulations. In order to develop an effective SME infrastructure, the Conclusions recommend assistance and services in respect of workers' rights and gender equality. They specifically mention the need to help disadvantaged categories such as women, the long-term unemployed, young persons, the disabled, and persons affected by structural adjustment. They promote, economically and socially, progressive restructuring, and they call for the full respect of freedom of association.

At this juncture I would like to pay tribute to our distinguished Chairperson for her patience and forbearance in enabling us to accomplish our task. I also would like to express the appreciation of the Workers' group for the patience, cooperation and understanding of my colleague, the Employers' spokesperson, who enabled us to come this far.

I would like to express our appreciation and thanks to our Legal Adviser, whose advice made it possible for us to come out of the legal problems that confronted us at certain stages of our work. I would also like to commend all the members of the Committee for their discipline and understanding. The support that we received from the Officers, the Office and the Enterprise and Cooperative Development Department, too, enabled us to resolve all the difficulties that faced us, and made it possible for us to accomplish our task.

The Workers' group therefore considers that the ILO is now well on the way to achieving a balanced Recommendation which can, at the same time, achieve an increase in the quality, as well as the quantity, of job creation in small and medium-sized enterprises.

Therefore, with these words I would like to recommend these Conclusions to the Conference for adoption.

Ms. MOZDZENSKA-MROZEK (Government adviser, Poland; Chairperson of the Committee on Job Creation in Small and Medium-sized Enterprises) — During this 85th Session we initiated the debate on small and medium-sized enterprises. The task of the Committee was to develop an international instrument to stimulate the job creation process in small and medium-sized enterprises.

In view of the prevailing stagnant level of wage employment usual in all parts of the world, the topic under discussion has been of central importance for ILO Member countries.

It appears in the last 15 years or so that small businesses are increasingly becoming an alternative to wage employment and a significant means of combating unemployment. There is no doubt any longer that sustainable and equitable economic growth cannot be achieved without a contribution by the SMEs. They, in fact, account for the vast majority of existing, and particularly new, jobs in both OECD and developing countries. The small and medium-sized enterprises sector is growing strongly, especially in transition economy countries, as in my country, Poland, where large-scale restructuring, privatization and free market principles are of relatively recent origin. During the past few years we have learned how difficult it is to transform large state enterprises into smaller, efficient units. We have experienced high and social costs, especially accelerating unemployment. We also have learned the hard way that deregulating the market is not enough to guarantee prosperity.

The discussion in the Committee has shown that all countries are facing difficulties of their own in job creation, in securing decent working conditions, and especially in combating unemployment. In the international context a coherent proactive, even visionary, policy is needed in order to benefit from the process of globalization. Close cooperation between the social partners is absolutely essential if we would like to ensure a coherent economic and social policy. An effective service delivery system and a regulatory environment that combines economic efficiency and job creation must go hand in hand with adequate social standards, working conditions and social protection.

The Office's report, widely recognized as being of excellent quality, was an important guide and fruitful reference for the Committee. As a result of the efforts of the Committee and its Working Party, we are now in a position to present to you a report which contains a number of Conclusions reflecting the common ground of the debate.

I note with satisfaction that the report and the Conclusions reflect the forward-looking, constructive quality of the discussion which took place within the Committee. I believe that it augers well for the finalization, in the course of next year's deliberations, of a possible Recommendation which can provide valuable and lasting guidance to Members in their efforts to address employment challenges through the creation of conditions to generate substantial numbers of quality jobs in SMEs.

The fact that the work of the Committee progressed in a satisfactory manner was of course due to the high spirit of cooperation displayed by all concerned parties. I would like to address my most sincere thanks to all who have contributed to the success of the Committee's work. I would like in particular to thank the two Vice-Chairpersons, Mr. Jeetun for the Employers' group and Mr. Appiah Agyei for the Workers' group, who both greatly assisted me and provided appropriate guidance to the Committee, maintaining the high level of the debate.

It is to a great extent to Mr. Jan Ott from the Netherlands that we owe the adoption in a very short period of time of the report, which is rich in ideas and suggestions and which will certainly be extremely useful to future discussions of the subject.

I would like also to express my sincere thanks to the Government representatives, in particular, Mr. Chris Bryant from Canada who coordinated the work of the Working Party.

Finally, I would like to thank Mr. Masaru Ishida, the Director-General's representative, and the staff of the Enterprise and Cooperative Development Department for having prepared highly professional documentation and for providing excellent secretariat, legal and translation services for the Committee.

Since the contents of the documents adopted by the Committee has already been summarized by the Reporter and the two Vice- Chairpersons of the Committee, I would like to conclude by recommending to you for adoption the documents submitted by the Committee on Job Creation in Small and Medium-sized Enterprises.

The PRESIDENT — The floor is now open for discussion.

Mr. ANAND (Employers' adviser, India) — To give shoulder to a good cause, particularly when it serves a public purpose, is a bounden duty of all human beings. They owe it to society. It is in this context that I stand here to support the extremely useful and highly purposeful document introduced by my friends and commended by the venerable lady from Poland, Ms. Mrozek, and highly recommended by Mr. Jeetun and Mr. Appiah Agyei. I have closely watched them working together, which has been an index of a cooperative spirit, in fact fresh air, in distinction from that of confrontation which is generally noted otherwise in discussions, bipartite or tripartite. My congratulations to them for the spirit in which they have concluded their labours and produced a joint charter of demands by the social partners. This has been equally due to the constructive approach and positive minds of the officials assisting in this Committee. Since the governments have been a party spontaneously, one may hope for their wholesome resources allocation and adequate action programme at a rapid pace for implementation by all concerned.

Being one who has worked very closely in 1986 with Mr. Santos Neves who piloted the Employers' viewpoint in the landmark resolution mentioned in the documents, I feel gratified that after all the Copenhagen Summit has moved the ILO towards further action. Even though the ILO has been concerned with world employment issues since 1975 and has taken some measures here and there, it has awakened only recently to the issue of action programmes in training and SME development, including entrepreneurship, self- employment and enterprise consolidation.

Nevertheless, it has yet a long way to go to carry conviction that it can be an effective instrument in the alleviation and eradication of poverty through employment generation on a sustainable basis in desirable directions. This document is only a starting point and not a termination point of the long journey in this behalf, as rightly stressed by my colleague the United States Government delegate at the meeting.

Though the document clearly demarcates roles and spells out areas and issues, it would need to be followed up for categorization of points of programme of advanced action, be these concerned with technical, physical or social infrastructure or with the establishment of industrial estates, by the examination of pollution and environment-linked issues. State-owned big enterprises have been in my own country a foundation to tertiary, component, resourcer and supplier or service-giving SMEs, and continued emphasis on their reform, efficiency and productivity cannot be over-stressed. Cost of regulatory administration per worker or per unit cost of production in SMEs is a matter of concern for administrations as its burden will inevitably throttle SMEs capacity in a competitive environment. Emphasis on social justice and adequate protection for workers, though rightly placed in concept, has to follow and not precede the establishment of viable unit SMEs. Imposition of preconditions and advance action can be counter-productive in employment generation, in particular where the entrepreneur is first generation and provides core capital through the sale of family belongings to attract further institutional finance. Our Worker colleagues, well meaning as they generally are, have to be frank and firm so that the hen which lays the golden egg is not prematurely killed or obliged to fade away.

My concerns, which arise from ground-level experience of SMEs' industrial development over half a century, prompt me also to stress the need for constant follow-up review, within the ILO's relevant technical cooperation committees and other departments, which need budgetary support. MDTs will have to recast their country objectives, and the specialists in employment will have to reorient their outlook so as to promote action programmes at the ground level, local administrative level or social-partner level. These action programmes must be adapted to specific areas or regions in each country, in order to carry out the objectives of the current exercise. They have to move out of the world of trends and abstract statistics.

It should not be forgotten that any SME is as much an enterprise as any MNE or large multi-purpose undertaking. Therefore, the concept of enterprise being the core factor needs to be imbibed by all stakeholders. If an enterprise is viable, buoyant and prosperous, all stakeholders gain. In its initial stages it has to be dealt with on the dictum of "nurse the baby, protect the child and free the adult". Patience, perseverance and tenacity therefore are hallmark prerequisites for all the actors involved in it. Flexibility and personal factors, and not rigidity or indifference, pay dividends in industrial relations matters. Likewise, a jargon-oriented, traditional trade union approach often frightens small entrepreneurs and therefore can be self-defeating. I hope the spirit reflected in the deliberations of this Committee and the production of this excellent document will continue to prevail in future deliberations, so that we can carry out a common approach to enterprise development for the greater societal good. This alone will justify the involvement of the ILO. This approach alone will contribute to job creation on a sustainable basis.

I and my colleagues strongly recommend the document for unanimous acceptance.

Mr. POTTER (Employers' delegate, United States) — I am presenting these remarks on behalf of J.W. Kisling who was my adviser on the job creation Committee. J.W. Kisling is an owner and chairman of a small and medium-sized enterprise in the United States, who has run a successful business for over 30 years now with over 200 employees. This would not have been possible without a legal and regulatory system in the United States that allowed his company to realign and restructure itself to changing market circumstances. His concerns with the draft Recommendation on general conditions to stimulate job creation in small and medium-sized enterprises centre on the focus of sections D and G of the instrument.

Our tripartite meetings began very productively with a comprehensive agreement about the importance of SMEs in the world's job creation. Unfortunately, a significant part of our discussions generated into a discussion of how to regulate SMEs, standards for workers' benefits and protection of jobs which have yet to be created. These issues are irrelevant to the question of job-creation by SMEs and will stand in the way of creating jobs if these are the focus of countries' concern at the outset of job creation. We have put the cart before the horse, and such an approach will result in more and longer periods of unemployment.

An SME's resources to satisfy the bureaucratic requirements to comply with regulations and standards are limited. The owner-operator wears many hats. We want the SME to be focused on success. We know this from our experience in the United States. At the 1996 White House conference on small business, more than 2,000 delegates unanimously identified standards and regulations as the number one problem impeding small business growth. The United States Government has taken an aggressive approach to reducing paperwork for SMEs. The result has been the lowest United States unemployment rate in 24 years.

In drafting an instrument on job creation, we must not lose sight of the effect of trade between ILO Members. One billion dollars in exports creates 20,000 jobs.

The United States Commerce Department in their Trade Promotion Coordination Committee report last October listed international standards as the number one impediment to trade.

In conclusion, our concern is that in drafting this Recommendation we are falling into the bureaucratic trap of creating standards and regulatory burdens, as opposed to our purpose of describing the general conditions to stimulate job creation in small and medium-sized enterprises. Next year we need to revise the draft Recommendation and focus our purpose on job creation for the sake of the world's unemployed whose numbers are growing.

Original French: The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE — I would like to draw your attention to a typographical error in the French version of the Conclusions of the Committee, on page 44 of Provisional Record No. 17 in French. The first words of point 10(3)(b) should read: "b) s'il conviendrait d'envisager une série de mesures ...". The rest of the text remains unchanged.

The PRESIDENT — We shall now proceed to the adoption of the report.

May I take it that the body of the report, paragraphs 1 to 233, is adopted?

(The report is adopted — paragraphs 1 to 233.)

May I also take it that the proposed Conclusions are adopted?

(The proposed Conclusions are adopted.)

We shall now proceed to the adoption of the draft resolution to place on the agenda of the next ordinary session of the Conference, an item entitled "General conditions to stimulate job creation in small and medium-sized enterprises". May I take it that the Conference adopts the resolution?

(The resolution is adopted.)

We have thus completed our consideration of the report, the Proposed Conclusions and the resolution submitted by the Committee on Job Creation in Small and Medium-Sized Enterprises. I wish to thank the Chairperson and the Vice-Chairpersons, the Reporter and the other members of the Committee, as well as the secretariat staff, for the excellent work they have done.

REPLY BY THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL TO THE DISCUSSION OF HIS REPORT

The PRESIDENT — And now I have the honour to invite Mr. Michel Hansenne, Secretary-General of the Conference and Director-General of the International Labour Office, to reply to the general discussion of his Report.

Original French: The DIRECTOR-GENERAL — Permit me, first of all, to congratulate your assembly on having adopted yesterday — unanimously, save for two abstentions — the budget proposals for 1998-99. You will understand also if I am somewhat less happy that the budget is for some US$481 million, 5.6 per cent less in real terms than the current budget. Through these past years we have been able to absorb the reduction in resources by increasing productivity and streamlining our services in Geneva, you must realize that any further cuts in the future are bound to mean a reduction in the technical assistance and services provided to our constituents in the field, at a time when their needs are growing. The Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee and the Governing Body itself will surely take this into account when they start discussing the next budgetary exercise in a few months' time.

In my reply to the discussion on my 1994 Report dealing with social justice in a global economy, I recalled that we had started on a job which would occupy us for a long time, but that it was up to us and to us alone to be the architects and builders of our future. My Report this year, dealing with standard setting in the ILO, is to my mind a major step in this job of preparing the ILO for the twenty-first century. Thanks to you we have made progress along this path, and I would like to thank the 314 speakers who participated in 11 plenary sessions, particularly the 117 ministers who expressed their views on the Report.

I think that the first result of our debate has been to make us think very carefully. This complex issue, which has been discussed for nearly three years in the Governing Body, has now been brought to the attention of international public opinion by our Conference. The interest that the whole world has shown in this discussion has, I think, increased the importance and visibility of our Organization. Throughout the debate we have been able to remove certain misconceptions and clarify certain misunderstandings. At the same time we have by and large avoided indulging in immoderate language or extreme positions, and have thus made it possible for the Governing Body to see a little more clearly. Indeed I feel — and this is one of the first major conclusions of our Conference — that whatever opinions may have been voiced nobody suggested that we do not continue our work. We now have a year before us to come up with a significant compromise in this area, I believe that we can do so. I cannot imagine that we might fail, bearing in mind the disastrous consequences that that could have for the values in which we believe and for the Organization which we support.

As might have been expected, the section of the Report dealing with the fundamental rights of workers was the subject of a most lively debate. The comments of various delegates representing workers throughout the world on the situations that have been provoked or aggravated by the sudden liberalization of trade are sufficient to convince us of the need for globalization to have some kind of social parallel. As the Prime Minister of Luxembourg, Mr. Juncker, recalled, economic development does not automatically bring social progress even though, to quote the Union Labour Minister of India, Mr. Arunachalam, the purpose of economic development is to promote social progress consistent with human dignity and social justice. This view was shared by many Government ministers and representatives, including Mr. Mboweni, Minister of Labour of South Africa, as well as by a large number of Employers' and Workers' delegates.

The discussion showed that there is a broad consensus on the importance of strengthening fundamental rights, not only because they affect the essential rights of working people but, as the Minister of Labour of Sweden, Ms. Winberg, and the Secretary of State for Labour of the Dominican Republic, Mr. Alburquerque, reminded us, because they are the means of and the condition for promoting the other rights, according to the preferences and possibilities of each country.

Where differences of opinions differ is how to strengthen these fundamental rights. There are two major channels: universal ratification of the seven core Conventions, and the adoption of a solemn declaration on fundamental rights. These two paths are not mutually exclusive; they are complementary.

Many of you welcomed the campaign for the ratification of the core Conventions which we launched in 1995 and whose impact we will be looking at in the Governing Body in November. So far, about 60 ratifications have been recorded and more than 20 are still expected, mainly of the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138). This massive response shows how wrong it is to claim that the ratification of the fundamental standards depends on a country's economic and social development. Very many developing countries have ratified, or have undertaken to ratify, these standards in the very near future. This is extremely encouraging, and with your support this action will be continued and extended. In those countries that really want it we shall continue to provide technical cooperation to help them ratify and apply the core Conventions, as the Minister of Labour of Uganda, Mr. Aiding, suggested.

I said at the beginning of my statement that discussions on the proposal on a draft solemn declaration aimed at reaffirming the universal respect of the fundamental rights of workers have made it possible to clarify a number of points.

As was recalled by many governments, the representative of the Trade Union Advisory Committee of the OECD, Mr. Evans, and the Employers' delegate of Australia, Mr. Noakes, the Governing Body, following the 1994 Session of the Conference, has on several occasions examined the question of the social dimension of the liberalization of trade. A vital conclusion has become clear from the work of the Governing Body: the liberalization of trade and the removing of obstacles to international trade provide the raw material for social progress. However, at the same time this liberalization may pose a danger that uncontrolled international competition becomes "an obstacle in the way of other nations which desire to improve the conditions [of labour] in their own countries", to use the words of the Preamble of our Constitution. The ILO must therefore, in particular through its standard-setting activity, try to bring about a certain parallelism between social progress and economic progress resulting from the liberalization of trade. This is in conformity with the mandate entrusted to the ILO by the World Summit for Social Development of Copenhagen and paragraph 4 of the Ministerial Declaration of the Singapore Conference.

It is, however, clear from certain statements that the results of the fruitful debate which took place on this subject in the Governing Body have not been sufficiently broadcast. I will take the necessary measures to remedy this failure in communication between the Governing Body and our constituents as a whole.

At the end of your discussions, it seems to me that although some countries expressed or made known their disagreement with this initiative of the Governing Body, presented during its March 1997 Session — and we have to examine carefully the reasons for their hesitation or reluctance — a fairly broad consensus has arisen in both the Government group as well as amongst Employers and Workers concerning the principle of the consideration of such a text and the application machinery which will accompany it.

In order to dissipate any last doubts to which this proposal might still give rise, it seems to me important to emphasize once again that it is in no way a question of imposing, through such a declaration, new obligations on member States against their will. The declaration is aimed at reaffirming the logic of the commitments and the values to which States have already freely subscribed in joining the ILO. Is there any need to recall here that membership of the ILO is a voluntary act of the State? But nobody could reproach the Organization for inviting its Members to take seriously such commitments by making them more explicit. This precisely is the meaning of the declaration which is aimed at reiterating the specific scope of the fundamental values which each Member has chosen to support of which, as the international community in Copenhagen and Singapore has recognized, the ILO is the depositary.

The next question concerns the consequences of this reaffirmation of the sense of their commitment. On this point again we need to dissipate any concerns or misunderstanding. The nature of these consequences should arise from the very nature of the declaration. Thus it is not a question of sanctioning violations or failures by means of a judicial procedure. This was recalled by both the Minister for Labour and Manpower Development of Kenya, Mr. Masinde, and the Minister of Social Affairs and Employment of the Netherlands, Mr. Melkert. It is a question of verifying whether, even if it has not ratified the respective Conventions for reasons which may in certain cases be legitimate, a country nevertheless respects the spirit and principles.

There are many ways of devising such a mechanism. At this stage I do not intend to review them all. However, I would like to assure the Conference of my conviction, as reflected in the concern that I have had of associating it from this year in the discussions under way in the Governing Body since 1994, that this mechanism should receive as broad support as possible. The Governing Body will thus continue its work on this subject in accordance with methods which it will itself examine the day after tomorrow. The proposals which will be submitted to the Governing Body in November on the declaration and its application machinery should provide a sufficiently consensual basis and reflect the various sensitivities and make it possible for this vital question to be included on the agenda of the 1998 Session of the Conference.

As regards my proposals relating to a periodic report on social progress throughout the world, I would like to recall that the fact of becoming a Member of the ILO implies not only a commitment to immutable values but to the dynamics of social progress. Each country takes on a commitment to participate actively in associating its workers with the fruits of economic progress, rather than contenting itself with this being done spontaneously, the consequences of which have once again been emphatically emphasized in the UNDP report on human development. Hence the idea of providing references and exchanging information or good practice to encourage such a dynamism by means of a regular report. It goes without saying that such a report was never intended in my mind to dictate to anybody the level of social progress which is appropriate for each stage of economic development. Since 1994 I have repeated constantly that it is not appropriate for anybody, not even the Organization itself, to dictate to its Members what is appropriate for them in terms of social progress. I am encouraged by the support of all of those who have understood the essentially promotional and pragmatic nature of this project. Without doubt it is going to require a great deal more consideration and discussion, but I am reasonably optimistic about the results, because amongst the small number of those who have shown some hesitation concerning this proposal, I believe I can see some possibility of reaching agreement.

The tensions which at certain times marked the discussions on the technical questions on the agenda of this session of the Conference illustrate perfectly the problems referred to in the second part of the Report. They have in particular highlighted the problems of embarking on in-depth discussions, within the short period available to the Conference, of extremely complex technical questions sometimes included in the agenda without there being a clear idea of their shape or content. It seems to me imperative to pursue actively the proposal that new questions should be the subject of a preliminary discussion in order to gain a better idea of a possible instrument before the matter is definitively placed on the agenda of the Conference. This session will have also provided many examples of improvements which could be made to various procedural aspects, and in particular in the drafting of questionnaires. Generally speaking, the ideas and proposals contained in the second part of the Report have attracted interest and support, which I welcome. It is my firm intention to continue this work actively in the Governing Body and in the competent committees.

In the presentation of the work of the Conference committees, I will come back to certain points illustrating the need for a review of the rules and procedures of our standard-setting machinery.

At this stage I will not dwell on the question of the social label which, as Mr. Chotard said, has given rise to considerable agitation and some negative reactions. I will simply emphasize the fact that the proposals on this matter were aimed mainly at initiating debate on a multilateral and essentially voluntary solution, which is very far removed from the philosophy of the social clause. By definition, such a multilateral framework could not be established without there being very broad consensus which is clearly, at the present stage, still lacking. I had made this proposal thinking particularly of the developing countries, which run the risk of being rapidly submerged under private and unilateral labelling systems, the positive and less positive aspects of which are emphasized in the Report. It will be for the Governing Body to decide whether or not to continue the debate on this question. For my part I am convinced that the proliferation of private initiatives of which the Office already has many examples should lead us back to a more tranquil debate on the merits of this approach, as has been suggested by the Minister of Labour and Social Security of Mexico, Mr. Bonilla Garcia.

This session of the Conference has just taken a decision of great historic and symbolic importance, giving itself an effective instrument which will make it possible for it to deal in a transparent and definitive manner with standards which have become "dead wood". This constitutional amendment will give the International Labour Conference the power of abrogating international labour Conventions that the Governing Body and the Conference itself agree to recognize as obsolete. I would like to call upon member States to ratify this amendment, which I would remind you requires ratification by two-thirds of member States, including five of the ten Members with the highest degree of industrial importance, for it to enter into force. If we want to adapt our standard-setting machinery we must lose no time.

The visit of His Majesty King Hussein of Jordan was one of the highlights of the Conference. Recalling the commitments of his country to the values of the ILO, King Hussein welcomed the pragmatic, objective and transparent nature of the ILO's response to the challenge of globalization. On the situation in the Middle East, the King recalled his determination to continue to work to bring about a just global and lasting peace in this region of the world, which will guarantee prosperity for its inhabitants.

The report on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories was the subject of many interventions and statements. The Office must continue and perhaps intensify its technical cooperation efforts in this region to advance the cause of democracy and the fundamental rights of workers, the promotion of employment and the fight against poverty, as well as worker protection. This is without doubt the best possible contribution that the ILO, within its sphere of competence, can make to the efforts to bring about peace in the region.

We also had the pleasure of welcoming in this body Mr. Wolfensohn, President of the World Bank. His presence bore witness to the cooperation which has been established between our two institutions in recent years. We have thus begun to implement together one of the major conclusions of the Copenhagen Summit, calling for closer links between the ILO and the Bretton Woods institutions.

After his statement, ministers and the social partners subjected him to a barrage of questions relating to debt, globalization and social justice. I think that we would all benefit from having this type of brief and effective encounter with formers of public opinion more often — and the Office will take steps to organize further events of this nature at forthcoming sessions of the Conference. I believe that this would help our institution to be more forward-thinking and efficient.

The Committee on Job Creation in Small and Medium-sized Enterprises was called upon to examine all issues relating to job creation in this type of enterprise which, in many countries, is the best placed to create new jobs for a considerable share of the population. The Conclusions adopted with a view to adopting a Recommendation stressed the need to adopt measures to assist small and medium-sized enterprises, as well as specific measures to improve the quality of jobs and protect employment.

The second discussion of this Committee, scheduled to be held at the next session of the Conference, should give rise to the adoption of an autonomous Recommendation. As I suggested in my Report, this type of instrument should no longer be considered as a sort of poor relation in standard setting. In order to ensure this, there should be a mechanism to monitor the implementation of Recommendations so that their relevance can be periodically assessed.

It is useful to recall that the work on the revision of Convention No. 96 was preceded by a general discussion at the 81st Session of the Conference (1994) on the role of private employment agencies in the functioning of labour markets. Without wishing to make this a hard and fast rule, I think we should make use of this procedure more often, especially when concepts are not clearly defined. I would like to think that this procedure was one of the factors which contributed to the successful work of this Committee.

A Convention and Recommendation have just been adopted by the Conference and — as far as their content is concerned — they correspond fairly well to the new type of standard you have been calling for during the discussion of the Report.

The work of the Committee on Contract Labour was difficult. I feel, at this juncture, that it is relevant to try and analyse why the discussions during the plenary were so difficult. The major problem, as I see it, was linked to the very definition of the subject of these standards. Given the lack of preliminary surveys and discussions, which the Office had pointed out was necessary before including this item on the Conference agenda, it was up to the Committee itself to define the scope of the instruments they were called upon to draft. Without in any way wishing to call into question the qualities of the members of the Committee (or of the secretariat), the outcome of its work suffered as a result of this situation. This is an additional illustration, if one were needed, of the pertinence of the suggestions made in Part II and the Annex of the Report.

As usual, the Committee on the Application of Standards examined the reports from the Committee of Experts. More than 60 countries took an active part in the discussions with the Committee, designed to help them make progress in respect of obligations relating to ratified or non-ratified labour standards. If the comments made by the supervisory body sometimes give rise to delicate or difficult problems in the countries concerned, the Office is ready to provide them with any technical assistance they might require, particularly as part of its active partnership policy and missions by the multidisciplinary teams.

The point raised by the representative of the Workers of the Russian Federation, Mr. Shmakov, concerning the repercussions of the overlapping of procedures to examine a case before the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, proves that the time has come to codify and modernize certain aspects of the procedures in question. This is particularly true of the procedures relating to article 24 of the Constitution the provisions of which are extremely rigid and imprecise with respect to other procedures. I can perfectly well understand the frustration — and that is putting it mildly — caused by the lack of any form of code and the apparent lack of clarity as to its action when the interests of millions of workers are at stake. It is thus my firm intention to call upon the competent services to take up urgently the considerations and drafts for reform of this procedure, which have been under way for a number of years, but which now must be very rapidly brought to a conclusion.

Throughout this reply, I have outlined what has seemed to me to be the basic thrust of the debate of the Conference this year. The Conference has taken the opportunity to go into the work carried out by the Governing Body since 1994 in greater depth so as to breathe new life into the standard-setting activities of the ILO. I am convinced that the Governing Body will find your deliberations a source of renewed inspiration.

The PRESIDENT — I thank the Director-General for his most comprehensive reply to the general discussion, as well as for the analysis of the work of the committees.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON CONTRACT LABOUR: SUBMISSION, DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT — We shall now consider the report of the Committee on Contract Labour, which you will find in Provisional Record No. 18.

I give the floor to Mr. Johannes, Government adviser, South Africa, and Reporter of the Committee on Contract Labour, to submit the report.

Mr. JOHANNES (Government adviser, South Africa; Reporter of the Committee on Contract Labour) — I have the honour of presenting the report including the proposed Convention and Recommendation of the Committee on Contract Labour, which are the fruits of the intense and constructive debate and discussions that have taken place over the last two weeks.

At its 262nd Session in March 1996, the Governing Body of the ILO decided to place contract labour on the agenda of this session of the International Labour Conference with a view to the adoption of a proposed Convention and a Recommendation.

The Governing Body has considered law and practice reports on this subject since 1993, but this issue is not new to the ILO, nor are the concerns, as it has been the subject of discussions and resolutions of industrial committee meetings dating back to the 1950s. The Committee had before it reports 61 and 62, both entitled contract labour, which were prepared to shed some light on the subject underlining the problems facing contract workers, and presenting a broad spectrum of existing laws and practices. A number of Committee members enriched the debate by describing the particular problems facing contract workers in their countries, and the approach to addressing these problems that has been taken.

In taking the Office text found in report 62 as the basis for discussion, the Committee first agreed to proceed on the assumption that they were working towards the formulation of a Convention and a Recommendation. While there was strong opposition to this decision expressed in the Committee, in the spirit of tripartism that opposition was respected, as was the decision of the majority of the members of the Committee, and the deliberations continued in a constructive fashion. The Preamble of the proposed Convention recognizes that, having regard to the growing recourse to contract labour, it would be appropriate to adopt new standards with a view to ensuring that contract workers enjoy adequate protection. Consensus regarding the need to protect these workers was reached in the Committee, though there was disagreement as to the nature and extent of that protection.

Certainly all agreed that disguised relationships where contract labour is used as a means of avoiding legal obligations and disadvantaging workers should not be condoned, and protection should be provided. The avenues beyond that, in particular the various types of triangular relationships, were explored in some detail, with a better understanding being reached of the problems and concerns involved.

Considerable debate and discussion surrounded the definition of contract labour. In the end, the relatively broad touchstone of dependency and subordination, was accepted while the scope of the application of the instrument was not narrowed through the exclusion of workers with a recognized contract of employment with the user enterprise.

In this balancing exercise between the definition and the scope, the objective of the Committee was to ensure wide coverage to encompass those who might require protection, while excluding those already benefiting from traditional, secure employment arrangements. This is an area that no doubt will be revisited in next year's discussion of this issue, but much progress has already been made in understanding the various concerns influencing this delicate balancing process.

In addressing the issue of the applicability of fundamental rights to contract workers, on this point there was clear consensus. The Committee unanimously agreed that all workers, regardless of employment status, should receive the same protection with regard to the right to organize and bargain collectively, freedom from discrimination and minimum age. This item has been scheduled for a double discussion, this year's discussion being the first of the two. The importance of the double-discussion process on a topic such as contract labour cannot be underestimated. The main objective of this year's discussion was to prepare the terrain for next year, and that, I believe, was successfully achieved.

At the commencement of the discussions, many members of the Committee were approaching this subject from very different perspectives, and there were many conceptual and definitional questions raised. Through the course of the discussions I am pleased to say that some points were clarified. With respect to others the extent of the differences was reduced, leaving only a very limited area of marked divergence. However, even there the rationale for the differing positions was better understood by the end. As a result, fertile ground for next year's discussion has been prepared, providing a basis for optimism regarding the results that are realistically attainable in finalizing next year a Convention and Recommendation on this important subject, that touches so many workers throughout the world.

It is an honour and a pleasure for me to commend this report to you for your adoption.

Mr. NOAKES (Employers' delegate, Australia; Employer Vice-Chairperson of the Committee on Contract Labour) — In my opening remarks at the commencement of the work of the Committee on Contract Labour, I said that the Employer members of the Committee were implacably opposed to the adoption of instruments on contract labour. Nothing has taken place during the course of the first discussion to change that view. Indeed, the results of the discussion as represented by the draft instruments now proposed by the Committee have reinforced and strengthened our initial view. We remain convinced that contract labour is not a suitable subject for standard setting.

We remain concerned about attempts to draft instruments which are and will be incompatible with the enormous variety of arrangements involving workers who are not employees, and the enormous variety of national approaches to the subject.

We remain concerned about the conceptual and definitional problems involved, and about the differences in terminology from country to country and from language to language.

The attempts which have been made by the Committee to rationalize concepts, definitions, terminology and national approaches can only lead to confusion and to instruments which perform no useful purpose because they are not ratifiable and/or incapable of application.

This outcome is particularly unfortunate at a time when the relevance of standards is being increasingly questioned, and when already standards adopted in recent years are being ignored by many governments.

The Director-General in his Report to the Conference has referred to the problems which have arisen in the standard-setting process, and has put forward some welcome proposals for change.

The experience with contract labour has presented a good example of those problems and serious consideration must be given prior to and during the second discussion to the development of a different approach.

We made it clear during the work of the Committee that we did not support fraudulent or illegal arrangements which sought to deny workers the benefits of an employment relationship. We said that the key issue was whether or not a worker was truly an employee in accordance with national law and practice, and we put forward a proposal for dealing with this key issue. Instead, the Committee has taken an approach which will perpetuate the indeterminate legal status of many workers.

For the purposes of the Committee's discussion, it has been recognized that there are three categories of worker. Firstly the truly independent worker. Secondly the worker who has the legal status of an employee. And thirdly the worker of indeterminate status.

The Committee's proposals do not seek to resolve the issue of the legal status of the third category of worker. Instead, what they seek to do is to ensure that this person will receive some of the benefits received by the person who is truly an employee.

We say that this is fundamentally a wrong approach and that the best answer to any problem which might exist is to determine in appropriate cases that the worker in the third category is in fact an employee and so bring an end to his or her indeterminate status.

The Committee's approach is to seek to allocate responsibility for this third category of worker between the user enterprise, the subcontractor and the intermediary to impose obligations on them and to transmit those obligations from one to another.

We say that where the worker is legally an employee, then the employer must meet the obligations which apply and these should be enforced rather than being transmitted to a third party.

In addition, we do not accept that legitimate enterprises which engage workers under a contract which is not a contract of employment, should have those arrangements interfered with in the way proposed by the Committee. This type of interference will discourage these arrangements which are often to the benefit of both the worker and the enterprise.

We have said repeatedly during the course of this first discussion that the use of relationships other than recognized employment relationships, is an important source of labour market flexibility and job creation. In many countries it is a common practice and a legitimate one. It is a response to changes in the nature of work and in the organization of work and to the inflexibilities and the rigidities which in many cases characterize the traditional employment relationship.

The proposals contained in the report would discourage the use of contract labour and make its use much more difficult. This would not be a good outcome for employers, workers or for governments, which are themselves involved to a significant extent in the use of contract labour. But it is the consequences for efficiency, job creation and economic growth which would be the most serious.

As well as the difficulties of principle which we have with the proposed texts, there are many specific provisions which give us cause for particular concern. I mention some of these so that they might be an aid to the reflection which should now take place.

The application of the concept of dependency or subordination, the treatment of subcontractors and intermediaries, the concept of equality of treatment between contract workers and other workers performing similar work, the apportionment of responsibilities between user enterprises, subcontractors and intermediaries, and the transmission of those responsibilities from one to the other, and the provisions concerning licencing or registration as a precondition to the provision of contract labour.

I want also to say something concerning the role played by government representatives in this Committee.

Repeatedly, a large number of Government representatives were absent during discussions and when votes were taken. Repeatedly, a large proportion of the remaining Government members abstained in voting, and repeatedly important issues were determined by a small majority of governments.

This is not the way in which such important issues should be dealt with. It does not reflect the true spirit of tripartism, which requires active participation in order to be meaningful and the outcome does not reflect the need for there to be a substantial consensus on the issues under discussion, rather than a small majority which, on this occasion, does not include the Employers.

A further matter to which I would draw attention is that many governments which voted in favour of discussion of a Convention and Recommendation, would clearly find it impossible to ratify a Convention on this subject. Indeed I suspect that many would have no intention of doing so, and the remarks contained in the Director-General's Report in this respect are especially appropriate.

However, it is also clear from their statements that a number of Governments which voted in this way in the Committee did so in order to enable a discussion to take place and that they now intend to review their position. We hope that the outcome has convinced them of the accuracy of the Employers' views.

In that context, I wish to refer briefly to the remarks made by some Government members at the conclusion of their discussion concerning their satisfaction with the level of consensus reached. And I want to make it clear that any such consensus does not include the Employers. And I also want to refer to one of the closing remarks of the Chairman, when he said that the remaining differences among the Committee members were superficial in nature. I want to make it clear that for the Employers the remaining differences are not superficial, but are absolutely fundamental.

I want to thank Mr. Parrot, the Worker Vice-Chairman for the cordiality and the good relationships which existed between us, despite our strong differences of opinion. I also want to thank the Reporter, the Chairman, the representatives of the Office and the secretariat for the contribution which they made to our work.

Finally, I want to make some remarks concerning the fact that the Conference is being asked to adopt a resolution which calls for this item to be included in the agenda of its next session so that there might be a second discussion regarding the proposed adoption of a Convention and a Recommendation concerning contract labour.

Our position has been, and it remains, that we do not favour this item as a subject for standard setting. We will not formally oppose adoption of the proposed resolution, given that it represents the wishes of the majority of the Committee. However, it must be clearly understood that we remain opposed to the adoption of standards on contract labour, and therefore we are opposed to the intent of the resolution.

Mr. PARROT (Workers' delegate, Canada; Worker Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Contract Labour) — It gives me great pleasure to recommend to you the endorsement of the report and the first-year conclusion reached by the Committee on Contract Labour.

The Workers' group supports both the conclusions and the process that this Committee has adopted, a process which we hope will lead in 1998 to a new ILO Convention supplemented by a Recommendation.

If we are to ensure that the ILO remains relevant and credible, then we must do more than to review existing Conventions and to abrogate obsolete ones, and we must do more than to promote existing Conventions and to strengthen the ILO supervisory system.

The credibility and continuing relevance of the ILO requires that we continue to set new standards, not just for the sake of setting new standards, not just because it is an important task of the ILO. Standard setting is at the very heart of the ILO's purpose, and a constantly changing world of work requires new standards to address new situations where workers need protection. This is nowhere more true than in the case of contract labour. Contract labour is not new. In some sectors, and in some countries, contract labour is the consummation of a system that existed before the emergence of protective labour laws. What is new is that today more and more employers are increasingly resorting to contract labour in areas where the traditional employment relationship has been used until now and continues to be used to protect workers.

The changing organization of businesses and the changing organization of work has resulted in millions of workers no longer having the protection that is provided to regular employees. If these are the new realities of the world of work, we must not forget the old realities, and we must not forget the old lessons. The oldest reality is the unequal power relationship that workers have with employers, and the most important lesson is that if exploitation is to be prevented, if social justice and the interests of society are to be secure, then employment relationships must be recognized as being fundamentally different from commercial relationships, and workers must be accorded protection by placing obligations on their employers.

At its worst, contract labour can be a form of fraud, a conspiracy by some employers, and I say some employers, to disguise an employment relationship in order to avoid the obligations of the employer in that relationship. This problem of disguised employment is closely linked to a distinct problem of triangular employment. Changing forms of work and business organization has placed millions of workers in situations where they lack the protection of regular employees, because they are considered to be employees of a subcontractor who does not assume all of the obligations of the employer, or who is unable to assume all of the obligations of the employer, or who is not required to assume all the obligations of the employer. All three situations involve workers who are denied protection, including those established by many ILO Conventions, and they involve workers who, because of their dependency and subordination, need the protection that they are denied.

The Committee, in defining contract labour, has wisely chosen to address two issues — disguised employment and triangular employment: the two often go hand in hand, and both situations have a central element in common. They involve people performing work under the same conditions as regular employees, but who are not accorded all the protections of regular employees. Some member States have recognized this problem and have extended the definition of the employment relationship. Other member States have recognized this problem and have chosen to adopt special measures to protect workers who perform contract labour. Both approaches have been recognized by the Committee and are reflected in the proposed Recommendation, which emphasizes flexibility. So what is being sought is not mysterious, and it is not so complex as to be incomprehensible. Enough is known about this problem. It involves millions of workers, and any differences in national law and practice amongst the member States cannot obscure the fact that the labour legislation of all member States is based on the obligations of the employer to protect workers in an employment relationship.

What we are seeking is a Convention that can be applied by all member States, one that recognizes the problem and provides a definition, a definition that can allow the problem to be discussed, and ultimately to be resolved. We want a Convention that obliges governments to take measures to ensure that contract labour is not used for the purpose of denying rights or avoiding obligations under labour or social security laws and regulations, and we want a Convention that promotes the idea that workers performing the same work under the same conditions should be treated equally.

Of course, there is more to do, but we have made a good start, and as the Director-General said this morning, the Committee had to come out with a definition without the benefits of preliminary discussion by the Governing Body, but still I believe that the Committee has done the work that was necessary in an attempt to cover the two problems that I have identified.

The adoption of this Convention next year, even in the language that it is in right now, will not stop contract labour, as it has been suggested, but will ensure that the workers that find themselves in the situation mentioned before will have the protections that they should be entitled to.

Tripartism is an important concept, but it is a concept that has to work with three parties, and I agree that we have had some difficulties, at some point in time, in the process, but it is very difficult to ensure the concept of tripartism when one of the parties decides there shall not be any content in the proposed Recommendation. That was one of the difficulties we faced, and I think it is important to say that if someone is concerned about tripartism, I am also concerned about our tripartite work, but it has to work, the three of us together, trying to resolve a problem.

We shall not oppose Conventions for the sake of opposing Conventions, no more than we shall adopt Conventions just for the sake of adopting them.

Finally, through the work of this Committee we can, now, ensure that in the rapidly changing world of work there would be a credible ILO that is both responsive and relevant to what is actually going on.

I just want to say at the end that I also want to thank the Chairperson of the Committee and also the other members of the Committee and of the Office, and that yes, myself and Mr. Noakes have had a very good relationship together and I hope this will continue next year, despite some differences of opinion we had, and I want also to thank both the translators and interpreters who I think have done a fantastic job in helping us to do our work.

Mr. MISHRA (Government delegate, India; Chairperson of the Committee on Contract Labour) — The distinguished Government delegate of South Africa and the Reporter of this Committee has very succinctly presented a graphic account of the discussion which took place in the Committee, the gist of the decisions arrived at by consensus and the preamble, definition, scope and applicability of the provisions of the international instruments on contract labour.

He has been supplemented by the distinguished Vice-Chairpersons of the Committee. Both the Vice-Chairpersons have expressed their viewpoints from diametrically opposite positions.

As the Chairperson of the Committee, I am placed in an extremely difficult and unenviable situation. I am to remain totally neutral and am not expected to comment on the propriety and wisdom of what the distinguished Vice-Chairpersons have stated.

Nevertheless, I thought it appropriate and I owe it to you, and to this august assembly, to place the entire issue in a proper, positive, constructive and holistic perspective and spirit, and it is with this intention that I venture to place a complete picture of the work of this Committee and the perspective in which the work, as also the outcome, needs to be viewed.

It was with much trepidation that I had assumed the chairpersonship of the Committee on Contract Labour on 3 June, to conduct a tripartite debate on a subject which is at once complex and mind-boggling.

In the beginning of this contentious debate, the light at the end of the tunnel was not clearly visible. The differences were widespread and clearly pronounced. A fortnight later, however, if that trepidation has been replaced by a feeling of appreciable fulfilment on the part of all of us who are present here, it is on no lesser count due to the spontaneous cooperation and support I received from the constituents of the tripartite Committee. For the group as a whole it was a bold and exciting experiment in tripartism and in consensus building.

Tripartism is not merely a structural framework of concept, it is largely a matter of attitude, approach and spirit. The tripartite dialogue cannot, and should not, obliterate, or attempt to obliterate, fundamental differences amongst the constituents. It should synthesize and harmonize them with a view to arriving at the lowest common good of the largest number — I repeat lowest common good of the largest number. This is my understanding of tripartism; tripartite infers culture and spirit, and the Committee on Contract Labour sought, and made, every possible, earnest and sincere effort to translate this concept into reality.

For me in particular, it was a rich experience and opportunity of learning by sharing at the international level. The distinguished Vice-Chairpersons from the Employers' and Workers' sides, Mr. Noakes and Mr. Parrot, were absolutely at their best both in terms of conceptualization and articulation of concerns, and each one perceived them with clarity and insight.

I was reminded of the battle of wills which took place last year on the occasion of the discussion of the Home Work Convention between Mr. Wild and Mrs. Van den Burg and I was an eye-witness to that. They represented the transference of intentions and intellect, even though they remained absolutely convincingly glued to a particular position.

Notwithstanding the wide diversity in their perception and country experience, distinguished Government members made significant contributions to the debate, enriching the content quality of the debate, while the officers of the secretariat, including the diagrammatic presentation made by Mr. Egorov helped to demystify several grey areas in the debate.

The distinguished delegate from the United States of America played a leading role in coordinating the efforts of Government members to come to a consensus amongst them, while the Legal Adviser contributed significantly in throwing light on areas of doubts and uncertainties.

The Drafting Committee comprising the two Vice-Chairpersons and the Reporter, under the able guidance of Mrs. Samuel, the distinguished Government member of Cyprus, worked hard on two holiday days to bring out an end-product which is the outcome of consensus, and which reflects the distilled wisdom behind the deliberations of the Committee in an accurate, authentic, objective and dispassionate fashion while being, at the same time, intelligible and readable. This is an end-product which is owned by all members of the tripartite group in whose formulation all have participated and all have contributed naturally and spontaneously.

This plenary session therefore provides an appropriate occasion to acknowledge our collective deep sense of appreciation for the efforts of all those who contributed directly, or indirectly but significantly, in carrying the deliberations to their logical conclusion.

The distinguished Vice-Chairpersons from the Employers' and Workers' sides have dwelt at length from their respective positions which, as I said earlier, were diametrically opposite to each other, showed the rationale, the need, the content and the modalities of regulating employment of contract labour through an international instrument, while remaining seemingly and outwardly divergent and conflicting. There is, in my assessment, no real difference in their perception and this I would like to elaborate with some pains.

Today, none can deny that radical transformations are taking place in the labour market due to the technological revolution, economic reforms entailing structural adjustment policies and programmes, and changes in the labour market in myriad forms.

In the wake of this transformation, distance has lost its meaning altogether and the world is fast becoming a global village. Revolutions in technology of information are fast transcending the narrow and restrictive barriers of communication, making today's up-to-date thing into something stale tomorrow. This has given rise to changes in the nature and character of work and work organization at the workplace, in industrial, commercial and trade enterprises. One of the consequences of these changes is outsourcing, which gives rise to use of contract labour in both public and private sectors, in primary, secondary and tertiary sectors, in both developed and developing economies, without exception.

This change has given rise to subdivision and fragmentation of an unprecedented magnitude at the workplace, and change in the traditional forms of employment relationship leading the way to atypical ones. Instead of being bilateral, such relationships assume triangular and quadrangular forms. Such changes are inevitable and irreversible. It has to be recognized as the direct consequence of globalization of the economy and attempts of national governments to integrate national economies with the global economy. The latter is fiercely aggressive and aggressively competitive.

In today's market economy, if we are competitive, we survive. If we are not, we are bound to perish. How can industrial enterprises be competitive when there is so much regulation and interference, so much rigidity and inflexibility of control in employment relationships? This is basically the perception of the employers' point of view. According to this perspective, capital creates labour when there is cost-effective and productive use of capital which is a scarce resource. I have no quarrel, absolutely no quarrel, with this formulation.

But we have also to look at the issue from the other end of the spectrum. And that represents the workers' viewpoint that labour creates capital. Labour can create capital only when labour feels fully involved, physically, emotionally and psychologically with the workplace, when alienation is replaced by participation of the workers. And for this we need to have the right work ethos, the right work culture and the right work attitude and approach. No participation of labour in capital is possible unless there is a feeling of security and protection, unless the workplace is absolutely safe, clean and congenial, unless the reducible, barest minimum needs of the workers, in terms of health, hygiene, housing, sanitation, welfare and safety, have been assured. Creation of a healthy, contented and stable workforce, therefore becomes the sine qua non of a highly productive work environment in a highly competitive global environment. Thus, to put it in an integrated environment, labour creates capital, and capital creates labour, and both together, with understanding and goodwill, can contribute to the building of the economy, national as well as international.

It must, however, be borne in mind that within labour, contract labourers and migrant contract labourers are largely unskilled, illiterate, non-numerate and have a low level of earnings and a low level of aspirations. It constitutes the twilight zone of humanity, often unseen and unknown. It is most vulnerable exploitation. It is therefore in need of protection, social, economic and legislative. The State, as the agent of the society, has to provide the instrument of such protection. Since the ILO rests on the premise — and this is so clearly, lucidly and forcefully brought out in the Declaration of Philadelphia that labour is not a commodity but a human entity entitled to the same dignity and freedom like any other human being, this proposed international instrument is intended to set certain norms and standards of such protection, whether it is the furtherance of a healthy and robust national economy, or it is the promotion of prosperity of the industrial enterprise, or it is the promotion of the well-being of the industrial worker. All these three, according to my perception, are inextricably intertwined and promotion of one is not possible at the cost of the others.

Viewing this perspective, the difference in perception between the Employers' and the Workers' groups, as has been very ably articulated by Mr. Noakes and Mr. Parrot, is artificial and not real, and should not, therefore, pose any formidable problem. The entire tripartite exercise has been undertaken as a part of the double-discussion procedure, in a climate of total professionalism, understanding and goodwill.

It is a major step in the direction of standard setting by the ILO, coming as it does immediately in the wake of the Home Work Convention adopted last year, and the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies (Revised) Convention, 1949 (No. 96), which has been discussed this morning. It is a major initiative and breakthrough, protective and anti-exploitative in character, in the field of the unorganized and informal sector.

It is my ardent hope and conviction that the tripartite partners will maintain the same intrepidity and conviviality of human spirit, the same depth of past goodwill and understanding, to facilitate the process of this international instrument being carried to its logical conclusion. The presentation of the report of the Committee undoubtedly augurs well for the discussion which is to take place next year.

With these words, I would like to thank you for your kind attention and would like to commend to this august assembly the text of the report for its adoption.

The PRESIDENT — The general discussion on the report of the Committee on Contract Labour is now open.

Mr. LAWSON (Employers' delegate, Canada) — What is contract labour? After two weeks of active debate, there are more questions about this definition than answers. We are in an era offering the opportunity for stable, economic growth. The world is redefining itself politically, economically and socially. As we embark on this exciting time, a common goal of business workers and governments, must be to remove barriers to any type of business, opportunities leading to economic growth and job creation.

Consequently, a second look is in order each time obstacles appear that threaten progress. Employment relationships are evolving. What was considered a good and stable job with regular hours, fixed income, a package of benefits, is declining. This type of work will be reserved for a less diversified workforce, not so autonomous, and not so entrepreneurial. There is a great demand for personal and economic growth, a greater desire to eliminate artificial barriers and boundaries, a greater search for opportunities. Stakeholders are working hard to eliminate barriers. Governments, businesses and individuals want to facilitate growth. Independent working relationships maximize and take advantage of the most valuable resource available, the ingenuity and the spirit of the entrepreneur. Businesses are successfully contracting some of their core activities. Companies are willing to give control of segments of their business to very knowledgable and focused workers often described as contractors, subcontractors, contract workers, independent contractors. There are many types of contingent work, and there will be others not yet defined. Although some view these relationships negatively I look at them positively. Apart from the economic advantages, these groups also provide a greater expertise in specific segments of the work to be performed, are usually more innovative in their approach, often produce better products or services, respond with just-in-time solutions to often complex and very difficult problems and finally provide the best opportunity for training and career development for employees. This highly specialized, focused and fast growing sector of the economy is inventing and redefining the nature of work. It is constantly pushing the definition of work to the outer limits while exploring the diversity of employment relationship. In the midst of all this flux the ILO brought forward a proposal to discuss this subject which is still evolving and which is not clearly defined for many member States. Many Members have confirmed that they do not use one or all of the above forms of labour. Worse, the words may be the same but the definition is quite different as evidenced in the French and English understanding of this form of labour. Adding to this confusion, governments' positions ranged from full participation to total silence.

I would like to contribute to next year's agenda by providing some questions which I hope will help. The first concerns how we can develop an instrument at the ILO which will improve the situation of contract workers who are yet to be defined. Some member States speaking as groups seem to have controlled the outcome of many points adopted in this instrument. I wonder how these member States will really react individually to the adoption of such a document. Most importantly, will this instrument deter or contribute to job creation?

I believe that the impact will be negative on many of the commercial contractors who fall within its scope, whether they are individual entrepreneurs or major contracting companies. I urge the governments to consider strongly their position between June 1997 and June 1998. We have discussed these subjects here at the ILO but we must move beyond our personal agenda and try to really understand how the effects of our actions can help or impede job creation and economic growth.

Mr. BOTHA (Employers' delegate, South Africa) — I strongly support the view expressed by the Employer Vice-Chairperson, Bryan Noakes, and my Employer colleagues in this debate on contract labour.

The Employers have argued that the concepts of an employment relationship and a commercial contractual relationship should not be confused. Nor should a third hybrid category be created. These views have been rejected.

The main objective of business is to survive, and business can do this by remaining competitive through innovation and cost control. Businesses have to react and operate quickly, they have to lead in their chosen field, and they have to continuously reduce costs.

The use of contractors has provided enterprises, and I use enterprises in its widest sense, with a dynamic tool to produce and to serve more effectively and more cheaply than ever before. The nature of employment has changed. Any enterprise that relies on a model of the employment contract that still has as its base the employee who enters employment at a young age, moves up a rung or two on the occupational ladder without acquiring any significant skills before retiring at 65, is doomed to failure. Different forms of employment and contractual relationships characterize successful enterprises. All of these permit rapid responses to changing demands and all of them benefit both employers and employees. Employees benefit because they acquire multiple skills, varied experience, and the prospect of more meaningful employment. Any attempts to stifle these developments will make organizations, commercial business and the State less competitive, will increase product and service costs and will hamper the creation and retention of jobs. My own country, South Africa, has 30 per cent unemployment and such a development would be devastating.

Using contractors is often more effective than using employees within an enterprise. When they do so, companies, government departments and indeed trade unions can focus on their own core activities and eliminate unutilized and underutilized labour and overheads, freeing individuals to provide services on a wider more productive basis.

Contractors provide services only when they are required and are paid only for work done. They in turn are better focused on their core business.

They are less constrained by historical practices and can reduce costs by providing incentives to work quickly and on time. Their employees are often their shareholders.

The Employers' group has during the debate condemned fraudulent practices and mechanisms designed to avoid legal obligations or to exploit the weak.

Why is the ILO attempting to stifle the trend towards new forms of work by equating these emerging forms of employment and contractual relationships with a model that is rapidly becoming archaic? Why have the discussions on home work last year, and contract labour this year, seemingly had as their aim the elimination of any advantage in atypical forms of employment, either for employers or for employees?

The consequences for any government foolish enough to support these measures are obvious. A loss of any competitive edge and a loss of jobs to countries intelligent enough to weigh up the advantages offered by labour market flexibility against the disadvantages of the "one shoe fits all" approach that has characterized the Committee's debate.

Many of the Government delegates admitted that they did not really understand what was meant by contract labour. Others claimed the phenomenon did not exist in their countries. Despite this Government delegates voted in favour of ridiculous amendments in the interests of keeping the issue alive into 1998. Strange logic!

Representatives of governments who exercise their rights to participate and vote in the Committee's proceedings in ignorance of commercial realities, or even worse, as a matter of political expedience, do themselves and this Organization a disservice.

If your government has no intention of ratifying a Convention your moral commitment is to oppose it. I say to all the delegates, go back to your countries, talk to real business people, talk to contractors, talk to the people in your governments responsible for contracting and for employment creation. Test the results of this debate for their practical effects. If you do we may have a constructive discussion in 1998.

Original German: Mr. FENDRICH (Government delegate, Germany) — I too would like, as many previous speakers, to thank all members of the Committee, especially the Chairman, Mr. Mishra, and the spokesmen of those groups, Mr. Noakes and Mr. Parrot, for the devoted and competent work on this different subject.

The German Government is fully aware that the scope of contract labour is growing in many member countries and that the workers require protection comparable to the workers' protection. The widely defined concept contract labour as was deduced from the text provided by the secretariat for our discussions, embraced very differentiated groups of persons which, according to German legislation are subject to differentiated protective measures. Uniform regulations, are hardly thinkable at this moment in time. The federal Government had already lodged reservations when the Governing Body put this subject contract labour on the agenda of the present annual Conference. Therefore it voted against the adoption of a Convention and expressed itself only in favour of a possible Recommendation.

In the course of the Committee's discussion it became possible to restrict the concept of contract labour and the applicability of the proposed instrument. Concerning the scope and the supervision of obligations resulting from a proposed Convention, a more flexible regulation was reached. Unfortunately hitherto not all important issues could be settled satisfactorily. This applies especially to the incorporation of independent workers who resemble, only on account of the economic dependence, a producer or a worker. For this category the German legislation has special protective regulation on grounds of its independent activity. These persons do not have the same need for protection as envisaged in the proposed Convention for contract labour and according to which they should be put on the same footing. Moreover, the definition of a "subcontractor" and of an "intermediary" must be examined with a view to determining the more precise objectives of the Convention.

On grounds of the aforementioned reservations, the German federal Government believes there is room for substantial progress during the second reading. Conversely, it might not be in a position to adopt the Convention and most probably be unable to ratify it. However the federal Government hopes that the existing problems will be resolved in the course of next year's deliberations.

Mr. MAKEKA (Employers' delegate, Lesotho) — It gives me great pleasure to address this august assembly on this rather difficult and complex issue of contract labour. As this Conference adopts the report of the Committee on Contract Labour, which recommends the adoption of a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation, it is of the utmost importance for employers and business persons in general that all concerned, particularly governments, understand and appreciate why employers are opposed to the setting of an international standard on this issue, particularly by way of a Convention.

I speak here in support of all the points that have been made by our spokesperson and I can only endorse and expand as follows.

Employers have repeatedly called for a review of the ILO standard-setting process. We have been concerned by the rate at which the Conference is being turned into a factory, almost manufacturing Conventions for the sake of Conventions. Most of these Conventions are not ratifiable because they are far from reality. The Convention and Recommendation on home work is a living example and unless governments take the process seriously we are on the verge of having another unratifiable Convention, this time on contract labour.

I would like to take this opportunity to appeal to governments to use the intervening period between now and June 1998 to assess their stance and oppose the setting of ILO standards on contract labour, particularly by way of a Convention.

The Office in its report, which we used as a basis for deliberations in the Committee, cautioned that time was not right for standard setting on contract labour. Indeed, the deliberations in the Committee were a testimony and corroboration of this concern. An unusual amount of time was spent on the definition of what contract labour is and indeed, even after adoption of the definition, the controversy still prevails.

Right at the beginning there was a very strong move to start the Committee's deliberations with the definition of contract labour, which is in part 5 of the proposed Convention. Many Government delegates felt that such a move, which was unusual and unorthodox, was going to help Government delegates decide on whether we should or should not have a Convention. Even the usually homogenous governments of the European Union were divided. What is disheartening is that many governments voted with the workers for setting standards on this issue, despite the many misgivings they had. Some did so because they felt that this would give them time to study and understand the issue. Others did so even as they observed that contract labour is not an issue or a problem in their countries.

What was certain is that many do not understand the issue, and we think that these governments took a stand to support the workers, knowing very well that their governments will not ratify these proposed instruments.

The confusion is not confined to governments alone, as indeed many workers feel that there is a problem here. We have maintained that in the world of work a worker is either employed, and in that case there is in existence a contract of employment between that worker and a specific identifiable employer, or the worker is self-employed. There is no third category and here the workers agree and yet the instruments emanating from this Committee are creating this third category which cannot work in the real world of work.

It is hard to believe that there is a country in which there is no contract labour. The truth is that it is not an issue requiring legislative correction at the international level. In my country, for example, the organization which I represent has adopted a policy of encouraging its members, particularly multinationals, to subcontract some of their services and operations. We have found this to be the most economic and efficient way of creating more jobs and, most importantly, of transferring technology and know-how to small and medium-sized indigenous enterprises. The system is working very well, even though it is not yet widespread. Given the peculiar situation that prevailed in our region until recently, I am sure that my own Government embraces this very good policy.

We cannot deny that contract labour can be abused by some unscrupulous employers, and our stand is not to protect this. However, we firmly believe that the setting of ILO standards to deal with the problem is not the best solution. After all it is part of humanity to abuse even what is good. No one can deny that even a normal standard employment contract can be abused in the hands of unscrupulous employers and indeed in the hands of irresponsible workers. We contend that there are structures and mechanisms in existence in our respective countries to deal with these abuses. On the contrary, the adoption of ILO standards, particularly a Convention, is bound to hamper and interfere with otherwise legitimate commercial undertakings.

The world is now talking about competitiveness, the globalization of our economies and markets and we are all agreed that, unless enterprises gear themselves to compete globally, they are doomed to failure. How else can they compete if more and more regulations and rigidities are being piled on them. More regulatory and restrictive measures are being formulated at a time when governments, particularly in developing countries, have agreed or accepted that market forces should prevail. Many governments, including my own, have embarked on a programme of privatizing public enterprises and concentrate on creating a conducive climate for the private sector to flourish and grow. How can we reconcile these two with the present exercise of restricting contract labour if not outlawing it altogether?

In conclusion, I cannot but wonder whether workers and governments are conspiring to do away with contract labour. They deny that this is the purpose, but how else can one interpret the requirements set in the instruments before us? I shall not deal with each and every point of concern in this regard as the Employer spokesperson has already addressed those issues. But in reality how practical is it to require us to obtain a licence every time we use contract labour? In some of our countries it is already a hassle to obtain a normal licence as it is. It takes one to six months to obtain a trader's licence. How many governments have the time and the infrastructure to provide the intended service of providing licences for contract labour? Last but not least is the issue of strikes. How can an enterprise survive if it is not to replace contract labour which is on strike? This clause is not only unnecessary but superfluous, in that no worker can be forced to work if he or she does not want to work for whatever reason. I have yet to see how the supporters of this clause and many like it envisage its practical implementation.

It is on this account and many others that we cannot support the Proposed Conclusions of the Committee and we appeal to governments, particularly those from developing countries, to review their stands and join us in opposing the setting of standards on this matter, at least as far as a Convention is concerned.

Mr. ZILONI (Workers' adviser, Israel) — Within the framework of the deliberations of the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference I would like to devote my remarks to the subject of contract labour, which is undergoing initial discussion before the formation of a Convention.

I agree with the representation of the situation as presented in the report. I understand the sensitivity and the problems, but this is not sufficient. We need goodwill and common sense to confront the host of socio-economic issues presented by the subject to society on a global scale, to seek points of consensus rather than dispute, since only together, management and workers, will we be able to progress up the global economic slope.

From the report of contract labour in its various forms, we perceive the existence of a universal phenomenon of the employment of workers through personal contracts in different forms, the implication of which is the dismantling of the rigid limits common to workers and management and prevention of the construction of industrial democracy. While all are working to strengthen political democracy, in the socio-economic sector we are facing the phenomenon of the creation of a dictatorship of market forces.

The ILO is the universal expression of an organization whose ideal is democracy. If this principle is not fundamental for scholarly people, then we all, governments, employers' and workers' organizations must afford industrial democracy and the partnership between workers and employers the correct priority, while recognizing the changes occurring in the economic world. There are employers who believe that the implementation of a personal contract will allow them to release themselves from socio-economic constraints, which the community cannot fail to take into account, such as social security, the prevention of unemployment, protection from arbitrary dismissal, fair wages and working conditions, all of which ensure the dignity and liberty of the workers.

The international Convention on the subject of contract labour to be developed following the initial discussion is intended to protect those workers employed in this legal framework and to guarantee that any administration and any economic initiative will take into account that we are referring to human beings and not to objects which can be used and cast aside at the will of the provider of the work. The short-term profit derived from such exploitation is finally charged to each and every society, which pays in the costly terms of violence, crime, drugs, prostitution, poverty, illiteracy and, finally, the lack of ability and technological skills to compete with the workforce of any country and meet the challenges before it. The country is not able, in terms of resources or any other aspect, to correct the injustice generated over a number of years as a result of the exploitative action of a number of profiteers, whether private individuals or legally established corporations, who rely on foreign workers rather than on their own native workforce.

The rule of personal contracts is distinguished by a facet of fear and accountability, which reminds us of the story of "Uncle Tom's Cabin". Can human society, on the threshold of the twenty-first century endure such a regime of human relationships with its destructive effects on society?

It appears to me that the ILO's reply and that of the participants in this distinguished gathering must be "no" to exploitation, and I am certain that this is the proper reply for us all.

The phenomenon of personal contracts in its exploitative dimension has all the attributes of modern slavery and it would be advisable for us all to join hands before it is too late and make sure it is removed from the world.

This report and Convention, which I hope will be adopted next year at the end of the deliberations, will establish an appropriate wall to separate between humiliating exploitation and human dignity and freedom, between a wretched life and an honourable one, between democracy based on hope with a belief in a better future, and a work regime of dispossession and exploitation.

In addition to my support and the support of the Histadrut, the General Federation of Labour in Israel, on whose behalf I speak, for the wording of this Convention, I would like to bring to your attention an experiment I have initiated dealing with this difficult problem in a different way through personal contracts within the framework of collective agreements. This addresses the three subjects weighing heavily on the employers, without ignoring the changes in the national and international economy. I refer to the establishment of a special standard for a group of workers specified earlier in the collective agreement as regards recruiting, the termination of worker/employer relations and the possibility of a reward in addition to that established in the collective agreement. It must be clearly understood that the provisions of the personal contract must not be less advantageous than the workers' rights established by the relevant collective agreement.

My proposed experiment is intended to safeguard both the human dignity of workers and their basic rights and the flexibility and the demands that employers are interested in acquiring. A correct balance between both aspects is the appropriate recipe.

If this idea, which was not turned down immediately by Israeli employers, materializes it will be possible to add an important layer to the Convention under discussion, supported by all of us.

I have begun my task with this initiative and I hope that after the final ratification of the Convention and its Recommendation, we will be able to turn to its enhancement in this additional direction.

Mr. HESS (Employers' adviser, Germany) — The German Employers cannot agree with the Proposed Conclusions because they are formulated on the erroneous basis that contract labour should be dealt with by a Convention or by a Recommendation. We believe that this is impossible. Today's deliberations, I believe, have brought it home and spelled it out clearly: efforts to determine rules and regulations for contract labour have failed. They are more confusing than anything else. A standard whose reference is set within a vacuum does not help. The political signs that flow from it are also very confusing. Outside the ILO, such signals would be interpreted as contrary to labour market flexibility and adaptability. And divergencies did emerge during our work in the Committee.

Unfortunately, the readiness to deal with these diversities is not very evident. The fact that the objective seemed to be set from the beginning meant that there was little scope for any alternative. In the end everything has been left rather in the air. If account is not taken of the views expressed by the Employers, difficulties of understanding will inevitably result.

We can now predict that a new Convention on contract labour on the basis of the Proposed Conclusions will probably not be ratified in the near future. I believe this can also be interpreted as a symbol that the ILO is not really following the right path in its standard-setting activities. This applies also to many other standards. However, I believe there is still time to avoid the worst.

Mr. POISSON (Government delegate, Canada) — I am presenting this statement on behalf of the following countries: Canada, Japan, Switzerland and the United States of America. We fully recognize the opportunity for standards directed at the protection of workers involved in the performance of work for a user enterprise while being in actual conditions of dependency or subordination with respect to the user enterprise. We hope all parties involved will consider the Proposed Conclusions which were adopted by the Committee on Contract Labour very carefully before we meet next year.

It is important that by the end of the next Conference we have a text that will allow for widespread support. In particular, we feel that the issues involving adequate wording and consistency as well as precise scope with regard to bilateral and triangular work relationships will need to be resolved. The next Office report on contract labour will hopefully address these concerns as well as others expressed in the Committee's report.

Should these problems not be resolved, we would have to give serious consideration to the form of the instrument. It is, therefore, with this comment on record that we will not oppose the adoption of the resolution to place this issue on the agenda of the next Conference.

Mr. ANAND (Employers' adviser, India) — In the forum this morning I stood under your shadow to seek promotion of job creation. It is my painful duty in the afternoon to stand here to prevent job cremation. I think that it is a very painful duty and no pleasure to participate in this debate. It is a painful duty at this late stage to record dissent to my esteemed colleague, the Chairman of the meeting, for his cosmetically dressed presentation of the environment of the Committee and my opposition to a proposition of monumental lack of wisdom and an unratifiable instrument developed, as aptly indicated in the Committee, by the esteemed Committee Chairman himself and of whose profound intellect I have the highest regard and respect, "in an environment not conducted in the spirit of tripartism based on mutual trust and understanding".

Many governments had expressed, more than once, disappointment at the fact that confrontation seemed to have taken precedence over consensus. In fact, many of them are already having second thoughts on the adopted instruments. Obviously and without doubt, prospects of ratification will remain diminished. The Director-General, as most of you know, is yet licking the scars left by the debate on home work instruments last year.

This apart, presumptuous propositions woven in the two reports — the debate documents — lacked credibility, having been distorted to be presented as a majority view in response to the questionnaire. Equally, if not more, out of 174 Members of the ILO, only 84 have replied to the questionnaire. An apparent minority. Equally, if not more, numbers already stood disenchanted with statistical gimmicks and exercises in futility, and they did not bother to reply, all going their own way. However, only 74 out of 84 favoured an instrument being adopted, others opposing it conceptually. Among those in favour of an instrument, only 34 opted for a Convention with a Recommendation. Abstraction of these 34 governments will thus hold all the 174 Members to ransom, and it is all in the name of democracy. What a democratic approach! But I am not surprised at such an approach in an establishment indoctrinated by beliefs, ideological and abstract, in the seven decades. They decline to see the twilight of change, both on the ground and on the horizon. My extreme regret is that many Government representatives, including those of my own country, knowing the difficulties faced by the governments in ratifying many such instruments, fell prey to the intrigue. What is that intrigue: to give the employers the core instruments of job creation — a bad name so as to socially hang them in the public eye? Some, by nature being bureaucrats, may be escapist in accountability and may do so; but employers, much less those of us coming from the developing countries, will not shy away because undoubtedly, in countries of our diversity, defining contract labour so as to attract universal acceptance is an impossible task. A definition according to local and federal law and national practice alone, would imply flexibility, diversity and freedom of action in a democratic but workable spirit.

And it is for this reason, besides many others, a number of us even though willing to accept advice from the Director-General on experimenting with the efficacy, initially of a Recommendation, as indicated in his Report to this Conference, could not go along the route adopted by the Committee; since, contrary to the Workers' group belief, Office research in this area clearly exposed them as having insufficient knowledge and distorted conceptualization to provide a foundation for a durable instrument planning. I do not think facilities internally available to the ILO, like the research wing of its own departments, or the International Institute for Labour Studies were availed at all to attain objectivity.

We are certainly for formulating provisions, I might clarify, as my colleagues have said, to ensure appropriate protection without loss of, or threat to, subsistence-level, protected jobs in countries like mine, where millions starve and more than a million stay put, below or around the poverty line, despite a series of government-sponsored ameliorative measures. Moreover, we do actively and earnestly support measures to protect against sham arrangements, fraud or illegal practices adopted to avoid legal obligations, but all this at country-to-country and local levels. We refuse to be coerced at the international level, through untenable research or technical exhortations or emotional pleas by so-called consultants, experts, or even casually recruited advisers.

As I said, the Office proceeded on a wrong and perverse assumption, without seriously inquiring from any country of substance as to why contract labour is on the increase. Has the inflexibility and rigidity of the labour laws also something to do with it? Why is it that the State continues to be the biggest employer of contract labour, which is so at least in my country? Why is it that even though India passed a contract labour abolition law over two decades ago, its enforcement is throttled through interventions of court proceedings? Yet, the proposed instrument envisages and relies on judicial courts to settle this issue which is definitely, like child labour, a social one in character and cannot be wished away and liquidated overnight by statute promulgation. The proposed instrument may only attract dust on the labour department shelves, as ensuring that ratification is not their cup of tea. Many more departments and a multiplicity of authorities are involved in each country. They too have stakes and responsibilities. Many of those who vote and even those who do not vote for their governments in Geneva have in this case neither the responsibility nor the stakes. Employers, I submit, will not be a party to this shadow boxing and it would be a sheer dishonesty to do so.

Before concluding, I must record my sincere appreciation of the new awakening reflected in the thought process of the outgoing Director-General, Mr. Hansenne, and I quote from his officially released summary.

"Recommendations are an extremely efficient means of action, provided that their full potential is exploited. If Recommendations are to regain their rightful place, they should once again be considered as instruments in their own right; ... By definition, Recommendations do not impose obligations but they can still have a strong influence on social policy and legislation if they are subject to a real and efficient follow-up, which has not been the case until now."

In a dogma-influenced and regulation-struck environment, easy recourse has been taken so far to statutes and Conventions, without simultaneously effecting the prerequisite of a socially progressive conceptual base. I hope that advisers of the Director-General, who have obligations to the future generations, after his retirement, both in the ILO management and official groups and those who have been nurtured and cultivated into formulation of vaguely worded, somewhat coercive-looking instruments of no social good during the past decade, will profit from Mr. Hansenne's reflections and some other parting words based, as these are, on commitment, experience and ground realities. "It is never too late to see the truth" they say, and I hope this is not a plea in the wilderness.

To conclude, I hope that both the International Labour Office establishment and the Governing Body will ponder over the issues and the futility of the exercise done both in the last and the current year, before the subject of contract labour is listed for discussion a second time. Meanwhile, I do oppose the adoption of the so-called Convention-cum-Recommendation and also the proposed resolutions, the instruments which, in fact, are a monument of employment, retardation, poverty promotion and job cremation. The only consolation is that, being a classic case of untenable end cherished by questionable means, it is totally non-ratifiable, and probably will be confined to the dustbin or the shelves of the labour ministries.

Mr. SUZUKI (Government adviser, Japan) — The text in front of us contains a full set of the problematic issues. It proposes enormous and binding tasks to be tackled by the Government, which is already burdened, and it presupposes that the Government can solve all the problems of contract labour. It proposes an impossible, at least to our employers, definition of contract workers for very heterogeneous families of the ILO. It ignores our labour law systems and practices, it also ignores the fact that our workers are knowledge workers and entrepreneurs who seek independent performance for their excellence.

The text in front of us does not suit the varieties that exist, or the systems of classification. While adopting the report, I wish to make a few reflections on some policy aspects. I believe the pattern of standard setting on the question of contract labour was the point challenged, that is to say, whether any appropriate definition could exist. For variety, for very heterogeneous member Governments, the answer provided by the Office was a promotional Convention containing only the principles to be achieved and leaving it to the discretion of member Governments to develop a proper method of implementation. But an important question remains, and that is, whether it makes sense to use a Convention as an instrument merely for setting policies, because there is the danger of undermining the real effect of the ILO Conventions, which have to be legally applied. Therefore, the question in my mind is whether it is better to separate the legally binding standard-setting and policy-setting exercise? There is no easy answer to this question.

A Convention, once ratified, becomes subject to ILO supervision. This is why a number of ratifications are considered a criteria for measuring the success of a Convention with which the Office and the Workers' group find themselves comfortable. But this perspective is misleading, particularly in times of changing circumstances, such as the emergence of different types of contract labour.

Ratification quite often has nothing to do with actual implementation. The fact is, the current number of ratifications is around 6,000. The monitoring instruments, like the reporting and complaint procedure, are simply not in a position to cope with all kinds of shortcomings of a heterogeneous nature on the part of member Governments, although the Committee on the Application of Standards and the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations are doing excellent work.

We need to remember that the success or even functioning of the ILO monitoring system depends, to a large extent, on the cooperation of member States. As it is time for us to increase the efficiency of our monitoring system, it is absolutely important for us not only to limit the number of Conventions, but also to develop a different strategy for the fixing of policy goals. Instead of focusing on the legislative approach, it is desirable to achieve a more educational and guideline-oriented perspective, even on the question of contract labour.

In this context, one should be very clear that the decisive quality of policy goals is not their character of being legally binding, but it is the fact that it is agreed upon by the tripartite constituents.

We need to improve the credibility and prestige of the ILO. I believe, therefore, such a shift of focus from the legalistic to the educational and guideline-oriented perspective would make it self-evident that problem-solving of contract labour issues in different countries at different levels of development cannot be confined to the level of law under legislation, but should be considered as a continuous process and continuous task for those who are involved in the question in respective countries, that is to say, we are the one. Therefore, on this ground I do not support any ILO instruments on contract labour.

Mr. VELLA (Employers' adviser, United States) — When the first discussion on contract labour began earlier this month, the United States Government representative reviewed four major objectives that would need to be fulfilled in order for there to be a contract labour instrument that would be acceptable. The employers of the United States agree with those objectives. First, the instrument would need wide tripartite support. Second, as far as practical, the instruments should be consistent with national law and practice of the vast majority of ILO member nations. Third, the instrument should increase, not decrease, employment opportunities. Fourth, the instrument should provide for and protect the right to contract independently. Unfortunately, we met none of these objectives.

It was apparent from the beginning of our discussions that the term "contract labour" had a wide range of interpretations and understandings from country to country. Even before there was a clear definition of contract labour, our Committee decided that the instrument should take the form of a Convention. The result is that we have a proposed Convention that does not have wide tripartite support.

Unfortunately, half of the governments registered in the Committee did not attend the discussions on a regular basis and only about half of those governments that did took a position on the proposed Convention and Recommendation. For the reasons that I will discuss in a moment, it is critical that governments, particularly from developing countries, participate in our tripartite deliberations next year, for the future of their people and their employment prospects and economic well-being are at stake.

The proposed Convention and Recommendation are not consistent with the law and practice in many countries and, in fact, establish for many countries new standards which contradict national law and practice. Although the objective of the instruments is to protect contract workers, they actually have the opposite effect. The proposed Convention and Recommendation include, in great detail, restrictive elements while sacrificing needed adaptability to rapidly changing circumstances in the world today.

In the developing and growing global economy, it seems apparent that countries with flexibility are prospering and many countries overburdened with restrictive laws have much higher unemployment and are floundering economically. Ironically, it is these latter countries that are controlling the debate. The proposed Convention will not create a single new job, but it has the real possibility of eroding jobs in member States that ratify the Convention unless it is amended next year.

The restrictions placed on independent and commercial contracting and the establishment of joint liability on the enterprise using contract labour for legitimate, necessary functions, will severely and negatively impact on some of the world's greatest users of contract labour, including governments which will be asked to ratify the Convention after next year.

Employers are not in favour of bogus or sham contracting relationships intended to avoid a relationship of employment and deny rights to workers. The proposed Convention, however, goes clearly beyond eliminating this problem and creates unnecessary and adverse restrictions on a user of contract labour. This proposed Convention, if unchanged next year, will discourage investment in any ratifying country, ironically harming the very workers that are intended to be protected by it.

We are very sceptical that the needed changes will be made next year. For these reasons we are opposed to the international regulation of contract labour and we also oppose the resolution setting this item on the agenda for next year's session of the Conference.

In the coming year, however, we urge everyone to take a close look at the adverse consequences of the proposed instruments on workers' well-being, employment prospects and economic growth. The credibility and relevance of the ILO's standard-setting process are at stake.

Original Spanish: Mr. PIVEL (Employers' adviser, Uruguay) — First of all, may I say that this text is agreed to by the Latin American delegates members of the Committee. We would like to indicate our full concurrence with what has been said by our Vice-Chairperson, Mr. Noakes.

Wishing to express the viewpoints of the Employer members from Latin America sitting on the Committee and to address certain issues of importance dealt with in this Committee.

We think it essential to consider the future treatment of the subject from today until June 1998, with a view to filling in the major lacunae reflected at the first reading both in the nature and content of the result produced. It is our unanimous opinion that it is not appropriate to deal with this aspect of labour relations at this time and we should by all reasonable means ensure that no inapplicable, dead-letter text which grants no protection to workers, but which unduly shackles this type of relationship, is created. Such would be the case since very few States would ratify a text of this nature.

This kind of approach is merely in dissonance with present thinking. The Office's efforts to ensure that it continues to be functional must be reflected in future deliberations, particularly on this subject.

Another priority for the employers is the sustainability and, if possible, the generation of real work which is obviously at a critical juncture. Among other things, we should avoid the drafting of vague definitions, or definition of new categories of workers because all this gives rise to conflict. We therefore call on governments, the very few who assumed their responsibilities, to be steadfast and for those who, by absence or abstention, failed to carry out their guiding duty, we call on them to think how this attitude casts a serious blow to tripartism which is so often invoked, but which is not always adequately secured by government action.

We cannot but state that in this session of the Conference, in our Committee, we were working on a bipartite basis which was the result of the previously mentioned negative attitude adopted by the general administration of governments and I would like to comment on certain aspects.

We cannot seriously call it a vote if only 14 per cent of governments vote, particularly when there are major abstentions and a high degree of absenteeism, of over 56 per cent. In fact, only some 25 per cent of the delegates participated in the vote. This is even more serious if we consider that the United States of America, for instance, has one vote, and the European Union has 15 and that their joint voting strength can settle a very narrow vote.

Abstentionism and absenteeism of governments weaken democracy because they do not permit a real majority to be defined. Is it necessary for MERCOSUR, the Andean Pact, NAFTA or other regional American groups to coordinate their votes as does the European Union. If this were the case, then we would have regional representations and that would put pay to tripartism.

Formally, the European Community has the indisputable right to act as it did during the discussions. But we insist that this imposes a responsibility on the other governments who are either absent or who abstain.

ILO meetings are intended to defend our countries from poverty and unemployment, to defend workers through consensus and not on the basis of inapplicable non-ratified ill-born instruments. Perhaps inadvertently governments set up pseudo trade barriers to the free and rational operation of world trade.

For all that I have said, which far from exhausts the subject, we appeal to the feelings of responsibility in each of us to endeavour to seek more rational labour relations and I would add that both workers and employers have shown our entire readiness to assume our respective commitments, we ask this of all governments who were lax in assuming their responsibilities.

We cannot think otherwise, let us say, if we the employers were to abstain or not look after our own businesses. We cannot allow this to happen in our businesses and we hope that governments will not allow this to happen in 1998.

Mr. JOHANNES (Government adviser, South Africa) — Speaking on behalf of the Government of South Africa and not here as the Reporter of this Committee, I would like to say that if you look at the report, one of the things which has come out very clearly is that the South African Government is very much in favour of the Convention and the Recommendation. That is our position. Last year when I was the Reporter for the home work Convention, there was a lot of discussion around the question of the definition of home work and if you remember, one of the definitions that was given by a Canadian Employer was the possibility of a scenario where he was sitting on his yacht somewhere on a lake surrounded by snakes, working by himself and regarding that as home. There was clearly a very bad understanding of what a homeworker was. It sounded more like Crocodile Dundee than anything else.

We want to say here very clearly that if we look at the history of the workers in South Africa, there has been a very hard and very difficult history for the workers. Our Government is not opposed to workers' rights in our country and that is why we have signed the declarations and many of the human rights Conventions which will make sure that the workers in South Africa are, and will remain now in this new situation, protected.

What we must very clearly say is this: that when our workers were being killed, maimed, brutalized, tortured, made to disappear, whatever, because of some of the "business as usual" approaches by some employers internationally, we found it very difficult. I think it is in this context that I want to say that while questions have been put surrounding the definition of this Convention, I want to put some of the employers' logic on its head and turn it around.

There is no cure for cancer yet. There is no cure for HIV yet. But are researchers and doctors supposed to give up and say that when we have a definition of cancer and HIV, when we have an international consensus, then we will begin to look for a remedy?

Cures are being tested, cures are being taken on board and work is being done to try and find a solution. We have not come to Geneva with a ready-made solution, with a ready-made answer to this whole question of contract labour but at the same time what we refuse to do is to go into a trance of economic euthanasia where we refuse to address this question. Although this podium has been used as a type of confessional in the script of the employers, we want to say that for us it is very important that we find some type of compromise and some type of solution.

We have not been part of those governments which have been holding the majority to ransom, as some of the employers have claimed. They have said that a very few governments held the majority to ransom. We certainly resent that. We repeat that what we have come here to do is to try and find solutions to a very serious problem, the question of contract workers.

There is a lot of talk about this Convention stopping the creation of jobs. Employers are interested in reducing costs but what about the workers? We cannot understand why employers argue in this context that this Convention will not create jobs but that it will erode employment. As the South African Employer pointed out, 30 per cent of workers are unemployed in our country. But this is not because of the present South African Government. It is because of old policies which were organized in our countries, old policies which prevented progress from being made.

I want to say a couple of words about the question of globalization and flexibility. It seems to be the panacea and the answer to all the ills of the world. For us globalization needs to be discussed, needs to be understood along with the effects that it is going to have, especially on those Third World countries which are in a weaker position in many cases to defend themselves economically. In many cases they find that globalization really means that we must sacrifice our workers to the profit margins of those who come to our country.

We also have to defend and protect the workers in South Africa and that is why I repeat that we are not an anti-worker Government, we are not an anti-employer Government. But we are saying that employers in South Africa have a comparative advantage over those workers, many of whom do not know where the next plate of food is going to come from. Those people are uneducated, illiterate, but now our Government of the people is trying to address this. And that is why we have a moral obligation here to take a very strong public stand and say that next year we will come fighting with even better arguments. We will come back fighting here with even more research behind us, and this issue, as far as we are concerned, will not be put to rest until we see a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation next year.

Mr. AHMED (Workers' delegate, Pakistan) — At this late hour we believe that the debate which has been going on in the Committee for just over two weeks should not have been reopened at the time of the presentation of the report. However, some of the distinguished Employers' delegates have taken the floor one by one and raised various issues which have brought me to this rostrum.

First I must congratulate the Chairperson and the Vice-Chairpersons, Mr. Parrot representing the Workers and Mr. Noakes representing the Employers, as well as the distinguished representative from South Africa, the Reporter, and other esteemed members of this Committee who have brought the report before this forum and I commend their work.

Some of the distinguished Employers' delegates have stated that with the globalization of the economy we need no standard on contract labour. Some have accused the governments, some have ignored the governments, and the employers have conspired to bring this in the form of a standard. Others have stated that no tripartism exists therein. Some of them said the bureaucrats are seeking escapism by not taking a stand. And some even resorted to saying that the ILO is a manufacturer of standards.

With due respect to all those who have spoken, I have to remark to them that this is a very important forum, where we all, governments, employers and workers, are together in a unique tripartite manner in a unique institution of the world. And not only the workers are protected against the sometimes arbitrary actions of governments, but also the employers, who constitute one of the social partners, against arbitrary acts of governments, and that is the reason that the freedom of association principle not only gives a guarantee to the workers, but also to the employers. Therefore the Employers should have taken the trouble somehow to maintain the dignity and respect of this great Organization and not to turn it in to such a forum of accusation.

And therefore I would fully endorse what the distinguished Government delegate of South Africa, who acted as Reporter, has ventilated as the position of South Africa, but also of many other governments who are otherwise silent, but I think they consent to what he has said on this very subject. Some have said that no research has been carried out. With due respect, I come from a Third World country. In our own part of the world he said the ILO has done nothing. I must remind them that no less than two months ago in our part of the world, in New Delhi, there was a tripartite seminar, to which people from the country were invited, and there were representatives not only of the workers and the Government, but also of the employers, all of whom contributed and came to a conclusion. And that was I think one of the ways in which research and dialogue have been promoted, not only at the national level, but also at the regional level. We see that the Office is quite independent and is objective and therefore we appreciate the work which they are carrying out for the welfare of the workers.

And secondly I must say how this great institution has been achieved. Those who know the history of the ILO, they know after the Industrial Revolution how the misery of the workers multiplied, how the workers were treated as chattels and how a social revolution took place in many parts of the world, even in Europe. And that was the focal point in bringing about not only economic prosperity but social progress and social peace. At the end of the First World War in 1919 it was specifically declared that international peace cannot be granted unless it is based upon social justice. For that very purpose the exploitation of the workers had to be eliminated and that could only be done by ensuring them healthy working conditions, freedom of association, a fair wage and elimination of discrimination, not only vis-à-vis workers, but also children and women. These principles were again reiterated after the Second World War through the allegation that labour is not a commodity and that it has to be provided with economic security. Now in the face of the globalization of the economy, if our distinguished employers should plead that the workers should continue to be treated as chattels, or without any regulations or security, I think they are mistaking the twenty-first century which we are approaching, where people's expectations and aspirations for a better quality of life have multiplied, not only for them, but for their children, for the nineteenth century where workers were subject to exploitation at a time of industrial revolution.

It is the duty of the State and it is the duty of the International Labour Organization, which has been established through tripartite consent to promote social justice, to promote improved working and living conditions for workers and to arrange for their safeguard against exploitation. This is why the principle of democracy has been enshrined in many constitutions — democracy to safeguard the rights of the workers and improve their working and living conditions. Therefore, in the face of the globalization of the economy, when deregulation and structural adjustment are taking place in many parts of the world, particularly in the Third World, it has become all the more important for the State to safeguard against various exploitative forms of labour through standards such as those relating to contract labour, as we have seen in the Committee of Experts.

I would like to draw your attention to a case in a Third World country where, the Committee of Experts has specifically pointed out, women are being exploited for long hours for very meagre wages, doing very hazardous work at a power station. Those women are not provided with any form of safeguard by the State as they are merely subcontracted workers. Is it not the responsibility of the State to provide protection to such women who are subject to long working hours, who are subject to exploitation, who are compelled to work in hazardous conditions and for low wages? It is the responsibility of every modern, welfare and democratic State to come to the rescue of such workers and to end such exploitative practices. Therefore, I think that the vision of the Governing Body to place this item on the agenda was very well thought out and deserves commendation. The Employers and governments were also involved in this discussion. Therefore at this juncture we fully support that in the new era of the globalization of the economy and the liberalization of trade, there should be teamwork between workers and management with the welfare of the workers in mind, to ensure their rights and also to raise productivity through mutual cooperation, not only exploitation. Therefore we rightly believe that after what was reiterated by all the member States at the Copenhagen Social Summit — that workers' rights are to be promoted by providing them with healthy working conditions and ensuring their rights — this standard is quite consistent with the ILO objectives, the ILO principles and the Declaration of Philadelphia. I think that all of use who believe in social justice, who believe in the working man and woman, who condemn exploitation, they should support the adoption of the good work by the members of the Committee and adopt this report which will then be discussed at length next year.

Mr. SUTTON (Workers' delegate, Australia) — This debate that we are going through at the moment is a fundamental debate. It is about whether the ILO is to remain relevant to the radical changes that are occurring in the world of work. In fact it is about whether the ILO can keep pace with the radical industrial changes that are unfolding across this planet. I believe the ILO is capable of keeping pace with the radical changes occurring, and of course we must understand that the model that did exist in yesteryear, the model of the large user enterprise, a stable enterprise with a very large stable workforce is yesterday's model.

The ILO and the instruments that have grown up in many respects dealt with yesterday's model. We are now in a position where we must recognize today's realities because if we do not I am afraid this very important body will cease to be as relevant as it needs to be to workers across the world. Because contract labour is a rapidly growing phenomena in every country across the planet.

I would like to give a couple of examples, I am from a developed country, Australia, I am from the construction industry in Australia. In my industry for every year over the last 15 years we see production in the industry going up, we also see the reverse, the number of workers in the industry, let me correct that, the number of employees in the industry going down. The tax department in my country has noticed this trend too, because they know that workers are not disappearing from the construction industry, their eyes tell them that workers are out there everywhere. What is disappearing is employees. More than half of the workers in my construction industry are no longer regarded as employees, they are regarded as some type of self-employed commercial contractor.

But let me give you a more radical example, I am aware of the British construction industry. In the British construction industry about 90 per cent of the workers are not employees and this has shifted from about 60 per cent to 90 per cent in the last decade. The way the British construction industry is going it will become the first industry in that country, very soon, that has no employees. It has workers, it has more than a million workers but no employees. It has billions of pounds of production but no employees. ILO instruments do not apply, by and large, because these workers have been taken out of the classifications that traditionally applied and the employers tell us that these workers are now free of any regulation. This example I give of the construction industry is but one. These trends are occurring right across the planet in developed and developing countries.

Now the Employers tell us through their eloquent spokesman that there are all sorts of problems, they give us three basic arguments: they say this contract labour proposition, it is too complex, we cannot understand it; secondly they say everything is fine now, keep the status quo, keep the existing categories; and thirdly they say, if you do anything it will destroy jobs.

Let me deal with the third of their arguments, in my country, in my experience, employers say the jobs will be destroyed whenever trade unions or workers try to improve their standards. I believe it is the same right across the globe, that is the constant answer of employers whenever we seek to regulate or better the conditions of workers. I do not believe it holds any weight.

Let us look at their two other arguments, they cannot understand it, it is too complicated. I do not believe the employers are silly, I believe they have got a lot of intellect, I believe they can understand what is going on very well indeed and what they do not want is an instrument that recognizes the radical changes that are occurring out there in the workforce. They do not want a mechanism put in place that will bring some regulation to a large, growing number of workers who are being taken away from any form of regulation, so they will fight tooth and nail to prevent any instrument. Tactically it is a fight they are very interested in because they want unregulated workers. That is what they wanted when the ILO was set up, that is what they still want today. Workers that are at their beck and call and if the way to do that is to disguise the relationship or paint the relationship in a way that the worker legally is not considered an employee, yet the worker in question is absolutely dependent, absolutely subordinate, then we have to recognize that, and we have to do something about the growing reality.

The third argument is that everything's fine. The current categories of employee and commercial contractor are fine and adequate. Well, clearly they are not, because there is a growing, a very, very large number of workers who fit into neither category. Employers use every legal trick in the book to ensure that workers are taken out of the employee status and, of course, they, in no sense, many of these workers can be considered true commercial contractors. The last point I want to deal with is the Employers' spokesman when he got up here said that they were very much committed to tripartism. Well, you would not get that if you participated in the work that we have participated in over the last two weeks, because if they are interested in tripartism, why did they seek to delete every item from the instrument? Why did they seek to obstruct? Why did they seek from the very outset a lack of constructiveness.

The Employers do not deny that radical changes are occurring in the workforce. They admit that radical changes are happening. I say it is incumbent upon the Employers, particularly Employers who say they believe in tripartism, to come to this place with a constructive approach. If they disagree about definitions, if they disagree about terms, then put up a constructive alternative. Do not be destructive. Genuinely participate in tripartism and participate in a process of making the ILO as relevant as it must be to the radical changes that are now occurring out there in the workforce.

Mr. ZAINAL (Workers' delegate, Malaysia) — This report is presented to delegates for discussion and adoption. I have reluctantly taken the floor because I believe we have been discussing this issue at length for the last two weeks, sometimes to very late hours in the evening we were still discussing the issues related to contract labour. I never knew that the Employers would come back here and speak again about what had been agreed at our meetings over the last two weeks.

I think that we have discussed the issue at length and I believe at this juncture we should approve the Proposed Conclusions and resolution. Let us take this issue up next year for discussion. Perhaps the Employers will still have bullets to fire at the Workers at the next session, at next year's discussion. I and my fellow Workers' delegates fully endorse the adoption by the Committee on Contact Labour of its report at Saturday's meeting, and we hope that all delegates will also support it.

I would like to mention two issues. First, as workers from developing countries we are concerned by the issue of contract labour. Contract labour is a genuine matter for us to discuss because a number of workers in the contract industry have been exploited by employers. There is no protection, no proper remuneration, no union protection, no collective bargaining to protect these workers' interests. Where are they going to be if there is no kind of protection for them, if there is no Convention? This is the reason why the workers in developing countries fully endorse and fully support a Convention for contract workers to provide contract workers all over the world with proper protection.

Second, this issue was also discussed prominently at the Asian Regional Seminar in New Delhi where four sectors of contract labour were discussed — plantation workers, building workers, textile workers and public sector employees. The report and conclusions of this seminar were adopted and it was agreed that there should be an ILO Convention to protect this sector of workers. Therefore, I appeal to governments, and in particular to Employers, to recognize that we are all human beings. We are living in the world together. We are building our own society, we are building our lives. Today you are employers, you do not know if in the next generation you will become contract workers too. Let us think properly as workers. Let us support and endorse this report. If the Employers want to argue this issue, let them come back next year at this forum where the matter can be decided by a majority and the decision accepted.

The PRESIDENT — We shall now proceed to the adoption of the report. The adoption of the report involves adopting not only the summary of the Committee's discussion contained in paragraphs 1 to 186, but also the proposed Conclusions and the resolution submitted by the Committee. May I take it that paragraphs 1 to 186 of the report are adopted.

(The report is adopted — paragraphs 1 to 186.)

We shall now move on to the adoption of the proposed Conclusions. There is an error in the paragraph numbering of the first page of the Conclusions in the English version. Paragraphs 187, 188, 189, 190 and 191 should be numbered as paragraphs 1, 2 3, 4 and 5 respectively.

May I take it that the Conclusions proposed with a view to a Convention and the Conclusions proposed with a view to a Recommendation are adopted?

(The proposed Conclusions are adopted.)

Finally, may I take it that the resolution to place on the agenda of the next ordinary session of the Conference an item entitled "Contract labour" is adopted?

(The resolution is adopted.)

We have dealt with the report as well as the proposed Conclusions and the resolutions submitted by the Committee on Contract Labour. I wish to thank the Chairperson, the Vice-Chairpersons, the Reporter and the other members of the Committee as well as the secretariat staff for their excellent work.

(The sitting adjourned at 5.45 p.m.)

SECOND, THIRD AND FOURTH REPORTS OF THE CREDENTIALS COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND NOTING

The PRESIDENT —The first item on our agenda today is the consideration of the second, third and fourth reports of the Credentials Committee, which are contained in Provisional Records Nos. 7B, 7C and 7D respectively.

I invite Mr. Salmenpera, Government delegate, Finland, and Chairperson and Reporter of the Credentials Committee, to present the reports.

Mr. SALMENPERÄ (Government delegate, Finland; Chairman and Reporter of the Credentials Committee) — I have the honour to present, together, the second, third and fourth reports of the Credentials Committee, which appear in Provisional Records Nos. 7B, 7C and 7D, respectively. They contain the Committee's conclusions on the 11 objections submitted to it concerning the nomination of Workers' delegates and advisers, and of an Employers' delegate in one case.

I have to report that the Committee found that eight of the 11 objections had at least some foundation. There was only one case, that of India, in which the Committee considered that the Government had fully complied with the obligations established by the ILO Constitution for the nomination of its non-governmental delegate and advisers. In two other cases, the Committee could not reach any conclusions as the information available did not make it possible to decide between conflicting claims concerning the leadership of the organizations concerned.

In the most serious of the eight cases, the Government had so totally failed to comply with the constitutional requirements that the Committee unanimously considered that the credentials of the country's Workers' delegate should be invalidated. It is not actually proposing invalidation, but this is solely for the practical considerations that are referred to in the first case dealt with in its fourth report.

The constitutional requirement is, of course, for governments to nominate their Employers' and Workers' delegations in agreement with the "most representative organizations" in their country. But what happens if a country has two or more such organizations, and they cannot agree on the nomination? The other objections mainly centred on this problem. The answer given by the Committee, in line with the precedents, was that the government should base its decision on the proposal of the organization having the greatest representative character. But in many instances the governments did not have the means of knowing which was the most important of the organizations as the necessary statistical information either had not been gathered or was unreliable. To overcome this difficulty, some of the governments concerned based their decision on a system of rotation. However, the Committee, like its predecessors, stressed that a system of rotation can only be used if the most representative organizations agree. One further defect this year was that some governments proceeded to the nomination of the delegation without consulting the organizations concerned, and without attempting to get them to reach agreement.

From what I have just said, it can be seen that the Committee took account of the difficulties facing the governments concerned when it considered each of the objections before it, and made a distinction between the less serious and the more serious cases. This is precisely what it will be required to do next when, as a result of one of the amendments that the Conference has just made to its Standing Orders, the Committee will consider complaints relating to the non-payment of the expenses of delegates and advisers. The Committee welcomed the formalization of its competence in this respect.

Finally, I should like to thank the Conference for giving me this new and very interesting experience of membership of the Credentials Committee. For me it was a new exercise in tripartism, not only because the Committee's main role is to defend an aspect of tripartism, but also because of the harmony that existed between the Chairman and his two colleagues, Mr. Gray from the Workers, and Mr. Funes de Rioja from the Employers. I am very grateful to both of them for enabling me to profit from their years of experience in the Committee. Special thanks have to be directed to the secretariat which, with the excellent leadership of Mr. Dominick Devlin, spared no effort in facilitating our work.

The PRESIDENT — As the second, third and fourth reports of the Credentials Committee have been adopted unanimously by the Committee, the Conference is merely called upon to take note of them.

(The reports are noted.)

I would like to thank the Officers and the members of the Committee as well as the staff of the secretariat for the excellent work that they have done.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE APPLICATION OF STANDARDS: SUBMISSION AND DISCUSSION

The PRESIDENT — We shall now consider the report of the Committee on the Application of Standards, Provisional Record No. 19.

I call on Ms. Mihes, Government delegate, Romania, and Reporter of the Committee on the Application of Standards to present the report.

Original French: Ms. MIHES (Government delegate, Romania; Reporter of the Committee on the Application of Standards) — I have the honour to present to you the report of the Committee on the Application of Standards. The Committee is set up under article 7 of the Standing Orders of the Conference and is responsible for examining the agenda item entitled "Information and reports on the application of Conventions and Recommendations". The report is in two parts. Part One is the General Report and Part 2 is a record of the discussion of all the cases examined by the Committee.

In accordance with its usual practice, the Committee began its work with the discussion on general questions relating to the application of Conventions and Recommendations and on the way in which member States meet their obligations regarding standards under the ILO Constitution. It then proceeded to an exchange of views on the General Survey of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations on labour administration.

Finally, and again as usual, the Committee discussed a number of individual cases concerning the application of ratified Conventions, the obligation to submit reports and the obligation to submit Conventions and Recommendations to the competent authorities.

The Committee once again took as the basis for its work the report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations. The Committee of Experts examines the reports from governments from a technical and legal point of view. Our Committee attempts to find solutions through dialogue within a legal and political perspective. There is thus a complementarity between impartial legal analysis on the one hand and tripartite dialogue on the other. In addition our Committee was happy, once again, to have the honour of the presence of the President of the Committee of Experts, Sir William Douglas, in the course of the general discussion and the discussion of the General Survey. This year, even more than usual, standards were at the heart of the Conference's work. Therefore it is hardly surprising that part of our discussion dealt with the subjects which were considered in the Director-General's Report. To a certain extent they were a prelude to the discussion which took place subsequently.

In this room, in the Conference plenary sittings the various views put forward in our Committee reflected those which were expressed in the plenary on standard-setting policy and the revision of standards and strengthening the supervisory machinery. The Committee noted that following the campaign to promote ratification of Conventions concerning fundamental rights, some 53 ratifications were registered. That figure is closer to 60 today.

The Committee also noted with interest the information provided in the course of the session on the large number of ratifications of fundamental Conventions, as well as of other Conventions, including for example, the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) and certain Conventions on health and safety at work. Even though these Conventions were not included in the list of the fundamental Conventions, the nature of the rights they protect is directly linked to economic and social development and their importance should not be underestimated.

The Committee not only assessed the situation of ratifications but also discussed denunciations. Making a denunciation is a serious undertaking which should be thought about carefully and governments concerned would be advised to seek advice before adopting such action.

I do not wish to go in further detail into all the other subjects dealt with in the course of the general discussion. I would merely like to highlight one or two of them and urge you to look at the report for further detail.

The regular supervisory system is based on the sending in of reports and therefore meeting this obligation is of the greatest importance. The Committee expressed its disappointment at the percentage of reports received and replies provided. Some members wondered whether the low figure was to be explained only by administrative difficulties, or whether there was not also a lack of political will.

At all events, the Committee as a whole urged the ILO to provide technical assistance where required, particularly through specialists in standards in the multidisciplinary teams. Emphasis was placed on training relating to standards and the hope was expressed that activities to promote standards would not be limited by budgetary restrictions at a time when the demand for such activities is increasing because of the globalization of the economy, the reform of labour policy and employment policy and the efforts to achieve democratization.

The question of contracts between the ILO and international and regional organizations was also considered by the Committee. The sharing of responsibilities should be maintained whilst pursuing collaboration with other organizations. This collaboration should be real, complementary and avoid any kind of destructive competition or rivalry.

Some members of the Committee expressed concern about the application of labour standards in export processing zones. They noted with interest the establishment of a special ILO action programme on social issues in these EPZs and they await the results due to be published this year.

There was also a discussion of the application of some Conventions such as those on employment policy, social security, health and safety at work, protection of wages and the prohibition of forced labour. I will briefly mention one or two aspects here.

First of all the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122). Opinions on the causes of problems relating to employment and how to deal with them can vary, but there is a consensus on the fact that the objective of full productive and freely chosen employment is and should remain a fundamental policy objective for the ILO.

Concerning social security, there was a discussion about developments whereby certain social security systems are moving towards privatization. Some consider that such a development will make it possible to preserve the central provisions of the system; others believe that the fundamental principles of the organization and management of the schemes should be preserved or that privatization has no place in social security.

The Committee referred to paragraphs 74 and 75 of the general part of the report of the Committee of Experts on the application of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29). These paragraphs reiterate points of view expressed in 1994 on the forced labour of children and in particular their exploitation through prostitution and pornography. Energetic measures to combat this scourge are essential. In many countries child exploitation is the result of exploitation which exists because of poverty.

The International Programme for the Elimination of Child Labour (IPEC), which is mainly financed by extra-budgetary resources, is an example of a successful programme of practical activities for the application of standards.

The Committee gave the second part of its general discussion over to the General Survey of the Committee of Experts on the reports on Convention No. 150 and Recommendation No. 158 concerning labour administration.

Convention No. 150 contains general guidelines with respect to labour administration. Its flexibility and relevance mean that it can be applied to all member States. However, the discussion showed that despite this flexibility and relevance, the Convention has been ratified by only 39 States. The Committee hopes that clarifying the requirements of the Convention will open the way to further ratifications. In this connection I would like to mention the technical assistance offered by the Office through a programme designed to help governments to strengthen their national labour and employment administrations.

I have attempted to give you a brief outline of the general debate which in fact only took up a few sittings of the Committee. The majority of the Committee's time was spent on reviewing individual cases. As I have already indicated, the second part of the report is a record of the discussions on these cases. The considerable part of the report taken up by this will indicate the importance of the discussion and I urge you to examine it carefully.

The Committee made a choice of individual cases of failure to apply ratified Conventions on the basis of specific criteria. This year it had to revise slightly its selection procedures. You will be able to find the details of this in paragraphs 6 to 8 of the General Report.

I would draw your attention particularly to paragraphs 165 to 171 which deal with six cases of failure to apply ratified Conventions. The discussion on these cases can be found in the second part of the report. The countries and Conventions are as follows: the application by the Islamic Republic of Iran of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention (No. 111); the application by Morocco of the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention (No. 98); the application by Myanmar of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention (No. 87); the application by Nigeria of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention (No. 87); the application by Sudan of the Forced Labour Convention (No. 29) and the application by Swaziland of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention (No. 87).

Given the continued failure over several years to eliminate serious deficiencies by Myanmar with respect to Convention No. 87, of Nigeria, with respect to the same Convention, and of Sudan with respect to Convention No. 29, the Committee mentioned these three countries in paragraph 173 as countries constantly failing to apply the relevant Convention. The Committee did, however, note with satisfaction progress which had been made in several cases. I would here refer you to the report of the Committee of Experts and Part Two of our report.

This year the Committee highlighted one case of progress. In paragraph 164 of its report it is noted with satisfaction that in one specific case the Government made legislative changes and practical changes to resolve a problem which existed previously. I refer to the right to organize of the staff of GCHQ in Cheltenham, United Kingdom, a case which was discussed previously by the Committee and concerned the application by the United Kingdom of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention (No. 87).

I do not know whether it is clear from my presentation, which is rather administrative in nature, but there was a unique spirit evident in the work of the Committee. We exchanged our opinions, sometimes criticized each other, but all in a very friendly positive spirit. I think that this spirit is one of the major achievements of our Committee. People say that the Committee on the Application of Standards is the moral conscience of the Conference, but that is a rather abstract concept. I think there is a more real aspect to it, namely the common desire to ensure that that moral aspect is respected.

Because although the "time of the finished world has begun", as Paul Valery said when the ILO was first set up, more and more people are now active on the international stage and regional rights are being asserted very strongly. This means that interpreting the content of universal rules and regulations and checking to which extent they are or are not being respected, are becoming more and more difficult. I would therefore like to pay tribute to the people making efforts in this direction here in this house.

I would not like to conclude without warmly thanking the Committee secretariat, the translators, interpreters, typists and everyone else who made a contribution to the work of this Committee.

I would particularly like to thank Mr. Bartholomei, Mr. Zenger, Mr. Oates, Mrs. Jacqueline Ancel-Lenners and above all, and especially, our Chair, Mr. Callorda Salvo, and the two Vice-Chairs, Mr. Peirens and Mr. Wisskirchen for having so successfully expressed the feeling that we are all one big family here in this Organization.

In conclusion I would recommend the Conference adopt the report.

Original German: Mr. WISSKIRCHEN (Employers' adviser, Germany; Employer Vice-Chairperson of the Committee on the Application of Standards) — At a time of enormous upheavals in our economies and our societies our Committee, as in the last 70 years, has been carrying out its task with regard to the application of standards. Important preparatory work for our Committee is carried out by the Experts in their report, which has once again become more voluminous this year. The report of the Committee of Experts provides us regularly with the starting-point for our discussions which are then contributed to by further facts as well as the information which governments are obliged to provide.

For some time now we have observed that the ratification of Conventions has been stagnating; in other words, the officially declared preparedness of a State to adhere to the standards of an international treaty is very clearly declining. The global figures for ratifications presented with a certain amount of pride by the Experts in their report in fact conceal the true situation. For example, out of the 750 ratifications which have occurred between 1992 and 1996, more than 500 have come from countries of the former USSR, from Yugoslavia and the Czech Republic. Therefore we are not really talking about genuine new ratifications.

On the other hand there are very few true denunciations. The small number of denunciations however is also not particularly significant in terms of allegiance to ILO standards because the possibility for denunciation only takes place quite rarely, usually at intervals of ten years. Member countries who can no longer apply the standards of a Convention therefore usually denounce the Convention internally, which means that they simply no longer apply the standards.

These extremely long periods for denunciation and the very few possibilities for denunciation also deter countries from ratifying in the first place. I think with the necessary new orientation of standard setting we have to take into account the astonishing fact that there has been absolutely no possibility up until now of repealing standards which are completely out of date and simply can no longer be applied.

This opportunity is now going to be formally provided for in the Constitution for the first time. But this actus contrarius is accompanied by much higher hurdles than just the adoption of a Convention. Whether it is feasible in practice remains to be seen.

Recently the number of complaints has grown quite considerably. One could even talk of a whole flood of this type of procedure. This leads to a serious overload for the Organization. We should consider the reasons for this. Probably the many facts which lie behind these complaints could be dealt with equally well through the normal reporting and supervision procedures. From time to time the impression arises that national conflicts are brought to the international level in order to subsequently use these procedures and the results obtained for the purposes of domestic debate. In any case it would appear to be necessary to look more carefully at the relevance and the receivability of these complaints in the future.

The sections of the main part of the report of the Committee of Experts, dealing with the application of Convention No. 122 on employment policy, have become a traditional feature. Certainly, it is one of the priority objectives and tasks of this Organization and its member States to make sure that there is full, productive and freely chosen employment. The Experts recognize the fact that unemployment has many causes. In the last few years, however, we are seeing blame being placed more and more frequently on increasing international competition, globalization and the transition to the market economy. Globalization and international competition are treated as a synonym for the fact that the world is increasingly becoming an integral whole. The market economy, we are firmly convinced, is the inseparable twin of democracy which has its foundation in the self-determination of the individual human being. All these elements are necessary prerequisites for the creation of greater well-being for all and also for the acquisition of greater resources to finance an adequate social policy. The Experts, as we see it, neglect the many other reasons for unemployment, that is excessive regulation, inflexibility and the bureaucratic overloading of the system by regulations, and last but not least, taxes and labour costs which are frequently too high. Successful business and job creation depend I am sure on many factors, and not least on the quality of products and services and the skills of workers and management. The value of an enterprise and its ability to survive are however determined by competition and the market position it has achieved. Thus in the final analysis it is the customer who decides whether an enterprise can remain successful or not. The market is thus not a threat but an opportunity, and the positive effects of competition in a market economy are of advantage to all of us.

We believe that this point of view is still being neglected to a great extent in the ILO. In this connection forms of employment such as part-time work, contract work and temporary work which can now hardly be described as new, should no longer be seen as a threat to full employment, but rather as an opportunity in an evolving world of work. An important step appears to have been taken this year with the review of Convention No. 96.

The Experts have voiced concern and criticism about the many changes which are taking place in the area of social security. There is too little understanding shown for the fact that the social security budget is taking up a greater and greater share of the overall national product and that the financial thresholds are being reached or even exceeded. There are many reasons for this. Demographic revolution has played a role, but also the one-sided development of these systems which has taken place over many years without adequate attention being paid to the fact that not every small risk should actually be covered by a collective social security system. The difficult situations arising in many areas of social security are often caused by the fact that many States have recognized this evolution too late in the day or at least they have reacted to it too late in the day. Therefore, it is of no use to issue a general warning against premature or hasty corrections to the system. On the contrary, it is perhaps high time to change tack in order to prevent further unfortunate developments in this area. Only if we actually change tack can we guarantee the basis and the preservation and efficiency of social security systems as far as their core operations are concerned.

The Experts quite rightly point out the unacceptable fact that workers in some countries in Eastern Europe, Africa and Latin America, sometimes for months and sometimes even for years, are either not paid at all or otherwise only receive part of their wages. It would however be a thoughtless indulgence in stereotypes to say that the market economy is once again responsible for this situation because it is not at all typical in a market economy for workers not to be paid, or to be paid late. One reason for this unfortunate situation, however, could be that perhaps there are too many elements of the failed planned economy still present in the transition economy.

We fully support all measures which campaign against any form of forced labour and in particular the extreme exploitation of children. For the elimination of this evil, international cooperation must be further strengthened. In this connection specific aid programmes such as the special child protection programme are clearly extremely helpful.

In the last parts of the general section of the report of the Committee of Experts there is a clear description of how member countries are fulfilling their different reporting obligations. But there are still many countries who do not do so or only do so in part. We support the requests and the urgent appeals to member countries better to fulfil their obligations in the future. The fact that the Experts have only received 63.3 per cent of all the reports required on ratified Conventions at the end of the reporting period, constitutes a very sad negative result. This observation is particularly disappointing because on the basis of the new reporting timetable in accordance with the decision taken by the Governing Body in 1993, the member countries have much less of a reporting burden. Therefore, we do not believe we should revert to the old system because the results would perhaps be even worse. In this connection, however, we do not think it wise for the Experts to ask more than in previous years for additional reports outside the normal timetable of reporting obligations. It is not a matter here of the Experts counteracting the decision of the Governing Body in any way.

For years now we have not shared the view of the Experts that member States should be sanctioned or subjected to other measures of deterrence if they have not applied a Convention. That is only justified if such measures are laid down in the Convention concerned. In all other cases, it is really the business of the individual member country and its own legal system how it implements its international obligations with regard to the ILO at home. Perhaps it is only a slip of the tongue or a drafting error that since last year mention is made in the report of the Committee of Experts of "fundamental workers' rights", whereas for many years, quite rightly, mention was only made of "fundamental human rights".

In the second part of the general discussion, our Committee dealt with the General Survey on Convention No. 150 and Recommendation No. 158 on labour administration. These standards deserve our particular attention for a number of reasons. However, the member States clearly do not share this view. The Convention has only been ratified by 39 States and the request to submit reports under article 19 of the Constitution was only fulfilled by half of the States invited to do so. A considerable number of reports is the essential prerequisite for a meaningful General Survey. A General Survey which is based on empirically guaranteed data is a very important source of information for the ILO and its Members. We have no simple or clear explanation for the very modest number of ratifications and the low number of reports submitted by member States. We would have thought that the content of the Convention would invite more ratifications because the Convention is certainly worded in a very flexible manner and there are hardly any special obligations. I would in fact say that the member countries are given considerable room to manoeuvre. Obviously some countries have misunderstood this aspect. In some parts of the report the Experts have to a certain extent contributed to these misunderstandings by the member States. Some member States believed that they could be called upon to implement special measures in connection with this Convention. Certainly labour administration from many points of view is one of the major areas of national labour and social policy. However, Convention No. 150 does not lay down any particular provisions with regard to the content of labour law and social law. The survey shows moreover how useful well-developed labour administration can be in various areas. It is also clear from the report how much the world of work and the world of employment have changed over the last few years and that these changes will continue to develop.

A problem for many countries is the cost of such a comprehensive labour administration system. There are parallels here to Convention No. 81 concerning labour inspection. In some reports coming from member States we have seen a certain dissatisfaction with the inclusion of people who are not workers per se but are self-employed. We share these reservations and these doubts. It would be much too simple to take the limited acceptance of this Convention as an argument against having flexible Conventions in this area. Such a conclusion would have the charm of irony, but it would otherwise be unsubstantiated. We believe that it is more a question of not confusing flexibility with lack of structure and vagueness, and instead taking flexibility to mean simple and clear principles, and formulating ILO standards accordingly. All in all it is a pity that these texts concerning labour administration have only met with modest success up until now.

Our Committee is the only central body of the Conference — the highest forum of our Organization — which has the duty of verifying whether member States are fulfilling their reporting obligations which are laid down in the Constitution and in particular whether they are fulfilling the obligations they assumed when they ratified specific Conventions. If you are carrying out the supervision of standards in a way which is not purely mechanical then you have to think about the difficulties which arise nowadays and the reasons for them. Really, the supervision of standards and standard setting are two sides of the same coin. In our Committee therefore for many years now we have always looked at the various aspects of standard setting. This year we did so in the light of the Report of the Director General which dealt with this subject in great detail. The Report of the Director-General contains many interesting comments which differ considerably from the ideas and from the practice of standard setting which has prevailed up until now. In a whole series of points we recognize the ideas which the employers have been trying to put over for many years.

To sum up, we would say that standard setting can no longer be the most important activity of this Organization. Should new rules appear appropriate, this does not necessarily mean that we have immediately to prepare a new Convention. They could take the form of a Recommendation, general guidelines or a code of conduct. Where Conventions are being considered, they should be confined to very clear principles and should avoid too many details as far as procedure and content are concerned. If in the past this yardstick had been applied, then many Conventions would not have come into being, at least not with the same specific content. Such Conventions therefore should be revised or repealed as soon as possible.

For some time now very important efforts have been made to ensure that the most fundamental Conventions, and particularly those relating to human rights, are more widely implemented by member States. Of the many proposals and ideas that have been put forward in this connection, there is no one ideal way of achieving the objective. In other words, there is no easy solution. The social clause, which has been under discussion in the ILO for some years now, should really be deemed a failure. And there are also many reservations with regard to the social label which has been proposed. Without going into them one by one, suffice it to say that many details of this idea are unclear and all in all the application and desired effect of this measure give rise to considerable doubt, while the dangers inherent in this idea have been underestimated.

Thought has also been given to a special supervisory procedure which would be carried out by a new forum following the example of the Committee on Freedom of Association. Such a forum would also verify the observance of the basic human rights Conventions in those countries which have not ratified these Conventions. This would logically mean that the basic principles of these Conventions were already enshrined in the Constitution of the ILO. But as we see it, the Constitution only contains the most rudimentary elements of these fundamental principles. To the principle of freedom of association which is set out explicitly in the Preamble of the Constitution, many details have since been added over time. Proof of this can be seen in the impressive 200 pages to which the Digest of decisions by the Committee on Freedom of Association has grown. The Committee has found itself faced with a host of cases relating to strike situations. It has judged and decided on the basis of the constitutional principle of freedom of association because for States which have not ratified Convention No. 87 it has no other yardstick to apply. We have often criticized these results and these decisions over the last few years. Apart from basic legal doubts there is the fact that the member States at the Conference have never had an opportunity to discuss or vote on the issue of labour disputes. The subject was in fact specifically rejected in 1948 and 1949 when Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 were adopted.

All these experiences cause us to have serious doubts with regard to any new or special fora. As is the case with other international treaties, the obligations of a member State arise precisely from ratification. Thus the right, although difficult, way to proceed is to promote the ratification of these fundamental or core Conventions. We have seen that the campaign to do so has already achieved a fair amount of success.

The principal task of our Committee is to verify whether the Members have fulfilled their obligations concerning specific Conventions and vis-à-vis the Constitution. The list of the countries invited for dialogue this time contained 27 cases. We have also dealt with a very large number of so-called automatic cases. These concern countries who have failed to fulfil their various reporting obligations or have not provided the requisite information, both of which are used for assessment purposes. The Committee usually takes such omissions very seriously, and quite rightly so.

As on many occasions in the past, the Committee has come across cases already dealt with previously, where it has noted that a wide variety of changes have occurred. Unfortunately, we saw that this year the concerns in six cases were so serious that the Committee decided to introduce a special paragraph into its report about these cases. The concerns relate to the Islamic Republic of Iran in connection with Convention No. 111, where the Committee found there was still sexual discrimination and discrimination based on religion; Morocco in connection with Convention No. 98, where protection of freedom of association has long been considered inadequate; Swaziland in connection with Convention No. 87, the basic prerequisites of the Convention are not being met. Apart from these three countries, there were three others which were mentioned in a special paragraph in the general part of the report relating to continued failure to implement. Here I am speaking of Myanmar and Nigeria where there have long been serious discrepancies in connection with Convention No. 87 on freedom of association. The same applies to Sudan vis-à-vis Convention No. 29 because for a long time now there have been various forms of forced labour in that country which are not being adequately dealt with.

You will find details concerning the discussion and the conclusions on these individual cases in the second part of our report. As is often the case when we are not dealing with cases for the first time, we have noted that considerable changes have occurred. We have seen improvements in the application of Conventions, and we have also seen the contrary.

Another comment concerning the working procedures of our Committee. It would certainly be an advantage if the Committee could return to its earlier practice, that is basically having the views of the group being represented by the spokesman and then additional comments being made. Thus there would not be a repetition of what has been said by the spokesman, but additional comments would only be made when something new is being introduced into the discussion. This approach would certainly make the work of the Committee considerably easier.

As a general comment, I would like to thank everyone who contributed to the work of our Committee and its results. Of course, this does not mean that we did not have differences of opinion. However, in spite of all the controversial points we had, we must observe the fact that we are all unanimous in trying to pursue our general goal, which is to put into practice and successfully apply the most effective supervisory system for the observance of international instruments.

I would like to thank the Chair, Mr. Callorda Salvo, who led our work with a mixture of firmness and patience. I would also like to praise our Reporter, Ms. Mihes, who presented the report to you a short while ago. I would also like to thank the secretariat for their professional assistance. Their team was led very effectively by Mr. Bartolomei and Mr. Zenger and their extremely experienced colleagues.

The essential spirit of cooperation between the Workers' and Employers' groups could once again be seen this year. I would like to thank in particular Mr. Peirens, the Worker Vice-Chair in this connection.

I had the full support of my group, and for this very good and helpful cooperation, I would like to thank all the members of the Employers' group. I would just like to mention, as I have on many occasions in the past, my friend, Ed Potter and our secretary Beatrice Ozainne. Ed Potter had very important duties as head of the delegation, but he remained faithful to our Committee and helped us very actively.

RECORD VOTE ON THE CONSTITUTION OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANIZATION INSTRUMENT OF AMENDMENT, 1997

The PRESIDENT — I now have to interrupt the discussion of the report of the Committee on the Application of Standards. As announced at Tuesday morning's sitting, following our consideration of the first report of the Constitutional Amendment and Standing Orders Committee and the preliminary vote on the proposed constitutional amendment, we shall now proceed to a record vote on the Constitution of the International Labour Organization Instrument of Amendment, 1997. The text of this instrument can be found in Provisional Record No. 15. Before we proceed to the vote, I give the floor to the Clerk of the Conference to announce a small correction.

The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE — There is a minor typographical error in the English text of Provisional Record No. 15. In the first line of the text of the new paragraph 9, there is an unfortunate comma between the words "Conference" and "may". This extra comma should be deleted.

(A record vote is taken.)

[The detailed results of the vote will be found in a separate section of this volume.]

The result of the vote is as follows: 381 votes in favour, 3 against, with 5 abstentions. Since the quorum of 257 and the two-thirds majority of 257 were attained, the Instrument of Amendment is adopted.

(The Instrument of Amendment is adopted.)

I give the floor to the Government adviser of the United States for an explanation of vote.

Ms. ANDERSON (Government adviser, United States) —Last year the United States Government had to abstain from voting on this amendment due to concerns about the way in which it was drafted. We support the purpose and the intention of the proposal to eliminate outdated and obsolete labour standards. We fully understand that this amendment is intended only to affect the role of the ILO vis-à-vis these outdated Conventions and not to terminate the treaty relationships among States that are party to them. As drafted, however, the amendment does not limit the effect of the abrogation of Conventions to the ILO's functions alone. The language used would terminate those Conventions completely. Therefore, in the light of these concerns, we were obliged to abstain.

The PRESIDENT — As you will recall, the amendment to article 11 and the new article 45bis of the Standing Orders of the Conference were adopted on Tuesday, subject to the record vote on the amendment to the Constitution.

Provisional Record No. 15A contains the text of these amendments with a number of drafting improvements made by the Conference Drafting Committee. The Conference is now called upon to give its final approval to these Standing Orders amendments.

May I take it that they are adopted?

(The amendments are adopted.)

RECORD VOTE ON THE CONVENTION CONCERNING PRIVATE EMPLOYMENT AGENCIES

The PRESIDENT — We shall now proceed to a record vote on the Convention and Recommendation concerning Private Employment Agencies. The text of the Convention and Recommendation can be found in Provisional Records Nos. 16A and 16B respectively. We shall first vote on the Convention.

(A record vote is taken.)

[The detailed results of the vote will be found in a separate section of this volume.]

The result of the vote is as follows: 347 votes in favour, 5 against, with 30 abstentions. Since the quorum of 257 and the two-thirds majority of 235 were attained, the Convention concerning Private Employment Agencies is adopted.

(The Convention is adopted.)

I give the floor to the Government delegate of Switzerland for an explanation of vote.

Original French: Mr. ELMIGER (Government delegate, Switzerland) — After reading attentively the text of the draft Convention on one that was done by the competent services of the federal authorities, I received the instruction that the Government delegation of Switzerland should abstain. The draft Convention indeed contains various elements which are in conflict with our legislation. The definition of the idea of private employment agencies as well as the establishment of minimum salaries for the workers in temporary work agencies, also gives rise to problems to us.

The delegation of Switzerland would like warmly to thank the Chairman of the Committee on the Revision of Convention No. 96 and the Office for their excellent work as well as all other delegations for their cooperation.

RECORD VOTE ON THE RECOMMENDATION CONCERNING PRIVATE EMPLOYMENT AGENCIES

The PRESIDENT — We shall now vote on the Recommendation.

(A record vote is taken.)

[The detailed results of the vote will be found in a separate section of this volume.]

The PRESIDENT — The result of the vote is as follows: 314 votes in favour, 13 against, with 67 abstentions. Since the quorum of 257 and the two-thirds majority of 219 were attained, the Recommendation concerning Private Employment Agencies is adopted.

(The Recommendation is adopted.)

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE APPLICATION OF STANDARDS: DISCUSSION (cont.) AND ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT — We shall now continue the discussion of the report of the Committee on the Application of Standards.

Original French: Mr. PEIRENS (Workers' adviser, Belgium; Worker Chairperson of the Committee on the Application of Standards) — Current and future standard-setting activity was at the heart of the discussion in our Committee. Moreover, a chapter of our report is devoted to the Report of the Director-General.

The Workers' group had the impression that the guiding thread of almost all of the statements made by governments was more constructive than was the case at earlier sessions of our Committee. In the great majority of statements by the three groups, we have been able to note positive elements.

To be sure, there remain divergences with the Employers, and certain positions taken up still need to be clarified and specified. However, we have been able to detect the emergence of an understanding as to the objectives and the guidelines.

I am thinking in particular of the possible introduction of a new procedure, as suggested by the Report of the Director-General, to discuss the problems of the application of the fundamental rights and principles in countries which have not yet ratified Conventions.

We have not heard of any formal exclusions of the principle of the extension and deepening of the survey and the collection of information on social policy and the situation relating to core standards. The Report of the Director-General described this set of measures as a "social label". The comments rather related to the actual details of implementation and the support for the measures and approaches suggested.

There has been nothing said in favour of taking a break in standard setting, but we cannot deny that the Employers have become more restrictive than was the case in the past with respect to the choice of possible topics for new instruments.

Beyond their general terms, the specific scope of reservations and suggestions made by the Employers and certain governments were not always clear and will require further explanation in the months to come.

When it is a question of the application of core standards and other standards of the ILO, what is the precise scope of the position of certain governments who affirm that the ILO must take into account specific economic and social realities?

For the Workers' group all the member States and enterprises must respect and apply the fundamental rights, notwithstanding the level of economic and social development. However, in this affirmation there must be no opposition between North and South.

These rights merely establish the essential rules of the game and must make it possible to develop social policy taking into account both national potentials and the principles and rules contained in other standards, such as health and safety at work and social security. The appeal of certain governments demanding that the degree of economic and social development and certain cultural practices should be taken into account in the application of core standards is either superfluous, or ambiguous, or is simply the expression of a groundless fear.

In any event, some governments have clearly, and without equivocation, supported the efforts of the ILO and the Director-General to promote the ratification and application of international standards and to make the ILO more effective.

Certain governments, both developing and industrialized countries, have stressed the need for specific action to be undertaken. They have suggested certain approaches which could help to make the ILO more active and develop a more dynamic interaction between member States and the ILO in an ever-more globalized world.

As far as the right to strike is concerned, the Workers' group has reiterated its position supporting the comments made by the Committee of Experts, based on constant jurisprudence and on the conclusions of the tripartite Committee on Freedom of Association.

We also refer to our report of the 1994 Session, in which we replied in detail to all of the arguments and positions of the Employers' group.

I would now like to highlight some positions, facts and developments which received particular attention in the discussion and conclusions in the general part of the report of the Committee of Experts.

First of all, new provisions relating to the amendment of procedures for sending reports by governments are now in force. The Employers' and Workers' groups shared the point of view of the Committee of Experts, affirming that the results have not been outstanding. Indeed, only 63.3 per cent of reports requested had been received by the end of the session of the Committee of Experts. Moreover, the great majority of reports only reached the ILO very late.

Sending in reports is one thing, their quality is another. In fact, reports are often incomplete and replies are not often clear. The Committee of Experts has noted the same shortcomings in replies concerning the carrying out of the General Survey on labour administration under article 19 of the Constitution. The ILO, however, is trying to reinforce the impact of article 19 better to tackle problems of application, reservations and hesitations with respect to ratification. Our Committee supports these steps and we also refer to the approaches suggested by the Director-General.

Do the reasons for these shortcomings arise from practical considerations? Nevertheless the great majority of reports are not detailed and they should not give rise to too many problems. Or are these structural problems, or do they indicate a lack of political will?

We stress the need for governments who have problems of a practical or structural nature to appeal for technical assistance from the ILO. If the application of the new system for sending in reports does not bring tangible progress, we feel that the Governing Body and the Committee of Experts should, as soon as possible, do an in-depth analysis of the reasons for this deterioration.

Secondly, the Committee of Experts points out to us in paragraph 112 that a large number of comments have not received a reply. We have also noted this fact during the discussion of various individual cases. A number of governments do not reply to the observations made by the Committee of Experts, or they do it in an incomplete way.

We cannot accept that a government which is facing serious problems of application published in an international report should simply refer to arguments of a practical nature. Technical assistance and in particular the multidisciplinary teams are available to governments.

The main reason underlying certain special paragraphs and the very firm conclusions of our Committee are to be found in the absence of cooperation with the ILO and the supervisory bodies.

Thirdly, the Workers' group, supported by several governments, does not accept that the recourse to constitutional procedures, such as complaints, representations and other existing procedures, should be rendered more difficult, as has been suggested by certain governments. We are in favour of a more effective use of procedures, for a strengthening of their complementarity. We are not opposed to certain clarifications should these prove to be necessary, but we oppose every weakening of the supervisory system as a whole, at a time when the ILO is trying to strengthen this system.

Over the past few years the most frequent recourse to the various procedures has nothing to do with an abuse of procedure. It finds its origins in the more active role granted to workers' and employers' organizations in the follow-up of the supervisory system and in the training activities carried out by the ILO and its constituents to increase familiarity with procedures. Moreover, the consequences of structural reforms and the heightened competition brought about by trade liberalization are too often reflected in unilateral fashion in social policy.

Fourthly, a large number of governments have made considerable efforts to submit instruments adopted by the Conference to their respective parliaments. The Committee of Experts has however had to mention, in paragraph 138 of its report, 22 countries which have provided no information with respect to the submission to the competent authorities of Conventions and Recommendations adopted by the Conference over the past seven sessions. The Workers' group has, both orally and in writing, requested that Workers' delegates in the countries concerned who are present at the Conference should question their governments in this respect and follow developments at the national level.

Fifthly, we have had an important exchange of opinions on the general observations with respect to the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122). We note that the ILO and the Conference, over a number of successive sessions have placed the promotion of this Convention at the top of its list of priorities, concerning the objective of full employment by means of a global, coordinated, harmonized, social, monetary and economic policy.

We are in agreement with the Employers' group that we should not isolate employment policy from economic and social policy as a whole. However, in practice this approach is far from being the rule, even if we can note a number of positive trends in certain countries and regions.

The comments of the Committee of Experts are based on the objective observation of facts and developments.

We have emphasized that globalization has to be seen in a social framework which aims at the same time to combine economic efficiency with social justice and the respect for human dignity at work.

Governments have confirmed that certain multinationals or subcontracting networks require governments not to apply international and national standards, including in export processing zones, or to not ratify international Conventions. Others have exerted considerable pressure, generated by structural adjustment programmes on employment policy and international standards.

Sixthly, the Workers' group and all governments who have taken the floor have appreciated and supported the observations of the Committee of Experts on social security. In an ever-greater number of countries, social security systems are facing considerable reforms. These reforms, or the partial or total privatization of certain branches of social security, such as old-age pensions and health care, have to take into account international standards. The type of system — public, private or mixed — does not really matter. States must take on their overall responsibility. As a result, mechanisms have to be introduced to monitor inter alia the management of the system and the payment of benefits or services, and to guarantee the participation of the insured people.

International standards such as the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102) and the Invalidity, Old-Age and Survivors' Benefits Convention, 1967 (No. 128) are also drafted in a fairly flexible way, and permit stage-by-stage developments in various branches. We feel that better economic performance and the maintenance or development of social security are complementary.

Seventhly, observations relating to the Protection of Wages Convention, 1949 (No. 95) received broad support in all groups. Our Committee had to put a number of cases on the agenda of the last sessions.

Non-payment of wages and very late payment has become an ever-more widespread scourge of the transition economies and those subject to structural adjustment programmes. Member States only rarely establish the necessary legal structures to bring about actual application of this Convention.

We refer also to the conclusions in the case of the Ukraine and the footnote from the Committee of Experts and our statements included in paragraph 7 of our report, relating to the Russian Federation, on Convention No. 95.

Eighthly, comments relating to combating forced labour and child labour also receive broad support. A number of governments announced that they intend to ratify the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138). In spite of the enhanced activities of the ILO, in spite of IPEC and government commitments, there still remains a great deal to be done. So as to combat the sexual exploitation of children, we insist that governments should rapidly take legal measures to sanction violations abroad, and to punish the publicity which encourages such practices.

My ninth and final specific point is that I would like to draw your attention to paragraphs 41-43 of our report, relating to export processing zones. The Workers' group is very concerned by the development of these zones, which are too frequently areas where the law does not prevail or social legislation is not applicable or not applied. However, some governments have communicated to us that they have made efforts to guarantee the application of national and international standards in export processing zones. All of our Committee supported the special programme of the ILO on social questions in export processing zones. We will follow the results of this work with great interest.

The discussion of the General Survey on labour administration showed broad support in the three groups for the ratification and application of Convention No. 150 and Recommendation No. 158. I refer to paragraph 146 of our report. These instruments favour the establishment of an effective and coordinated system of labour administration ensuring good cooperation with employers' and workers' organizations. Rapid developments at the economic and social level and the increasing complexity call for a real system of labour administration. Good functioning of the labour market is a decisive factor for economic success.

However, in many countries, administrations, agencies and ministries concerned do not yet benefit from priority treatment in terms of budget resources. Only rarely do they enjoy much political esteem. A good labour administration system considerably facilitates the implementation of a harmonized employment policy and the application of international standards. It makes technical cooperation more accessible, and strengthens tripartism and social dialogue at the national level.

These two instruments allow differences of approach and implementation at the national level. The General Survey clarified the requirements and contents of the Convention which should help to encourage its ratification.

Our Committee had an in-depth discussion on individual cases. The Workers' and Employers' groups cooperated in a constructive manner. All the conclusions have been adopted with the agreement of the two groups. They are specific, operational and will doubtless have considerable impact at the national level. We hope that they will be read carefully by the governments concerned and by the international community as a whole. Above all we would like to express the wish that the specific requirements should be implemented.

The working methods and the decision-making mechanism of our Committee are different from those of other Conference committees. The position of the Employers' and Workers' groups is predominant in preparing and approving conclusions.

However, in the discussion of individual cases, we noted that several governments played a more active and constructive role than in the past. They supported the comments and conclusions proposed by the Employers' and Workers' groups. They stressed to the Government delegates of the countries concerned the need to apply the Convention fully by means of decisive activity and close cooperation with the ILO. In this respect I would recommend that you read the report relating to the cases of Indonesia, Nigeria, Sudan and Myanmar with care.

Technical assistance in all of its forms, including through the activities of the multidisciplinary teams or direct contacts, can make an effective contribution to bringing about progress as long as political will is effective. We cannot accept technical assistance being used simply to save time and not do anything.

We discussed 27 cases for 27 countries. We would have wished to deal with a larger number and have a better balanced list from the point of view of regions, number and nature of the Conventions. Because of a shortage of time, we were unable to deal with certain cases. However, if there is no real progress in these countries, the Workers' group would wish to be able to discuss them next year.

You will find the list of these cases in paragraph 7 of our report. These refer to Djibouti, Ecuador and Ethiopia, for Convention No. 87, and to Afghanistan for Convention No. 111, since the authorities have forbidden girls to receive education and women from working, thus condemning widows to die of hunger.

As is highlighted in paragraph 7 of our report, the selection is not determined by the desire to draw up a blacklist. We do not limit our discussions to the most flagrant violations of fundamental rights. We follow developments in the application of technical Conventions and we are also concerned about the application of Conventions in the industrialized countries and the newly industrialized countries. We also discussed cases where progress has taken place.

The draft list is a proposal from the bureau of our Committee. The conclusions relating to six countries and six Conventions were the subject of a special paragraph from our Committee. I would advise you to read attentively paragraphs 165-172 of our report. This was the highest number of special paragraphs for a number of years. Moreover, three of these six countries which were the subject of a special paragraph are also mentioned in paragraph 173 for continued failure to implement Conventions. These countries have been included in a special paragraph following in-depth discussion in our Committee.

We are very well aware that it is not at all pleasant for a country to be included in a special paragraph, as was pointed out by the Government representative of Morocco with reference to that country for Convention No. 98, and Sudan for Convention No. 29. The decisive criteria for this to take place are the gravity of violations and above all the absence of a clear, unmistakable signal of a will to cooperate properly with the supervisory bodies. The Moroccan Government has had two decades to bring its law and practice into conformity with the Convention. It has not sent a report and has not kept its numerous promises to modify legislation. Moreover and above all, it has not accepted our suggestion to receive a direct contacts mission from the ILO to overcome problems of application.

As far as the application by the Islamic Republic of Iran of Convention No. 111 on prohibition of discrimination in employment and occupation is concerned, the Government did not accept a direct contacts mission which was already mentioned last year to analyse and clarify the real situation on the spot. We hope warmly that contacts between the ILO and the Government of the Islamic Republic of Iran will continue and will be strengthened in the weeks and months to come in order to bring about progress.

On the subject of Swaziland for Convention No. 87, despite explicit requests from our Committee, the Government has not taken on a commitment to carry out the recommendations of the direct contacts mission of October 1996, which received the agreement of the workers' and employers' organizations. Moreover, the Government recently promulgated anti-union laws.

As far as Nigeria is concerned on Convention No. 87 on freedom of association, our Committee has noted that union leaders are still put in prison, that the decrees of 1994 and 1996 regarding the dissolution of the executive committees of union organizations and the control of unions have not yet been abrogated. There has been no detailed report, and the Government has not yet accepted a direct contacts mission. The integration of conclusions into a special paragraph and a paragraph on continued failure to implement was logical and inevitable.

On the subject of the application by Sudan of Convention No. 29 on forced labour, we had to include our conclusions in a special paragraph and a paragraph on continued failure to implement, since the Committee of Experts noted that forced labour persists with the complicity or the indifference of the Government, which has not proved its commitment to bring this to an end.

On the violation of Convention No. 87 on freedom of association by Myanmar, the inclusion of our conclusions in a special paragraph and a paragraph on continued failure to implement was also inevitable given the absence of cooperation on the part of the Government and the persistence of major divergences in law and practice.

We have had to adopt firm conclusions in other cases which imply the implementation of serious commitments on the part of the governments concerned. We refer inter alia to the case of Indonesia for Convention No. 98 on collective bargaining. Indeed, the protection of workers against acts of anti-union discrimination and the protection of union organizations against interference in their internal affairs is non-existent. We must also guarantee the full respect of civil liberties. We also stress the need for the President of SBSI, our friend Mukhtar Pakpahan and other union members to be freed immediately. If there is no real progress on this case, our Committee has decided to discuss it again next year.

Our Committee also dealt with the situation on freedom of association in Bangladesh, Belarus, Costa Rica, Guatemala, Turkey and Venezuela. If there is no progress in Bolivia as far as freedom of association is concerned, we will discuss this again next year.

For the case of the United Kingdom, on freedom of association at the GCHQ centre in Cheltenham, our Committee noted some progress which is referred to in paragraph 164 of our report. We hope that the new Government will in the near future undertake dialogue with workers' and employers' organizations to bring legislation into line with Convention No. 87 with respect to other comments.

In its conclusions, the Committee envisaged the possibility of discussing the following cases again next year, should this prove necessary: the Ukraine for the protection of wages, Pakistan for forced labour and Malaysia for discrimination against migrant workers with respect to compensation for accidents at work. Non-discrimination against migrant workers is a fundamental question for us. Because they are far from home and not integrated in the host country, these workers are more vulnerable. Equality of treatment in Malaysia for the compensation of accidents at work is fundamental, given the fact that migrant workers work above all in the most dangerous sectors with regard to accidents at work, for example in construction.

The inclusion of Malaysia on the list of cases to be dealt with was thus justified. We also discussed migrant workers in the case of France, with regard to the Equality of Treatment (Social Security) Convention, 1962 (No. 118), the Workmen's Compensation (Accidents) Convention, 1925 (No. 17) for New Zealand, and the case of Peru, in respect of the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102). In Peru, neither the public nor the private system for old-age pensions guarantee minimum rights.

We also had in-depth discussion on other cases such as the policy on women's wages in Nepal, with respect to the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100); the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) in Sri Lanka; indigenous populations in India, relating to the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107) and the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), with regard to Brazil. We would strongly advise that you read our reports with a great deal of attention and assess the commitments taken there.

Our Committee also devoted a session to countries which had not respected the constitutional obligations of sending reports or submission of Conventions to the competent authorities for possible ratification. The Governments concerned should have recourse to the possibilities made available by technical assistance and should strengthen their system of labour administration.

In conclusion I would like to thank our Chair, Mr. Callorda Salvo, whose impartiality and firmness contributed to the good quality of the discussions and conclusions. We would also like to thank our Reporter, Ms. Mihes. We thank the Chairman of the Committee of Experts, Sir William Douglas, who was present as an observer at the general debate and the discussion on the General Survey. Our Committee has asked the Chair of the Committee of Experts to be with us at the next session.

We thank the representative of the Director-General, Mr. Bartolomei de la Cruz, Messrs. Zenger, Gernigon and Swepston as well as the whole ILO team, Ms. Monique Cloutier of the Bureau for Workers' Activities, as well as the interpreters.

I would like to include in these thanks the members of our Committee; Mr. Wisskirchen, the Employer spokesperson for his spirit of dialogue and cooperation; and more particularly the members of the Workers' group, those of the Office and of our group and that is Ms. Bernadette Hillan, and our friends Messrs. Ahmed, Sibanda, Venturini and Chilou.

Our report was approved unanimously in our Committee and I would ask the Conference to proceed in the same manner.

The PRESIDENT — The discussion of the report of the Committee on the Application of Standards is now open.

Original French: Mr. BINTOU'A-TSHIABOLA-KATOMPA (Workers' delegate, Democratic Republic of the Congo) — As the dawn of the third millennium approaches, I am happy to take the floor on behalf of the workers of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, the former Republic of Zaire, the rebirth of which took place on the historic date of 17 May 1997. The great satisfaction which I feel at the moment of course comes from the fact that since the new authorities of the Democratic Republic of the Congo came to power, they have taken no measures to either restrict or ban the application of the ILO's principles relating to trade union rights, as can be seen from my presence here at the Conference as National President of the General Federation of Labour of the Congo (FGTK) and that of the Congolese Trade Union Confederation, two of the six national interoccupational representing the workers of the Congo, members of the National Labour Council and signatories of the national interoccupational collective agreement concluded with the Federation of Enterprises of the Congo which is the employers' association.

I would obviously be failing in elementary courtesy were I not to associate myself with various speakers here in extending to the President my warmest congratulations on her election to chair this session of the Conference. I wish her every success in carrying out her duties, the success of which is already becoming clearly evident.

As regards the tasks assigned to our Conference, might I, express a few remarks which I think are important in connection with the ratification and the application of Conventions and the submission of Conventions and Recommendations to the national authorities.

According to the report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, the Democratic Republic of the Congo has ratified only three out of seven fundamental Conventions concerning which the Director-General launched an appeal to all member States after the World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen in 1995.

These are the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) and the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100).

As regards the submission of Conventions and Recommendations to the national authorities, as emphasized by Mr. Bartolomei, the representative of the Director-General, I agree with the remarks by the Committee of Experts in its report concerning the disturbing situation that exists in a number of countries, 22 to be precise, which have fallen far behind in this respect.

The Democratic Republic of the Congo is one of these States, but might I recall from this world rostrum my earlier interventions before the Committee, requesting tripartite technical assistance from the ILO, and in particular the multidisciplinary teams, especially regarding the organization of seminars to help the Government and employers' and workers' occupational organizations in the Congo to become thoroughly familiar with international labour standards so as to enable them to contribute more efficiently to the process of the submission, ratification and application of Conventions.

The small and medium-sized rural and urban enterprise sector covers more than 85 per cent of the Congo's economy. Following the plundering of this decade and the maladministration under the "Zairianization" policy of the 1970s, I must stress the urgent need for technical cooperation from the ILO, inter alia, for working women in the formal sector, women carrying out survival activities in the informal sector as well as Congolese peasants — assistance which will help them to improve their training, increase their production and contribute to growth and, finally create possibilities for new employment and put an end to unemployment in the interests of the youth of the Congo.

Original Spanish: Mr. ALVAREZ (Government delegate, Costa Rica) — The Governmental delegation of the Republic of Costa Rica thinks that is necessary to correct Provisional Record No. 19, page 87, fourth paragraph, line 10 where, in connection with Convention No. 87, it refers to "limitations imposed on the right to organize". This should be read: "limitations imposed on the right to strike", since, as the report states, the Committee of Experts was examining the case of strikes in certain sectors in Costa Rica. This request is just a technical correction that we also have presented in writing to the International Labour Standards Department so that it can appear in the report of the Committee on the Application of Standards and in the Record of Proceedings of this Conference.

Original French: Mr. BELOUED (Government delegate, Morocco) — When examining the case of the application by our country of Convention No. 98 on the right to organize and collective bargaining, we took great care to inform the Committee on the Application of Standards that a draft labour code, taking account of the comments made by the Committee of Experts, had been submitted to Parliament, which was to have it before it at a special session to be convened for that purpose. But, because of differences of opinion amongst the professional organizations of employers and workers on certain questions that were raised within the context of this code, and on the insistence of one — and I mean one — of the trade union organizations, it was decided to go deeper into the examination in a tripartite committee set up for this purpose, within the context of the social dialogue entered into by the Government and the social partners.

Morocco informed the multidisciplinary team of the reasons that delayed the adoption of the draft labour code and stated that it intended to have the team come in to support the efforts made by the Government to find concerted solutions to the questions of dispute. The contacts certainly were established with this team and resulted in the drawing up of a document containing priority objectives. The adoption of the labour code and its enabling text is amongst the priority objectives of the process of cooperation that is being carried out at the moment.

In the Committee on the Application of Standards, we emphasized the need for continuing this technical assistance, which is just beginning because, in our view, it is premature and inappropriate to envisage any other measures that might be said to discredit the programme for cooperation, which is following its normal course.

The decision taken by the Committee on the Application of Standards today is both incomprehensible and serious. It is also anachronistic, because events have overtaken it, and it allows neither for what has been achieved, nor for the activity in the fields of social dialogue and labour relations, and it takes no notice of the declared intent by the Government to continue with the ratification of all fundamental Conventions.

It is also incomprehensible because, quite logically, it should only be envisaged once the Committee considers that technical assistance by a multidisciplinary team has not been able to achieve tangible progress, which is not the case in the situation which is of concern to us now. This is serious because it questions the whole effectiveness of technical assistance and prejudices its results.

Taking into account the above, we have asked for thought to be given to the specific results obtained through the normal methods of technical assistance, special paragraphs or direct contacts missions.

We think that such an approach ought to help ensure greater relevance of the decisions taken by the Committee on the Application of Standards.

Before concluding I would like to inform the distinguished assembly that the Kingdom of Morocco has regularly cooperated with the bodies of this Organization and has supplied all the reports that it has been asked for.

The PRESIDENT — We shall now move on to the adoption of the report. The Conference is called upon to adopt this report as a whole. If there are no objections, I shall take it that the report is adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

I wish to thank the Officers and the members of the Committee, as well as the staff of the secretariat for the excellent work that they have done.

CLOSING SPEECHES

The PRESIDENT — We shall proceed to the closing speeches of the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference. I give the floor to Mr. Ramírez León, Workers' delegate, Venezuela, and Worker Vice-President of the Conference.

Original Spanish: Mr. RAMIREZ LEON (Workers' delegate, Venezuela; Vice-President of the Conference)— First of all I wish to express my gratitude for the confidence placed in me by my brothers and sisters in the Workers' group in electing me as Worker Vice-President of the Conference.

On behalf of the Workers' group, I would like to address to Ms. Olga Keltošová, Minister of Labour and Social Affairs of the Republic of Slovakia and the President of this Conference, my most sincere congratulations on the excellent way in which she directed the work that has been carried out during this Conference, as witnessed by the reports and the texts of Conventions and Recommendations that have been drawn up here.

It is a great satisfaction to me to be able to record that tripartism, as it was defined by the founders of this Organization, has triumphed once again. The consensus on which the promising results obtained for each of the issues on the agenda were based, would not have been possible without the firm commitment of the social actors to dialogue and to tripartism. I would also like to emphasize the competency and experience of my colleagues Mr. Khalil and Ms. Sasso Mazzufferi, Vice-Presidents of the Conference, and the Presidents and Chairmen of the different committees, thanks to whose contribution and spirit of teamwork we have been able to achieve success.

This session of the International Labour Conference once again has emphasized the relevance and importance of the standard-setting activities of the ILO as the essential means of action for promoting social justice.

As was defined at the Copenhagen Social Summit and at the Ministerial Meeting in Singapore, where the ILO's fundamental role was recognized in the establishment of machinery which would lead to a true respect of fundamental rights, we have bravely but without complexes to accept our duty to fight against exclusion and poverty in order to prevent an increase in prospects of social divisions, inequality and disruption which are incapable of being integrated into world markets. But it is a fundamental task of the ILO, within the framework of its standard-setting action, to provide new means of action for the international community, to overcome the obstacles and guarantee that globalization and liberalization of the economy will lead to progress and social justice.

As was recorded by the Director-General in his reply to this discussion, three years ago in the Governing Body of the ILO, it was envisaged and now it is vital that specific decisions be adopted. The application of the fundamental standards of the ILO, the ratification of the corresponding Conventions, and the adoption of machinery which will allow the ILO to supervise the application of these standards effectively and have them implemented by governments is an urgent task for the ILO, on the eve of the twenty-first century.

In spite of the controversial comments that were made on the Director-General's Report, we think that the discussion in itself contributed to strengthening the functions of the ILO.

The work of the committees was extremely positive. We have also noted that there is a need to return to the publication of the Provisional Record, in particular when the Report by the Director-General is controversial, because these are very important documents which contribute to informing and guiding the discussion and avoiding unnecessary misunderstandings. We hope that this proposal will receive a favourable welcome.

The adoption of a new Convention on private employment agencies which is a revision of Convention No. 96 on fee-paying employment agencies, and also the Recommendation that accompanies it, confirms the vitality and dynamism of the standard-setting system of this Organization in providing protection to all workers and jobseekers.

The promotion of cooperation between the private employment agencies and the public employment services will contribute to protecting workers against the abuses and improper practices, which are in some cases even fraudulent.

The Workers' group demonstrated its goodwill and its desire to make the necessary efforts to revise and modernize the standard-setting instrument which has received the support of the Governing Body. We welcome the high level of voting in favour of the Convention and the Recommendation; but nevertheless we regret the high level of abstention on the Recommendation, the majority of which was on the Employers' side.

The working party of the Committee on the Application of Standards made an important contribution in this field, and it is therefore fundamental that the other social actors should play important roles, in giving active support to the elaboration of new standards on new problems of a universal nature, which are arising in the world of work as a consequence of the globalized economy, as is the case with contract labour.

We are pleased with the inclusion on the agenda of the Conference of this item on the system of contract labour and with the discussions that led to the elaboration of the basis of the text of the Convention, which will be discussed next year. During the deliberations, interventions by some governments and the experience of the Workers' delegates confirmed that sufficient knowledge and practice of the problem existed for us to be able to lay down the basis for standard-setting activity in this respect.

We are also pleased that the Conference has adopted the report of the Committee on Job Creation in Small and Medium-sized Enterprises, which is a good basis for a Recommendation. We are sure that this will be of great value for governments and will help them with their job creation policies.

Finally, I would like to take this opportunity to appeal to ILO member States to contribute to reaffirming the vocation of this Organization as a great forum for dialogue and tripartite social consultation at the international level. The life and reaffirmation of the ILO, to a considerable extent, depends on the application and supervision of Conventions and standards by member States, and the institutions which are members of them. The ILO continues to be the most competent instrument for guaranteeing that capital and labour can live together and contribute to the development of peoples, with social justice, equity and guarantees of peace and coexistence.

Original French: Ms. SASSO MAZZUFERI (Employers' delegate, Italy; Vice-President of the Conference)— On behalf of the Employers' group, I would like to express an essentially positive verdict as to the results of this Conference. Work in plenary and in the committees took place in a spirit of cooperation. Even the contrasts which are natural among the groups had constructive effects which may be briefly summarized.

First of all, we had the constitutional amendment. Then a Convention on private employment agencies, which will help to make the labour market more flexible. The positive impact of these standards will very soon be seen in our countries and it will also be possible using this method to alleviate the scourge of unemployment. As far as the Recommendation is concerned, a certain number of abstentions were recorded because of the excessively rigid and complicated nature of the instrument. This should be duly noted.

We have obtained good results in the Committee on job creation in small and medium-sized enterprises, and we are very pleased about this.

In the Committee on contract labour, which was more difficult and complex, the report on the deliberations sets forth the points that still remain to be clarified or amended. Between now and next year we will have time to go into the controversial issues in greater depth and try to come up with formulations which are acceptable to the three groups. Above all, we must make good use of this time, and not simply follow bureaucratic routines in the time period between the two sessions of the Conference. This, at least, is my sincere wish.

I should also like to make a few remarks about the more problematic aspects of this Conference. With respect to the discussions of the Reports of the Chairman of the Governing Body and of the Director-General, I noted that, barring a few exceptions, none of the speakers managed to respect the time-limit of five minutes. The average length of statements was about seven minutes, or more. This fact should be taken into account for the organization of future work.

With respect to the work of the technical committees, we need to give some thought to the problems which the groups had to surmount, particularly in the first few days, because of the lack of experience of the Officers of certain committees. This made it sometimes difficult to understand the attitudes adopted by one group with respect to the others, giving rise to deadlocks which did not help to promote the finding of rapid and effective solutions to controversial points. In these cases there is increasing recourse to ILO officials, who are called upon to provide explanations or to request the application of certain rules, which may be very difficult and complex, in particular for those who are participating for the first time in the debates. It is not always a matter of legal problems, but sometimes also of practical advice to help to facilitate consensus. It is thus vital that these officials should be prepared to respond to calls for assistance more and more frequently, which makes their workload very heavy. It also means that we should give some thought to the ever greater involvement of these true guardian angels of the Conference.

In conclusion, Madam President, I should like to emphasize what an honour and a pleasure it has been for me to work with you, and with the other two Vice-Presidents, Mr. Khalil and Mr. Ramírez-León, as well as with the Director-General, Mr. Hansenne. To him and to his staff, I should like to address my thanks and my compliments for their collaboration in the organization of our work. I am also grateful to the interpreters for their constant assistance in the lengthy days of discussion during the plenary sittings. On a personal note, the experience that the Employers' group has given me this year has been extremely interesting and enriching. I have learned a great deal from all of you, and I would like to thank you most warmly.

Original Arabic: Mr. KHALIL (Minister of Social Affairs and Labour, Syrian Arab Republic; Vice-President of the Conference) — It is an honour for me to have the opportunity, at this closing sitting, to express the appreciation of the delegation of my country to all the Government delegates to this Conference who bestowed on me the honour of electing me Government Vice-President at this session. I should also like to express my appreciation to the Asian Government group and the Arab Government group which nominated me for this position.

I should like to take this opportunity to express my thanks to all the participants at this Conference for the support I was given at the sittings over which I presided. I should also like to express my appreciation to the ILO, the Director-General and his staff, for all their work in contributing to the smooth running of the Conference. Positive results were achieved under the able and wise guidance of the President of the Conference, who set the tone of this session.

We would like to express our full appreciation to the Government, people and country of Slovakia.

During this session we met with success. In many ways this session was an extraordinary one given the constructive spirit that characterized it in the plenary sittings, the committee meetings and also in the smaller meetings. The session has further reinforced this Organization which is becoming a more and more important partner in the United Nations family, on account of its noble objectives, in particular that of the promotion of social justice. It is also an Organization that is becoming increasingly important in view of its universal constituency and its tripartite structure which promotes social dialogue around the world.

Today, more than ever before, we are committed to the mission of the ILO, especially in this historic period of globalization which is accompanied by fears that social issues will be overshadowed by economic ones. There is growing concern that globalization will take a heavy toll on workers, causing them to lose the rights that they long struggled to acquire. This is why we hope that our Organization, the ILO, will convey our position to the financial institutions, defending the principle of social justice and thus acquired labour rights which provide workers with a certain dignity.

The ILO must continue to defend the truth, which is that economic development must have as its primary objective the development of people, their well-being and their prosperity. Money is not a goal in itself, it is only a means, nothing more; a means to achieve welfare for all as well as justice and equality, in the interests of the labour force in particular.

We thank the Director-General for discussing the issue of labour standards in the context of globalization. The discussion that took place on his Report will certainly help the world realize the need to defend social and labour standards and to support the efforts made by all the social partners in full knowledge of the importance of the period in which we are living. The Organization must maintain its credibility and inspire confidence.

We look forward to the next session of the Governing Body which will take into consideration the opinions of all constituents of the Organization, enabling the ILO to give globalization a human face that will stop marginalization and poverty becoming even more widespread, for such phenomena are completely unacceptable now that we are on the threshold of the third millennium.

The Conference has adopted the budget for the next biennium and a number of new standards. This is proof that we are all committed to helping the ILO achieve its objectives so that it may always be a vital component in the United Nations family.

The Conference was honoured this year by the presence of His Majesty, King Hussein of Jordan. His words had a considerable impact, particularly when he spoke of the situation concerning lasting peace in the Middle East. Persisting Israeli practices have led to deadlock. These practices have frustrated the hopes and missions of all peace-loving nations. Peace can only be achieved on the basis of social justice. Military occupation, oppression and arbitrary action together with their consequences such as the confiscation of lands and resources, disregard for the rights of others, and so on, are all in obvious contradiction to the principles of the ILO which are based on the protection of fundamental rights — the right to work, to produce and to live in dignity. Therefore we would like to express our appreciation for the work the ILO and the Director-General have done to follow up the true situation of Arab workers in the occupied Arab territories in Palestine the Syrian Arab Republic and Lebanon.

We thank them for sending a mission each year to look into the situation of these workers.

The visit of Mr. James Wolfensohn of the World Bank and his exchange with the Members at the Conference had a very positive impact. Members will no doubt look forward to other visits from prominent guests, so that we may achieve greater integration between the world of labour, represented by the ILO, and the world of economics, finance and trade, represented by other international organizations whose role is becoming increasingly important.

Such integration between our organizations is essential if we really wish to guarantee peace and stability in the world, and in particular in the developing countries and those most in need of assistance to fight unemployment, poverty and marginalization, and if we wish to protect disadvantaged groups such as women and children, and to promote social security and improved conditions of work.

Allow me once more to convey my sincere thanks to you all.

Original French: The SECRETARY-GENERAL — Madam President, the three Vice-Presidents who have just spoken have expressed the gratitude of the different groups that make up this assembly. I would like to associate myself with these congratulations and these thanks on behalf of the International Labour Office, and in particular, on behalf of the team of officials who have been working closely with you and the Vice-Presidents throughout these nearly three weeks. For this short time, they found in you a kind and efficient boss. And so, all of us, the delegates and the Office, thank you for the way in which you conducted your presidency, allowing us — as has been recalled by several participants — to hold a Conference which achieved extremely positive results. It merely remains for me, as I do every year on everyone's behalf, to present you with a small token which symbolized your presidency and the important place that you now hold in our Organization's history: the ceremonial gavel.

The PRESIDENT — Thank you, Mr. Hansenne, for your kind words and for giving me this gavel, which I will always cherish as a memory of these three weeks of deliberations, sometimes converging and sometimes contrasting opinions, expressions of hopes and fears, difficulties and successes, images of hard realities and dreams of a better world. Although in my capacity as Minister of Labour, Social Affairs and the Family of the Slovak Republic, I had the pleasure of attending previous sessions of the Conference, my election to chair this illustrious assembly filled me with awe because of the responsibility it involved. Today, as we prepare to part, I have an even deeper understanding of the significance of this world parliament of labour and the potential it represents. While recognizing the importance of the work accomplished during these days, I am also very much aware of the immensity of the task that lies ahead. Although I feel that we can go home with a sense of having added a chapter to the history of social development, we should be neither triumphant nor fully satisfied with our achievement, because we are still very far away from fulfilling our mandate as outlined in the Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia.

According to this mandate, "it is a responsibility of the International Labour Organization to examine and consider all international and financial policies and measures" in the light of the fundamental objective to create conditions "in which all human beings, irrespective of race, creed or sex, have the right to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity". These words of the Declaration of Philadelphia should be a constant reminder that before creating welfare programmes or safety networks for those millions who fall through the torn nets of national and international policies, we have to do our utmost to promote such economic and financial policies which would create the conditions for the achievement of the goal outlined in the Declaration.

When focusing on the challenges of globalization, it is important to recall that globalization in itself is neither good nor bad. Its impact will depend on whether we will be able to channel its forces in the right direction. In other words, increased productivity, flexibility and the internationalization of communications and trade should not be perceived as ends in themselves.

They should rather be judged on their capacity to promote material well-being, spiritual development, economic security and equal opportunity. Our task is therefore to use all means in our possession, including the standards mechanism of the ILO, to ensure that globalization improves and does not deteriorate the human condition. However, if globalization results in increased accumulation of riches in the hands of a few and creates more poverty and suffering for large segments of society in all parts of the world, we will have to ring the bells of alarm.

I venture to say that the present political, economic and social circumstances are as crucial as those which in 1919 called for the creation of the International Labour Organization. We are at the threshold of a revolution which has no comparison in modern history. Therefore, we must be aware of the fact that our decisions, programmes and activities, but also our failures to act, may have historic consequences. We simply cannot afford to be passive or to sanction trends and developments which might deteriorate the living and working conditions of those whom we are to serve. While understanding the need to be realistic, pragmatic and lucid, we need to have the courage to be controversial and go against the tide if the promotion of social justice so requires.

Globalization of the economy and trade alone pose complex challenges to governments, employers and workers alike. These challenges are, however, further complicated by the cultural and digital revolution, massive migration, the struggle of countries with their debt burden and the transition of a large number of countries from centrally planned to market economies. It requires super-human efforts to cope with the transformations necessitated by all these processes. Yet it seems that greed and protectionism often gain the upper hand over compassion, collaboration and justice — three elements which are essential for minimizing the negative and maximizing the positive impact of globalization.

We in Central Europe often have the feeling that neither the magnitude and the unprecedented nature of the transition processes nor the opportunities they provide are fully appreciated by the international community. If they were the so-called "business as usual" attitude would give way to a revision of decisions and policies in response to the new situation. People in transition economy countries are aware of the need to modify their institutions, production processes, social security systems, legislation and even more importantly, their thinking and their attitudes. They know that democratization also requires the development of civil society, the taking of initiatives, the creation of non-governmental organizations, opening up to other cultures, customs and traditions and the safeguarding of their own identity. Are people in industrialized market economies equally aware of the need to change in order to respond to the challenges posed by the new status quo?

The tripartite structure of the ILO and the resulting search for dialogue and consensus could play a very important role in this respect as well. It could develop our capacity to listen to each other, to see reality from different angles, to prevent conflict and to become partners in shaping our future. It could also highlight the interdependent nature of our world and the necessity not only for the social partners, but also for nations and regions, to meet each other in humility and respect.

These points have been highlighted also by our two special visitors, His Majesty King Hussein of Jordan and Mr. J Wolfensohn, the Director of the World Bank. Both of them stress the need to actively engage in the building of just and peaceful societies. As you know, present conflict situations even prevented several of ILO member States from participating in our Conference. This should serve as a reminder that the promotion of lasting peace is one of the most important mandates of our Organization.

Let us not underestimate the role that the ILO is called to play in this world of far-reaching transformations. The tripartite structure of the ILO gives this Organization an important comparative advantage in assisting governments, employers and workers to redefine their role for the twenty-first century and to form partnerships which are essential to face the challenges of globalization. Our responsibility is immense. Listening to the statements of many delegates it became clear to me that we simply cannot afford to play a marginal role.

I want to thank all of you, once again, for the honour you bestowed upon me and my country by asking me to guide our deliberations. I learnt that in the 78 years of the ILO's history I was the fourth woman to chair the Conference. The first was elected in 1941, and the last one before me in 1984, that is 13 years ago. Moreover, it is the first time that the Employer Vice-Chairperson was a woman. I take this as a sign of a growing awareness of the necessity to work together, women and men, for the common good. However, when I observe this assembly, I realize that we still have a long way to go before this Conference becomes an expression of the equality of opportunity and treatment which the ILO has been advocating since its inception. It is my ardent hope that next year the composition of the Conference itself will serve as an example of equity and social justice.

Let me mention at this point that I greatly appreciated the panel discussion organized on women's questions. I hope that, as of next year, this gathering will become an official part of the International Labour Conference, and will be attended by both men and women. I also hope that the composition of the staff of the Office, where women are still underrepresented in decision-making positions, will become an expression of equality.

I would like to stress that equal opportunity and treatment for women are neither a luxury nor a favour, but a basis for democratization and social justice. They are equally an economic imperative. Whereas we have made undeniable advances in ensuring that attention be paid to the promotion of women at the national and international levels, it still remains to be universally understood that without the advancement of women we cannot eradicate poverty; without the advancement of women we cannot create fully democratic societies; and without the advancement of women we cannot formulate economic and financial policies which promote social justice.

To illustrate the first point, let me recall that according to research results, one-third of the world's households is headed by a woman. As a direct consequence of women's disadvantaged situation concerning education, employment, inheritance rights or land tenure and the various forms of dissemination they experience in their daily life, most of these households belong to the poorest segments of society. Their children, boys and girls, are those who are most likely to receive little or no education, run the greatest risk of becoming child workers and later perpetuate the vicious circle of poverty and exclusion. Neglect of women's education and training, coupled with limited access to land, productive efforts and credit not only deprive women and their families of income but also reduce the skill level of nations' human resources, limit the level of national production and prevent countries from being competitive in the global market.

Equally, no society can call itself fully democratic while legislation and entrenched habits prevent women from participating in the shaping of their societies' future and while children grow up with the understanding that it is permissible to give privileges to some and limit the rights of others. Democracy is not a static condition. Its maintenance requires constant vigilance and perseverance and has to permeate all social, political and economic spheres. The condition of women can therefore hinder or enhance the democratization processes of nations and can also be regarded as an indicator of the level of democracy.

Women's limited access to decision-making at the national and international levels also influences the development of political, economic and financial policies. Since most societies cultivate a different set of values in men and women, those which are assigned to women are usually absent from shaping important policies. Yet, if we want to put the human being at the centre of development, if we want to share the benefits of globalization and if we want to bring about social justice, we have to promote the revaluation of caring, protecting, nurturing and the ability to perceive the needs of others.

During our Conference these values have been translated into practice by the most important assets of the ILO, namely its human resources. As President of the Conference I could witness the meticulous organizational work this major event requires and the professionalism and motivation of a large group of persons without whom we would not have been able to accomplish our work.

The Director-General of the ILO can be proud of his staff, which fulfils its role in spite of the fact that as a result of financial constraints the duration of the Conference has been shortened and consequently the same work has to be done during a shorter period of time. The dedication of ILO officials to this Organization gives them the strength to work long hours, often overnight. Colleagues like that have to be valued and appreciated.

During the Conference I had the chance to meet the President and Vice-President of the ILO's staff union, who shared with me their desire to improve communication and dialogue between the administration and the staff, with a view to improving staff-management relations. I believe that the message of this Organization concerning social dialogue, consensus and adequate working conditions should be communicated to others through words and deeds. The structures, functioning, personnel relations and personnel policy of the ILO should serve as an example to those whom we try to convince of the importance of social justice. Mr. Hansenne, I trust that under your guidance the ILO will optimize the use of its existing human resources and will motivate and encourage them through adequate consultation and dialogue. We all know that a participatory management within the Organization would enhance its credibility.

Before I declare this Conference closed, I would like to thank all those who contributed to its smooth functioning. First of all let me express my gratitude to the three Vice-Presidents of the Conference, His Excellency Mr. Ali Khalil, the Minister of Social Affairs and Labour of the Syrian Arab Republic, Mrs. Lucia Sasso-Mazzufferi of Italy, who entered the history of the ILO as the first woman Vice-President representing the Employers, and Mr. Federico Ramírez León from Venezuela, the Vice-President representing the Workers, who together with Mr. Ali Khalil demonstrated infinite patience when they were addressed as "Madam Chairperson". I thank also the distinguished delegates for their understanding and for their readiness to work until the late hours in order to accomplish the work.

I thank the Secretary-General and his colleagues who stood by my side during the entire Conference for their efficiency and energy. I would also like to express appreciation for the work accomplished by the Presidents and Vice-Presidents of committees, as well as the representatives of the Secretary-General, the Experts, committee secretaries and committee clerks whose relentless efforts enabled the committees to finish their work on time.

Last, but not least, let me thank the interpreters, whom we have not seen but whose voices we became familiar with. Without their professionalism and efficiency we would not have been able to communicate with each other. I therefore ask you to give them and all others whose work behind the scenes enabled the Conference to come to a successful conclusion, a well-deserved round of applause.
